But the enforced return to work left a bitter taste in railroaders' mouths since they had earlier rejected an 18 percent raise plus fringe benefits in improved vacations and bereavement pay recommended by a government conciliation board. The fringe benefits were left out of the strike-ending legislation.

The Canadian Brotherhood of Rail, Transport & General Workers, largest single union on the Canadian National Railways, ordered its men to work to the rules. It forecast big slowdowns in express, freight shipments and some ticket sales. The Machinists said 5,000 members in railway shops across Canada didn't have to return to work if they chose not to.

The four groups—the eight non-operating railway unions, seven shop crafts, CBRT and the Railway Trainmen—said they would present their original demands to Goldenberg.

The walkout had idled 1,500 trains a day, silenced the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific telecommunications networks, partially stopped ferries that link two provinces with the mainland and halted deliveries of air freight shipments.

Iron Workers Win Aid Under Auto Trade Act

A third group of auto parts workers whose work was switched to a Canadian plant has been ruled eligible to apply for assistance under the Automotive Products Trade Act of 1965.

About 120 workers laid off by the Fram plant in Birmingham, Ala., since Jan. 3, 1966, were found by the Automotive Agreement Adjustment Assistance Board to have lost their jobs because production of carburetor air filters was transferred by the Fram firm to a Chatham, Ont., plant.

The employes, represented by the Iron Workers, may now apply for cash allowances of up to $70 a week for 52 weeks instead of regular jobless insurance benefits. Certified workers also may be referred to appropriate training courses and may receive training or relocation allowances.

The AAAA Board found that the U.S.-Canadian automotive products agreement of 1965, providing basically for elimination of duties on motor vehicles, was the primary cause of the dislocation of Fram workers.

Two similar cases, decided previously, involved 200 workers at a Ford Motor Co. parts depot in Pennsauken, N.J., and 400 from the General Motors soft-trim plant in Grand Rapids, Mich.

NATIONWIDE CONTRACT covering field employes of the Labor Dept. was signed during the Government Employes' convention in Miami Beach, with 800 delegates as witnesses. Harry Weisbrod, chairman of the AFGE's Council of Field Labor Lodges, exchanges pens with AFGE Pres. John F. Griner, standing. At right is Assistant Sec. of Labor Leo R. Werts, who signed for the Labor Dept. Headquarters employes of the Labor Dept. already work under an AFGE contract.

LBJ Moves to Curb Investment Spending

Reserve Board to help bring down soaring interest rates.

The President said he had assurance that Congress "will give prompt consideration" to the legislation he requested, adding "our hope is that this will cool off the situation and be helpful."

His message declared that "certain actions have become clearly necessary to protect the interest of our people in stable prosperity and I intend to take these actions now."

Reviewing the performance of the economy over the past 67 months and noting the progress, the President outlined this program:

- "I am taking strong measures to reduce lower priority federal expenditures."
- "I recommend that the Congress make the 7 percent investment tax credit inoperative, effective Sept. 1, 1966, to become operative again on Jan. 1, 1968."
- "I recommend that Congress suspend until Jan. 1, 1968, the use of accelerated depreciation on all buildings and structures started or transferred on or after Sept. 1, 1966."
- "I urge the Federal Reserve Board, in executing its policy of monetary restraint, and our large commercial banks to cooperate with the President and the Congress to lower interest rates and to ease the inequitable burden of tight money."

The President, in addition, called on American business to key credit demands to "genuine need," maintain inventories based on current requirements, postpone investment projects, set prices on the basis of real costs and limit profits "to those appropriate for a steadily expanding economy."

He called on labor to avoid wage demands that "would raise the average level of costs and prices in the economy," adopt work rules for entry into "its trades that are appropriate for a continuing full-employment economy," and cooperate with business to raise productivity.

Further long-range actions "may prove necessary," the President said of his overall program, "to maintain balanced growth and finance the defense of Viet Nam."

"But we will not have the necessary facts about fiscal 1967 expenditures until the Congress completes action on the remaining eight appropriation bills, and until the Dept. of Defense knows the size of the supplemental appropriations needed to support our men in Viet Nam," he said.

In analyzing the current situation, the President said there has been "an exaggerated boom in business investment" and that the rapid growth of business credit "has not moderated significantly, despite tight money restraints, that, if intensified, threaten to halt balanced growth."

The suspension of the 7 percent tax credit—enacted in 1962 to spur a lagging economy—should be across-the-board, the President said, "without exception, applying effectively and equitably to all investing industries."

The President pointed out that construction of commercial and industrial buildings is "advanced and encouraged" by accelerated depreciation and that it is now time to "remove this special incentive," because it is "contributing unnecessarily to inflation of building costs and to the pressures on financial markets which are reflected in higher interest rates."

On government spending, Johnson pointed out that a reduction of 10 percent, about $3 billion, "will be required" from the fiscal 1967 budget. He noted that Congress to date has added about $2.25 billion to spending authority requested by the Administration and if bills now pending are passed in their present form, they will add almost $4 billion to federal spending authority and $2 billion to spending in the current fiscal year.

The President stressed that in making cuts in spending during a period of "unparalleled" individual income and corporate profits the poor must not "carry the burden of fighting inflation," that this is "neither good economics nor social justice."

Brown Confirmed In New NLRB Term

The Senate has confirmed the appointment of Gerald A. Brown to a second five-year term on the National Labor Relations Board.

Pres. Johnson defied the protest of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce to reappoint Brown, a career civil servant who joined the NLRB staff as a field examiner in 1942 and rose to regional director. The chamber had protested that he was too pro-union.

The nomination was routinely approved by the Senate on a voice vote.

Delegates Hike Per Capita:

AFGE Parley Sets New Action Program

Miami Beach—The American Federation of Government Employes wound up its 20th convention with an action program—and the funds to put it into effect.

The 800 delegates voted—enthusiastically—for a 25-cent increase in the monthly per capita payment, from 85 cents to $1.10, effective next April. A solid majority supported a 40-cent increase recommended by the AFGE's executive council, but the vote fell narrowly short of the required two-thirds majority. The 25-cent raise, the largest per capita increase ever approved at an AFGE convention, was then passed by a near-unanimous voice vote as delegates stood and applauded.

"This union has come of age," AFGE Pres. John F. Griner commented. "The delegates to this convention clearly indicated they are approaching our program and our problems as unionists rather than as members of a semi-fraternal organization."

With financial resources bolstered, the AFGE prepared to support a program including:

- Permanent labor-management legislation to supplant the Presidential executive order which now governs union activities in the civil service—and to remedy its weaknesses.
- Full pay comparability with private industry for salaried federal employes.
- Area wage boards, with union representation, to determine prevailing wage standards for all blue collar workers in the same geographical area. The convention called for a uniform 10 percent night differential for wage board workers, equal to that now given salaried employes. It asked for a $2.50-an-hour minimum wage for any person employed by the federal government.
- A major overhaul of the civil service retirement system with improved benefits and supplemental social security and medicare coverage.
- Revision of the Hatch Act to give greater political freedom to federal employes.

Griner and Sec.-Treas. Esther F. Johnson were re-elected by big margins.

Griner won his third two-year term with 132,516 votes to 20,197 for John E. Doss of the AFGE's Picatinny Arsenal, N.J., lodge.

Mrs. Johnson, secretary-treasurer since 1956, polled 99,911 votes to 44,953 for James N. Henry, Jacksonville, Fla., and 9,122 for Paul R. Woodman, Los Angeles.

Two ballots were required to resolve a four-way race for a new elective post of executive vice president. Victory in the runoff went to Clyde Webber, 46-year-old Labor Dept. apprenticeship official from Denver, Colo. He defeated Morten J. Davis of Portland, Ore., 90,375 to 56,669. Dennis Garrison of Huntsville, Ala., was eliminated on the first ballot and Royal L. Sims of Philadelphia withdrew from the runoff.

Fourteen vice presidents who had been nominated last spring at regional caucuses were approved by the convention. Delegates voted to set up a 15th region, composed of all overseas locals except Alaska. A caucus of overseas delegates, representing areas as far distant as Okinawa and West Germany, chose James J. Donovan for the new vice presidency. Donovan is currently on the AFGE staff as director of the union's overseas department.

Paid V.P.s

Earlier the convention had approved a constitutional change authorizing the employment of vice presidents as full-time regional directors at salaries pegged to the pay of a Grade 14 in the classified civil service.

Delegates overturned a committee report and voted to authorize the chartering of ladies' auxiliaries. Wives of government employes, delegates noted in floor discussion, have more political freedom than do their husbands, who are restricted by the Hatch Act.

The convention boosted the president's salary from the civil service Grade 17 to a flat $30,000 a year—an increase of about $5,700. The executive vice president's salary was pegged at the Grade 17 level and the secretary-treasurer scale was upgraded from Grade 14 to 15.

Rejecting a committee recommendation to meet next in Cleveland, delegates voted to hold the 1968 convention in Las Vegas.

LBJ Appoints New Chief of Job Bias Panel

Pres. Johnson has named Stephen N. Shulman, general counsel for the Air Force, as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Subject to Senate confirmation, Shulman will take the place vacated by Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr.

Shulman is 33. In 1961 he was named executive assistant to Arthur J. Goldberg, then secretary of labor. Late in 1962 he served as deputy assistant defense secretary for civilian personnel, industrial relations and civil rights, and then became Air Force counsel.

Shulman has degrees from Harvard University and Yale. He did industrial and labor relations work for the Bendix Corp. in Towson, Md., and Utica, N.Y. He was law clerk to Supreme Court Justice John M. Harlan in 1958 and served as visiting assistant professor at the University of Michigan law school during the 1959 summer session.

A native of New Haven, Conn., Shulman practiced law with the firm of Covington and Burling until May 1960, when he became assistant U.S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

The EEOC enforces the fair employment opportunity provisions of the Civil Rights Act. It is supervised by the chairman and four other members of the commision.

Jennings Reports Membership Gain:

Unity, Democracy Stressed As IUE Convention Themes

By Robert B. Cooney

Bal Harbour, Fla.—The stress was on unity and membership participation as 609 delegates to the biennial convention of the Intl. Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers prepared to consider election reforms and to temper with financial strength the new tool of coordinated bargaining.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings set the tone in a keynote address in which he pledged that "this is going to be a delegates' convention."

Jennings, who was installed as president 17 months ago after a recount of votes by the U.S. Dept. of Labor reversed the announced results of the union's 1964 election, dealt briefly with the recent past but without recrimination.

"The fight that took place at our last convention," Jennings told the delegates, "was an important turning point that should be treasured in the IUE. It was a fight for democracy; it was a fight for the right to dissent; it was and is a fight for the right for trade unionists to control this union and their destiny. And that fight was a healthy fight. . . .

"I want to make this crystal clear: If ever you think that I am wrong or anybody else is wrong, you have a responsibility to get up on your feet and say so, because it could be that you are right and everybody else is wrong. . . .

"We are going to have free discussion and any man that takes what appears to be a position contrary to the leadership, so long as he does it within the framework of the organization on the floor of the convention—or in the union hall—so long as he speaks his mind, this is a man that is functioning as a trade unionist."

The emphasis on unity reflected not only the desire to heal past divisions but the need to solidify the union's strength in the impending test against the giants of the electrical manufacturing industry.

Jennings said in his keynote that the union's past weakness in dealing with the electrical giants was mainly "due to the ability of the corporations to play union against union, conference board against conference board, local against local."

"Our negotiations of September 1966 are very, very different from any in the history of the IUE or GE or Westinghouse," he told the convention, adding:

"We now have a coordinated approach. We now have a sense of support, a sense of mutual trust on the part of unions working together in these negotiations that a few months back the so-called experts thought impossible."

In reviewing the past 17 months, the IUE president reported that membership had increased by nearly 50,000—from 270,000 to 315,000. While commenting that this rise reflects well on the vigor of the union, he cautioned the delegates to recognize the changing character of the industry.

Some of the major corporations with which the IUE deals now have work forces with blue collar workers in the minority and with white collar and professional and salaried workers in the majority, Jennings noted.

The proposed constitutional changes before the delegates are aimed mainly at reforming, tightening and clarifying the union's election machinery.

In his president's report, Jennings reviewed briefly the union inquiry which followed the 1964 election. He said a committee was named to draft recommendations for the consideration of delegates "to prevent future fraud." He listed the proposed changes as follows:

Ensure up-to-date membership lists, remove trustees from partisan action during elections, vest in the board of trustees exclusive authority to make decisions and establish a code of conduct to ensure fair elections, remove from any incumbent authority to interpret or make decisions regarding candidates' rights, guarantee each candidate one watcher for every ballot counter, provide full hearings for candidates and watchers on ballot challenges, provide full information to candidates on numbers of voters and ballots, require statements of reasons for denial of ballots to any local or substantial portion thereof, guarantee a recount when the difference in vote is less than two percent, guarantee a recount at the candidate's expense when requested for any other reason within 10 days after election results are announced.

GE Order Reversed By Appeals Court

New York—The U.S. Court of Appeals here reversed and vacated a lower court injunction ordering the General Electric Co. to bargain with a committee representing the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers which included members of other unions.

The three-member court panel emphasized it was acting on procedural grounds, not on the merits of the case, in sending the dispute back to the National Labor Relations Board.

An IUE spokesman said the union would seek prompt reversal of the action from the U.S. Supreme Court.

SIMULTANEOUS MESSAGES to 15 centers during current and future union negotiations with General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Corp. will be sent from Washington, D. C., on this TWX machine. In picture, Operator Kay Morse punches tape for Jerry Dale (left) of Auto Workers and Kenneth Fiester of AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations. Both are "on loan" to Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers' negotiating committee and other unions.

Rail Unions, Employers Agree on Pension Bill

Rail unions and management reached agreement on supplemental pensions for long-service employes and joined in asking Congress to amend the Railroad Retirement Act to put them into effect.

The pensions — on top of regular retirement benefits — would range from $45 a month for employes retiring with 25 years of service to $70 a month for those with 30 or more years of service.

They would be entirely employer-financed, in contrast to the regular retirement benefit which is funded through a payroll tax on both workers and employers.

Companion bills to put the program into effect have been introduced by Rep. Torbert H. Macdonald (D-Mass.) and Sen. Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.).

The Macdonald-Pell bill also includes another agreement reached by rail labor and management. It provides for a 7 percent increase in pensions paid to retired railroaders —comparable to that given persons retired under social security. It would be financed by a one-fourth of 1 per cent increase in the railroad retirement tax paid by workers and employers, effective next Jan. 1. The supplemental pensions would apply only to railroaders retiring after July 1, 1966 who are 65 or older.

The labor-industry agreement specified that the proposed supplemental pensions will be effective for five years, with a moratorium on interim changes through legislation or collective bargaining. After four years, both parties will enter into discussions on changes in the program.

The supplemental pensions will be financed by management contributions equal to two cents for each hour worked. Persons receiving supplemental pensions will not draw the 7 percent increase in regular pensions being provided for annuitants who did not receive the benefit of the 7 percent social security increase last year.

The new plan permits workers to shift from one railroad to another without loss of pension rights. It also protects their pension continuity if their railroad is reorganized or merged with another line.

UNITY AND DEMOCRACY within the union were stressed by Pres. Paul Jennings (speaking) in his keynote address to the 12th constitutional convention of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers held in Bal Harbour, Fla.

Bakery Union Presses Higher Goals for Locals

Chicago—Continued emphasis on organizing, collective bargaining and political action was mandated for the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers by the 750 delegates to the union's third convention.

The convention accepted an organizing committee recommendation that local unions set higher goals in organizing with the aid of local and international staff representatives until the ABC achieves its objective—complete organization of all workers within its jurisdiction.

The delegates also:

- Instructed union pension fund trustees to initiate studies that may give members vested pension rights after 15 years of service, and protection against loss of health, welfare and pension benefits because of strikes or plant closings.
- Approved contributions of $1,500 each to the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, AFL-CIO, and the Allied Kingsport Press Unions on strike against the Kingsport, Tenn., Press, the nation's largest book printing plant.

The AFL-CIO farm union recently won bargaining rights for 900 DiGiorgio Corp. field workers in Delano, Calif.

Two ABC unions—Locals 43 and 453—and the international union itself announced they will continue to supply bread to the Delano grape pickers as long as the need exists.

- Pledged a fight for the five-day 35-hour week for all bakery workers and the elimination of all Sunday, holiday and week-end work—an objective judged possible because of advanced technology and increased production.

Salaries Hiked

The convention voted new four-year terms for all officers except one—Board Member Robert E. Lynn of Philadelphia, who lost an election contest to Paul Turlish of the same city. Also it gave raises of $5,000 a year each to Pres. Daniel E. Conway, Sec.-Treas. Curtis R. Sims and Executive Vice Pres. John DeConcini—their first since 1962—and of $3,000 a year to Vice Presidents Joseph G. Kane, Peter Pointak, Russell B. Prince, Amos W. Miller and Archie Goodman.

The delegates accepted an officers' report showing an increased surplus in the general fund; a rise of nearly 12,000 in good standing membership despite the loss of 5,802 jobs "wiped out" in plant closings; and contract improvements averaging 37 cents an hour.

They agreed to step up political education work in all locals after hearing COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan report that labor must intensify its support of pro-labor congressional candidates.

Sen. Paul Douglas (D-Ill.) told the convention that he is in a fight for political survival but that he intends to keep pressing for the repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act if re-elected.

The Poverty Chain

THE DIRECT LINK between the "pattern of poverty," lack of job skills, discrimination and unemployment has been firmly established in a government survey of the nation's 100 largest poverty areas.

The Labor Dept. reported, in releasing the August employment figures, that earlier in the year a study of these poverty areas showed jobless rates about twice as high as for non-poverty sections.

The study came up with hard evidence that inadequate education and training bore down heavily on both whites and Negroes with the added factor of discrimination increasing the burden on the Negroes.

The poverty centers in 100 large cities show Negroes in far greater numbers than warranted by their percentage of the population. There are 12 million Americans who live in these areas, representing a labor force of 6.5 million of whom 45 percent are Negro, although Negroes represent only about 12 percent of the population.

WHILE THE JOBLESS rates in the poverty areas are about twice as high as for non-poverty sections, the difference grows even wider for the Negro. In March 1966 the Negro unemployment rate in the poverty sections was 9.4 percent compared to 3.8 percent in non-poverty locations. The rate of unemployment for Negro boys was 31 percent and for Negro girls 46 percent.

Negroes in the poverty areas hold the unskilled or semi-skilled jobs while in other parts of the country there is need of workers with skills and training. In the poverty areas only 18 percent of Negroes had white collar jobs, 49 percent had blue collar jobs and 34 percent low-wage service jobs.

Within the poverty areas the Negroes suffered in comparison with their white neighbors. The white workers held only 14 percent of the service jobs and 35 percent of the white collar jobs.

THE ABOVE figures point up the August job statistics showing that Negroes and unskilled workers generally are not sharing in the employment gains made during the past year. In fact, over the past four months the rate of unemployment for these groups has been increasing.

One of the results is to knock out the optimistic prediction of Labor Dept. experts earlier in the year that the unemployment rate would drop to 3.5 percent by the end of 1966. The rate has remained fairly constant at the 4 percent level for the past eight months.

The basic problem, however, is to couple programs of increased education and training with higher minimum wages and greater job opportunities—to provide those in the poverty areas with a decent minimum standard of living. That means good jobs at good wages in a growing economy.

Labor-Negro Alliance Sought By Mississippi Union Leader

The following is excerpted from an address by Claude Ramsey, president of the Mississippi AFL-CIO, to an institute in history at the University of Mississippi.

IN A NEGATIVE sort of way, the Negro has dominated Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of running for or against issues affecting the economic welfare of the people, most candidates have been elected on their ability to use the race issue. The reason for this of course centers around the fact that very few Negroes were allowed to use the ballot. For years we had the most stringent voter qualification laws of any state in the nation. These laws, supposedly, were designed to keep the Negro from voting. In actuality, they kept the number of qualified voters down to a bare minimum.

Without question, the system of government in these United States is the best yet devised by man. While our two major political parties leave much to be desired, their very existence has brought stability to our government down through the years. In reviewing the political history of our state, it is necessary in my opinion to acknowledge that many of our present day problems stem from the absence of a two-party system.

This began in 1890 when James K. Vardaman first established the "Closed Society." Vardaman's ideas were actually a closed political system that excluded Negroes from the polling place and at the same time eliminated the Republican Party from the state. For 70 years Vardaman's ideas prevailed. They prevailed, in large part, because the Republican Party was Lincoln's party and any one who even thought about voting Republican was branded as a traitor to the state and to the South.

During Franklin D. Roosevelt's second term, cracks began to appear in the one-party Democratic South. When Roosevelt was first elected in 1932, he received a vast majority of the southern vote, including those in Mississippi. The same thing occurred four years later but at the end of his second term, voices of dissent were beginning to be heard. The reason for this dissent was simple. Roosevelt was showing concern for the plight of the American Negro. Harry Truman continued Roosevelt's policies when he took over after FDR's death in 1945 and, as a result, Mississippi and several other states bolted the Democratic Party in 1948. As we all know the third party movement of that year was designed to prevent Truman's election. The people behind this movement felt Truman had to have the South to win. He proved them wrong and things have never been the same since.

THE GUBERNATORIAL ELECTION in 1964 marked the end to a one-party system in the State of Mississippi. Rubel Phillips may never be governor of this state but I predict he will have a place in Mississippi history. When Phillips received almost 40 percent of the vote in that election, he assured a two-party system in our state from that point on. The Goldwater vote in the presidential election further established this fact. After generations of voting the straight Democratic ticket, no matter who the candidate, the people of this state finally decided they could vote Republican without becoming contaminated.

My major concern at this time centers around the fact that we are now in danger of becoming a one-party Republican state. As I view the situation, organized labor and the newly enfranchised Negroes are the only forces around to prevent it from happening.

As already stated, the Negro has played a negative role in Mississippi politics for many years. Instead of a negative role, he will be playing a positive one in the near future. We in the AFL-CIO intend to see that he does play a positive role.

Twenty-six counties in Mississippi have a Negro population majority. Many of labor's worst enemies in the Mississippi Legislature live in these counties. We have very few members residing in these counties; if these people are removed from office, it will have to be done with the Negro vote. To a large degree our legislative program is dependent upon our ability to form political alliances with these people. This we are trying to do. The enemies of the labor movement in this state know this and are working overtime to keep it from coming about. These enemies can be found in both the white and Negro communities.

For years we have been doing battle with the "radical right" in this state. Today we are faced with a similar problem from the "radical left" that has attached itself to the Negro community. We intend to meet this challenge also. The AFL-CIO has always resisted any group or element that would subvert our system of government. We intend to continue that policy in Mississippi.

Peking's 'Cultural Revolution' Knocks On Gates of Hong Kong

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

HONG KONG: This correspondent has became a bona fide China watcher third class and can report first hand as a naked eye-witness, so to speak, that the tangible evidence of Peking's "cultural revolution" has reached the very frontier of Hong Kong itself.

Morgan

China watchers first class never go near the border. They stay in offices on the steep hillsides above the harbor of this exotic city barricaded behind reams of Communist newspapers, proclamations, dreary but significant texts of speeches by leaders of the Mao Tse-tung regime, miscellaneous intelligence reports and other data which they hungrily attack as if it all were some gargantuan banquet of printed matter.

This material they devour, digest and then politely, behind closed doors, regurgitate scholarly and often astonishingly accurate analyses of what the rulers of 750 million people comprising the world's most populous nation are doing.

A China watcher third class, impatient, unschooled but eager to learn, simply walks up to the boundary of the Chinese People's Republic with the carefully bestowed permission of the authorities of this British Crown Colony and looks. It is not the kind of research that will earn a doctor's degree but it is fascinating.

The border point of this side is just a tiny railway station called Lo Wu and a bridge over the Shumchun River on the mainland 20 miles from the Kowloon side of Hong Kong harbor.

To reach it you take a ferry from Hong Kong to Kowloon, drive over a paved road winding through breathtakingly beautiful semi-tropical mountain scenery that is strangely and confusingly reminiscent at once of both the terrain around Italy's Lake Como and a drive over the Pali from Honolulu to the windward side of Oahu Island.

Lagoons and reservoirs lie at the bottom of the lush vaulting greenery where a fisherman's settlement nestles in a curve of the bay. There on the flats are Hooverville type villages made of old boards and scraps of tin housing, largely, refugees from the mainland. High on a knoll to the southwest, over your shoulder, perches a British military observation post.

The road narrows, railway tracks appear and suddenly there ahead is Lo Wu Station, a low rectangular, unspectacular building, clean and freshly painted. It was trimly remodeled just six months ago and the Communists haven't matched its new spaciousness yet on their side. But what they have got is a beautiful red silk flag fluttering over their depot with one large and four smaller gold stars on it.

The Union Jack flies over Lo Wu, all right, but one British official is furious that it isn't silk because in the television films made when there are tense moments at this spot, such as the expulsion of the Roman Catholic nuns, the Chinese banner always waves more gracefully.

The competition between the open and the closed societies sometimes is reduced to odd but vivid little ripples. The fast morning train from Canton is due at 11 o'clock. In the short wait Hong Kong immigration officials obligingly point out the fresh evidence of the cultural revolution's encroachment to their doorstep. On the clean white wall of a barracks on a rise just across the river a new motto has blossomed in blood-red Chinese characters, and it says "Raise high the red banner of Mao Tse-tung."

A whistle sounds and down the track leading straight to the bridge comes the train, its locomotive puffing twin plumes of steam almost vertically from its nostrils, an iron dragon breathing fire as it emerges from a deceptively inviting tunnel of green leaves. The engine, too, sports something new above its red cowcatcher, an insignia in gold proclaiming it is a "Red Flag" engine. The train stops short of a bridge and the handful of passengers must walk across, clear quarantine, immigration and customs, then board the coaches for Kowloon.

PIGS AND PRODUCE are better off. A Hong Kong engine crosses over and hauls back the freight cars in which they are being imported for food. Ninety percent of the pork and about 50 percent of the vegetables consumed by the 3.8 million people living in Hong Kong come from Communist China, and so does a substantial amount of the colony's water. The two way passenger traffic includes Hong Kong residents, going to or from holiday visits with mainland relatives or friends, diplomats, trade mission, student and small tourist groups, people with Chinese passports but living in countries like Indonesia or Cambodia, and a maximum of 50 Chinese a day the Peking authorities allow to quit the country, many of them older folks.

There were no incidents to report. A few days ago there was a demonstration in Shumchun, the border village of China named for the river. Authorities at Lo Wu thought they spotted a few armbands of the Red Guards. A small band played, but interrupted itself on occasion as if, one witness suggested, nobody was sure whether or not the composer had been purged.

Day after day the Hong Kong and Chinese Communist sentries, the latter armed with submachine guns, stare at each other a few feet apart on the bridge at Lo Wu. I asked an official what they talked about. He was shocked. "Sir," he said, "they never speak."

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

WE ARE APPROACHING the end of the primary season and there is little evidence of a restlessness among the voters and a tendency to throw out incumbents—at least not in the intra-party contests. The campaign for the general election, of course, is just beginning.

The only notable Republican casualty has been Gov. Robert E. Smylie of Idaho, who was decisively defeated in a bid for renomination for a third consecutive term. Incumbent Democratic Sen. Ross Bass was beaten narrowly in Tennessee by Gov. Frank Clement, thus reversing the results of a 1964 primary.

Rep. Tom Murray, Democratic chairman of the House Civil Service Committee, lost out in Tennessee's 7th Congressional District primary. Rep. James H. Morrison, also a Democrat and Murray's prospective successor as committee chairman, was forced into a run-off primary, scheduled for Sept. 17, in Louisiana's 6th District.

Gov. Karl Rolvaag of Minnesota was denied endorsement for Democratic renomination by the party's state convention but is running in the Sept. 13 primary anyway.

This is about the end of the casualty list, actual or potential. Incumbents of both parties otherwise seem safely assured where they are seeking renomination in the dozen-plus primaries that remain.

Then the campaign will heat up, with issues becoming more clearly defined as the candidates meet in head-on battles, the Republicans seeking to recoup some of their losses from the 1964 disaster, the Democrats fighting to confirm their super-victory of two years ago.

The issues are already clear in some states such as California and the upper Rocky Mountain region, where Goldwater-type Republicans are challenging liberal Democrats. In Oregon Republican Gov. Mark O. Hatfield, once considered front-runner for a Senate seat, has found opposition to the President's Viet Nam policy a weakening element—and his Democratic rival, Rep. Robert B. Duncan, a very formidable campaigner.

What once appeared as a possibly strong Republican surge in the South, building on the victories of Goldwater leaders of 1964, has largely petered out. Only Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway of Georgia seems now to have a chance to win a southern governorship for the GOP—whereas a few months ago at least two other states were rated as possibles. Republicans are considered certain to lose some of the eight southern House seats they won in 1964.

As always in mid-term elections, the results on a national basis may depend on voter turnout. A small turnout generally means Republican gains; the Democrats benefit generally from the largest possible vote.

PRES. JOHNSON'S role is obviously to try to set the issues nationally—a harder thing to do when dozens of elections may depend on local controversies and personalities than when he is running himself.

Still he is already into a series of trips to various sections, although local candidates complain that his speeches have been excessively nonpartisan and he has been very courteous to Republican officeholders. That is the way he began campaigning in September 1964 before he stepped up the pressure in the month before the election.

The White House thinks that Democratic congressional candidates have an excellent affirmative campaign theme if they use it—the record of the 89th Congress, with its burst of energy in passing major social legislation such as school aid, medicare and poverty programs, its emphasis on comprehensive housing legislation and federal aid to the cities, plus almost completed action to raise the minimum wage and expand protection to millions of new workers.

What the Administration hopes for is to hold Democratic House losses so low that control of House rules and the timing of legislation cannot be reasserted by the ancient Republican-Southern Democratic conservative coalition.

As We See It:

Build on Gompers' Philosophy, Henning Urges Today's Unions

SAMUEL GOMPERS was the philosophical architect of today's American unionism, Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning observed on As We See It, AFL-CIO public service program heard on the American Broadcasting Co. national radio network.

Gompers built "the enduring vehicle of national unionism" against "primitive hostility by the capitalists," courts, press and even public opinion of 19th Century America, Henning declared.

He said Gompers opposed the formation of a labor party because of this hostility, which "would have been deepened by identity with political action on a separate basis," and also "because he believed that a labor party would be infiltrated by those who had no roots in trade unionism."

A further reason for Gompers' opposition to an American labor party, according to Henning, was that the United States, unlike Europe, "had no sense of class separation, no sense of class distinction. Social democracy, the expanding frontiers of American life, the lack of hereditary privilege all worked against the organization of American trade unionists into a labor party."

At the same time, the under secretary pointed out, Gompers believed that members of trade unions should have an active interest in politics.

HE SET the pattern for American labor's activities in world affairs, said Henning, as the man most responsible for the Intl. Labor Organization.

"He was most sensitive to the need for workers of all nations to protect the interests of working people of the world," Henning asserted.

Today's labor leaders must carry on in the Gompers tradition while responding to present needs, the under secretary said.

Gompers' task was largely that of "survival," he noted. "Today's task is more expansive, broader, more socially responsible. Today's leaders must respond to the questions of 1966, not of 1886."

JOHN F. HENNING, under secretary of labor (left), declared that modern unionism in its character, objectives and inspiration derives from Samuel Gompers, founder of the AFL. Henning was interviewed for the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC national radio network, by Harry W. Flannery.

Farm Union's Election Win Is Confirmed

San Francisco — Official returns have confirmed the victory of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee in the historic farm labor representation election held Aug. 30 at two farms of the giant DiGiorgio Corp.

Election officials announced that the UFWOC — representing the former National Farm Workers Association and the AFL-CIO Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee—polled 530 votes to 331 for the ousted Teamsters and 12 votes for no union in balloting for the unit made up of DiGiorgio field workers.

In a second, smaller unit representing truck drivers, helpers, and shed workers, the Teamsters polled 94 votes, the AFL-CIO unit 43, no union 7.

Arbitrators Sam Kagel and Ronald Haughton announced that all but 79 of 332 challenged votes were found to have been cast by ineligible voters. The remaining 79 were too few to affect the outcome and were not counted.

The farm labor vote, almost without precedent in recent agricultural unionism, capped the first year of a strike of grape pickers at DiGiorgio's Delano farm and other farm workers at its Borrego Springs operation.

The two striking unions merged and had recently been chartered by the AFL-CIO after cooperating closely through the long year of their strike. They joined forces in the contest against the Teamsters for the right to represent DiGiorgio workers.

FIRST RESULTS of the collective bargaining election for field workers at two major farms of the DiGiorgio Corp. in California were announced by a smiling Cesar Chavez, leader of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, as AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher stood by. The final tally showed 530 votes for the AFL-CIO to 331 for the Teamsters.

20,000 Texans Join Farm Worker March

AFL-CIO, who walked the last two days of the march, said:

"These campesinos (farm hands) are setting a good example for all working Texans who do not belong to a union—and only 10 percent of the work force does."

He added that "This new union of farm workers is going to be built by farm workers and for farm workers."

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, recently chartered by the AFL-CIO, is "the most significant event for organized labor in recent years," Eugene Nelson said.

Nelson, who served as a picket captain in the Delano, Calif., grape pickers strike, brought what he learned there to South Texas, where he organized the second UFWOC group in the country and then led 40 marchers for 56 days half way across Texas. He said:

"It's a cold and grotesque paradox that the people who produce the food—the vital substance—live under the worst conditions of any employe group in the country."

In the march of the farm workers toward Austin were two clergymen, the Rev. Antonio Gonzalez and the Rev. James Novarro.

From the podium the Rev. Novarro said "We were brought together by Divine Providence—how else could a Roman Catholic priest and a Baptist preacher have gotten together."

Father Gonzalez spoke with his mother and father, both migrant farm workers just returned from Michigan, on either side of him.

Cesar Chavez, a leader of the newly-chartered UFWOC, who helped direct the Delano grape strike, told the union members that the union had "taught the growers of California a few lessons in collective bargaining."

Most of the marchers returned to the Rio Grande Valley next day to continue their strike, leaving behind two men on the Capitol steps, one holding a metal religious cross and the other holding flags of America and Texas.

They, and alternates, were to remain there, silent each day, until the legislature passes a law setting a wage floor of $1.25 an hour for all the workers of Texas, including farm hands.

Mediators Impound Airline Ballots

The National Mediation Board impounded all ballots in an election among clerical employes of Pan American Airways and postponed a count pending completion of a Justice Dept. investigation of fraud charges brought by the Railway Clerks.

In the election, the expelled Teamsters sought to dump the clerks, who had advised members not to vote.

The investigation will cover a charge that forged letters were sent to 7,100 voters under the AFL-CIO letterhead and purportedly signed by Pres. George Meany, who called the letter a fraud. The charge creates a "serious doubt" of the election atmosphere, the NMB said.

collar workers, 2.0 percent for skilled craftsmen and 1.7 percent for married men.

For semiskilled blue collar workers the rate was 4.8 percent in August, compared to 4.2 percent four months earlier.

The rise in non-farm employment was concentrated in manufacturing and government, the department reported, and the manufacturing employment gains were in metal-using industries and transportation equipment.

Employment in contract construction increased less than seasonally due to a decline in construction, especially in private residential building. This has been tied to the sharp rise in interest rates.

The factory workweek in August was 41.3 hours, up two-tenths from July and August a year ago, but average hourly earnings of factory workers declined seasonally two cents to $2.69 and weekly earnings decreased slightly to $111.10, off 28 cents.

The total number of unemployed last month was 2,900,000 compared to 3,225,000 in July and 3,258,000 a year ago.

Labor Dept. statisticians indicated doubt that the unemployment rate would drop to 3.5 percent, as they had predicted by the end of the year. It has hovered around the 4 percent figure for eight months.

Safety Excuse Foreseen:

Union Warns Public On Car Price Hikes

Unless stopped by aroused public opinion, car manufacturers may use safety features added to new models as an excuse for "unwarranted" price boosts, Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther warned.

Reuther sounded the alarm in a letter to Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.), who led the fight for passage of auto safety legislation. He urged Ribicoff to seek Senate hearings to develop cost data on safety items to be incorporated in 1967 model cars.

"If past performance is any indication of the future," Reuther said, "the addition of these items will most certainly be used by the industry as an excuse to impose on car buyers price increases unwarranted by the additional costs."

He stressed that manufacturers "will be much less likely to charge unduly for the safety items if they know they risk raising the wrath of a well-informed public."

Reuther said that last year, when some previously optional safety items were made standard on 1966 models, "General Motors, Ford and Chrysler all raised prices by amounts far in excess of the true costs of the additional equipment."

He noted that GM had tried to claim a price cut because the $50 extra it charged was $6 less than the previous price of the items if installed as optional equipment.

"Obviously," Reuther pointed out, "the economies of mass production and assembly-line installation" are "very substantial." Thus the "token" reduction claimed by GM "was in reality a subterfuge" for a price hike.

Reuther quoted a study made by Rep. Charles A. Vanik (D-O.) which estimated that the cost to the manufacturer of safety equipment made standard on 1966 models was only $22 to $24 per car.

"On this basis," Reuther said, "the $6 per car price cut claimed by General Motors was in fact an out-and-out price increase of over $25 per car, enough to swell that corporation's already gigantic profits by an additional $100 million per year."

The UAW president declared it is "of the utmost importance that a repetition of the 1966 model price gouging be prevented in the current year." Reuther added:

"Car sales have already declined in comparison with last year, and another price hike would surely depress sales even further. At the same time higher car prices would add to the inflationary pressures to which the high-price, high-profit policies of the auto companies have already made a substantial contribution."

'Needless Frills'

It may even be possible, Reuther suggested, for manufacturers to absorb the entire cost of safety items by eliminating as standard features some of the "needless frills" car buyers have been forced to pay for.

Even if this did not cover the entire cost of a safer car, he added, "it does not follow that prices must be raised. By any reasonable test the prices now charged by the industry for its products are already too high."

The Big Three auto makers, he said, could have absorbed $100 extra in safety costs on every car in 1965 and still have earned returns on investment ranging from 14 to nearly 25 percent.

Labor Day Speakers Warn of Peril In Profits Inflation, Soaring Interest

American consumers," he maintained.

His proposals were:

● "Interest rates must be rolled back. This will require congressional action under the leadership of the President.

● "A big source of today's profit inflation is a capital goods boom resulting from a 7 percent tax credit for business—in effect, a subsidy for new business investment. It should be repealed. If there ever was a reason for this device, the reason no longer exists. On the contrary, this handout to business stokes the fires of inflation.

● "Consumer purchasing power —the foundation of the American economic system—must be improved. In the last year, there has been hardly any increase at all in the buying power of workers' take-home pay.

● "Pending improvements in minimum wages, unemployment compensation and other income-raising measures should promptly be enacted into law.

● "The concept of public investment in America at every level —education, the war on poverty, conservation, recreation, housing and all the rest—should be continued and expanded.

● "Finally, it must be recognized that free collective bargaining is the most effective instrument for insuring a proper balance between the economic inequities of labor and management."

Meany denounced the present inflation as "profit inflation" and renewed his attack on high interest rates, declaring they "are being translated into price boosts all along the line from the farmer, industrial producer and builder to the consumer."

Fattening profits and soaring interest rates also came under attack in nationwide Labor Day radio speeches by AFL-CIO Vice Presidents Walter P. Reuther, A. Philip Randolph and I. W. Abel.

Reuther, president of the Auto Workers, spoke over the National Broadcasting Co. network and declared that in a free society, "we cannot have a healthy expanding full employment economy with price stability unless we learn to share the fruits of developing technology between workers, stockholders and consumers."

Profits 'Excessive'

"Unfortunately, both workers and consumers are being shortchanged," he said, "because a disproportionately larger share of the increased productivity is being reflected in excessive corporate profits."

"Unjustified high prices" that have made possible a "tremendous increase of 81 percent" in profits since 1960, Reuther said, are the major cause of inflation.

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters, was heard on the American Broadcasting Co. network. He emphasized the interrelationship between organized labor and the civil rights movement.

He called the Negro-labor alliance "our strongest weapon against the coalition of reactionary Republicans and Dixiecrats who would deprive the Negro of his civil rights, who would drag organized labor back to the 19th Century and who would repeal social progress."

The "culprits" in the high cost-of-living situation are "the record profit-makers who refuse to share their prosperity with workers and consumers," Abel, president of the Steelworkers, charged in his talk over the Mutual radio network.

"The profitable companies could be granting wage increases and reducing prices and still make a handsome profit," he said. "Yet we are witnessing a concerted propaganda campaign by the nation's editorial writers and management to convince the American public that the increased cost of living is the result of union-negotiated wage increases.

"If the nation's press really wanted to do something constructive about inflation, it would go after the profiteers. The stark truth of the matter is that today's high prices are caused by the greedy refusal of the nation's biggest and richest corporations to share their good fortune with their workers and consumers."

Abel declared that the private enterprise system does not exist primarily to make more money for the owners of private industry and the bankers, "but so all people can participate equally in its benefits, share fairly in its profits and purchase goods and services at fair prices."

Johnson to Renew 14(b) Repeal Fight

Repeal of a law "that gives no one the right to work, that weakens union responsibility without strengthening individual liberty, that causes endless and useless dispute" is on the list of major recommendations that will go to the next Congress, Pres. Johnson told a Labor Day rally in Detroit sponsored by the Wayne County AFL-CIO.

"I don't need to tell you the name of that law," he added in an obvious reference to Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The President said he planned to ask Congress to repeal the section "not because we are poor losers, but because we know it is necessary to achieve what Justice Holmes called 'that equality of bargaining power from which freedom of contract begins.' "

The President's speech at the traditional Detroit Labor Day celebration highlighted a day on which organized workers attended rallies and picnics in many communities, assisted at Labor Day masses in Catholic churches across the country, and in a few instances staged the parades that once constituted the main feature of the day.

The Detroit rally, at Cobo Hall, was also a tribute to the late Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), who served as president of his Plumbers' local and as a member of the city's Board of Education before going to the Senate.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan, speaking for the federation and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., called for a continuation of McNamara's "practical and compassionate" approach to the nation's problems.

Better education, equal opportunity, full employment and medicare are among the causes McNamara devoted his life to, Keenan said. Congress, he suggested, greatly needs such "practical idealists."

McGuire Remembered

Longstanding tradition was observed when a delegation from the Camden (N.J.) AFL-CIO placed a wreath on the grave of Peter J. McGuire, founder of Labor Day, in Arlington Cemetery, Pennsauken.

In Pittsburgh, a Labor Day parade of 10,000 marched to the Civic Arena where Bishop John J. Wright gave the annual St. Joseph the Worker award of the Catholic diocese to Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers. It was the first such award to a person not of the Catholic faith.

Bishop Wright praised Abel and the union for their outstanding services to the community. Also he announced establishment of a diocesan human relations committee.

Johnson in Detroit discussed the economy at some length. He pointed out that stability and growth must go hand-in-hand and declared the Administration "will not succumb to the temptation of buying price stability at the expense of growth."

"We will not stop the economy in its tracks," he pledged. "We will not put men and machines out of work or cut off our effort to improve living standards and essential public services.

"That would be a shabby retreat from the challenges that face us, and the nation would suffer as it suffered in the late 1950s when that strategy was the policy in Washington.

"We learned then that a sluggish economy is a weak economy, unable to resist the disease of recurrent recession, and we learned that the first victims of a sluggish economy are the poor, the Negro, the farmer and the wage-earner."

The President called growth without stability a "mirage, for booms generate busts, and inflation gnaws at the pillars of prosperity." He pledged an all-out war on inflation, "a pickpocket . . . at work in our marketplaces," and declared labor wants and deserves "a growth of real wages—not just money wages."

He urged labor to exercise its responsibility by "keeping its wage demands within reason," and business by "reducing prices when costs fall, and raising prices only when cost increases genuinely threaten adequate profit margins."

In speeches at Racine and Sheboygan, Wis., AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller reviewed the record of the 89th Congress and observed that in its closing months it "is shying away from the spirit of progress it so bravely followed for so long."

"The members are human," he said. "They want to be re-elected, and they are a little startled at what they have done. They need to be reassured.

"Let us reassure them. Let us make it clear to them that the road to re-election is the road that leads forward, not the one that turns back."

Following the mass in Washington, Pres. J. C. Turner of the Greater Washington AFL-CIO laid a wreath at a statue of James Cardinal Gibbons, pioneer supporter of the worker's right to organize.

In Los Angeles, Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (D) and State Labor Commissioner Sigmund Arywitz were the principal speakers at the Catholic Labor Institute's Salute to Labor breakfast. Brown, candidate for re-election, has the overwhelming endorsement of labor in his contest with Actor Ronald Reagan.

In Baltimore 5,000 union members attended a rally at which Rep. Carlton E. Sickles, the labor-endorsed candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor, was the main speaker.

Rep. Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.), speaking at an AFL-CIO picnic at the Crown Point, Ind., Fairground, recalled some of the harsher times in the worker's past that organized labor has eased.

Meany Stresses U.S. Labor's Role As Supporter of Free Trade Unions

The AFL-CIO plays a "very important leadership role" in supporting free trade unions and exposing Communist unions as government fronts, Federation Pres. George Meany and other panelists agreed on the Georgetown Forum, broadcast from Washington, D. C., with tapes of the interview made available to some 300 radio stations around the country.

A second discussion along the same lines was televised for showing over NBC Channel 4 and educational TV Channel 26 in Washington.

Meany said American trade unions work with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the American Institute for Free Labor Development and labor movements in Latin America, Africa, Asia and Europe. The joint objective, he said, is "to maintain worker freedom" and encourage workers to "develop unions by which they can improve their own lot" and at the same time help develop "a good type of society in their own countries."

Communist propagandists try to confuse workers, Meany reported, by giving words like "trade union" and "people's democracy" a totally different meaning than in free lands.

"What they term a trade union," he observed, "does not represent the workers, it represents government."

Meany recalled a story in the Soviet newspaper Trud which in 1964 accused union officials of deviationism for wanting unions to have a voice in setting wages and production quotas.

"Production norms and wages, the article went on to say, are the province of the party and nobody else. In other words, the Communist Party decides what the wages are, what production they expect from each worker," Meany commented.

"The so-called union is concerned with absenteeism, and rewarding workers for keeping up production by perhaps allowing them to go to a state-owned vacation spot for a week."

Meany appeared on the program after returning from an ICFTU executive board meeting in Brussels, Belgium. Also present to discuss the subject "How American Unions Help Labor Abroad" were Dr. James D. Atkinson, Georgetown University professor of government; John Fisher, president of the Institute of American Strategy, and program Moderator Wallace Fanning.

Atkinson said he agrees with Meany that Communist lands say they have unions but "actually . . . their unions are used primarily to control the workers."

Inside the Soviet Union, Castro's Cuba and Red China, Dr. Atkinson commented, "there is no such thing as a right to strike. This simply doesn't exist."

Meany gave this summary of the AIFLD programs as an example of the federation's work with unionists of other countries:

"We bring to this country an average of 100 to 150 students each year who are trade unionists . . . and we give them a three-month course in the rudiments of basic trade unionism. At the same time they get a look at the type of society that we have here. Then we send them back to their own countries and support them" for nine months while they act as class instructors in organizing, collective bargaining, grievances, and free trade unionism.

AIFLD has a social projects division which, under contracts with the Agency for Intl. Development, builds housing for workers with U.S. unions guaranteeing the loan, Meany said.

Fanning reported that the World Marxist Review for March 1966 made a "bitter attack" on the AIFLD as an "imperialist" tool and demanded that Latin labor "combine legal and illegal work" and prepare instead for mass struggle.

Meany said American labor is interested in seeing that workers remain free to raise their standards of living and to maintain "our own freedom here at home."

Randolph Sees Despair In Cry of 'Black Power'

The cry for "black power" is an outcome of "frustration, disillusionment, disenchantment, because the civil rights revolution has about run its course," Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters declared in a nationwide radio and television broadcast.

"There are no great victories that the civil rights movement can now achieve," Randolph said. "Consequently, the great masses of the people who are now looking constantly for new victories are disillusioned and disappointed, and therefore you will have not only the cry for black power, but a cry for other methods of action to compensate their feeling, their inner longing for action.

"But I believe that we need more than black power. As a matter of fact, black power cannot achieve the objectives that the Negroes now need."

Randolph, an AFL-CIO vice president, called black power "an unhappy combination of words" with "overtones of black nationalism" carrying "the concept of salvation by racial isolation." It is a revival, he said, of what Marcus Garvey preached after World War I—to "go back to Africa, to buy black"—which Randolph himself fought and which Americans Negroes rejected.

In reply to questions, Randolph said that organized labor faces a problem in enabling the rank and file to understand what the Negro is fighting for—"a right of first-class citizenship."

He lauded the "effective job" organized labor has been doing in fighting for civil rights, but said it must convince the rank and file that as labor had to fight to win its objectives, so must the Negro.

"It is my hope that white America will realize," he said, "that history records no instance where people have been oppressed indefinitely without revolting and the revolt of the Negro today is inevitable."

Randolph appeared on the CBS program, Meet the Press. He was questioned by Daniel Schorr and George Herman of CBS News and Wallace Terry of Time-Life.

Labor Issues Handicapped Policy Guide

A new AFL-CIO guide called "Working Together" emphasizes organized labor's role in promoting employment of the handicapped including the mentally restored and the mentally retarded.

The document contains a 6-point statement of policy and sample contract clauses covering employment of the handicapped. Distribution is now being made to state federations and councils and to Governors' Committees on Employment of the Handicapped.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany states in the publication: "We look upon the handicapped worker just as we look upon any other group that suffers from prejudice, discrimination and inadequate opportunity. We want to help them win their full status as productive citizens."

The AFL-CIO has been a member of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped since 1955. Vice chairman of the President's Committee is Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The guide defines the handicapped as persons with physical or mental limitations but not necessarily job limitations. It also refers to the mentally restored as persons who were mentally or emotionally ill but who are now ready for work.

Single copies of "Working Together," AFL-CIO Publication No. 42, are available free from the federation's Pamphlet Division, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. In quantity lots the price is 10c a copy, $7.50 per hundred.

Measure Cleared to Senate:

House Kills GOP Bid For Wage Bill Delay

with the earlier effective date of the Senate measure.

Ayres, backed by Republican leaders, complained that the House Democratic conferees had "given in" too easily to the Senate timetable. The result, GOP speakers charged, would fuel inflation by jumping wages too rapidly.

In one of his rare appearances as a participant in a debate, Speaker John W. McCormack stepped down from his role as presiding officer to make an eloquent appeal for approval of the report.

He reminded the House that he was one of the few members in Congress when the original 25-cents-an-hour minimum wage bill was passed in 1938.

"We are dealing with human beings," he stressed, "their hopes, their aspirations . . . their families." Rejecting the "inflation" argument, McCormack pointed out that the $1.60 wage floor amounts to only "$64 a week for the breadwinner of the family."

On the key vote, 165 Democrats and 18 Republicans voted against sending the bill back to conference; 101 Republicans and 62 Democrats voted for the Ayres motion.

With that hurdle out of the way, the House approved the conference report by a one-sided 259-89 vote.

The bill would raise the wage floor for persons now covered by the $1.25 minimum to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967, and to $1.60 one year later.

Newly covered workers would begin next February with a $1-an-hour guarantee. The nearly 400,000 farm workers being covered for the first time would advance in two annual 15-cent steps to $1.30. All other newly-covered workers would move up 15 cents a year until they caught up with the $1.60 rate.

Major breakthroughs in coverage include extension to 1.5 million retail employes, 1.47 million hospital workers, 700,000 employed by restaurants, hotels and motels, 581,000 in construction, 900,000 non-teaching school employes, 500,000 laundry workers, 685,000 employed by the federal government including low-paid workers in military post exchanges and Panamanians working in the Canal Zone, and large numbers of taxi drivers, agricultural processing workers, employes of non-profit organizations and transit workers.

Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), House floor manager for the bill, described the extension of coverage as "the greatest advance in the history of minimum wage bills."

In answer to the GOP "inflation" argument, he read a letter from the President's Council of Economic Advisers declaring that the bill "will benefit the welfare of the nation." The council said the bill clearly falls within the exception to the wage "guidepost" allowed "where wages are particularly low . . . and therefore should move up at a more rapid pace."

House Balks at Rollback Of Bank Interest Rates

The House voted to give the Federal Reserve Board greater "flexibility" to set ceilings on soaring bank interest rates after rejecting a labor-supported bill which would have rolled back the interest rate on time deposits.

House Banking Committee Chairman Wright Patman (D-Tex.), who lost his bid to set a mandatory 4.5 percent ceiling on time desposits, described the substitute language as "weak as stumpwater."

The AFL-CIO Executive Council had called for a rollback of interest rates, which have climbed by one-third over the past nine months. The tight money squeeze has resulted in a sharp dropoff in construction, the unavailability of government-subsidized college education loans in many areas, and higher credit charges.

In a letter to congressmen before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller had termed passage of the Patman bill "an essential first step in the direction of reducing dangerously high interest rates."

In other congressional developments:

● The Senate again was frustrated by its own rules of unlimited debate as a southern-led minority filibustered the House-passed civil rights bill.

Two previous civil rights filibusters had been broken with support from Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. But this time Dirksen is fighting the fair housing section, despite the fact that a House compromise exempts individual home sales from coverage.

● A $3.5 billion foreign aid authorization bill was sent to the White House. The money must still be appropriated. And a House Appropriations subcommittee immediately chopped $265 million from the amount authorized to be spent.

● Pres. Johnson hailed enactment of funds to get the rent supplement program in full operation. He described the program as "the single most important breakthrough in the history of public housing" and said he had never signed a bill that gave him "greater satisfaction."

The federal government will pay part of the rent for poor families to live in decent housing. Some 53,000 families at income levels eligible for public housing will pay one-fourth of their income for rent. The government will pay the balance. Rent would be paid only on housing sponsored by non-profit organizations or limited dividend corporations.

Prouty Appointed To CWA Post

The appointment of Keith Prouty of Akron, O., as development and research director of the Communications Workers of America, effective Oct. 15, was announced by CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne.

Prouty has been research director for the Rubber Workers since 1963. He will work directly with Beirne in the newly-created CWA department.

Prouty has a bachelor of arts degree in economics from Dartmouth College and a master of arts degree from Yale University. He is a member of the Akron Mayor's Committee on Fair Housing Contact Service and is a director of the Ohio Council on Economic Education.

N.Y. Contest Pits O'Connor Vs. Rockefeller

The New York State Democratic convention nominated Frank D. O'Connor for governor to run against incumbent Nelson A. Rockefeller, renominated for a third term by the GOP State convention.

The Liberal Party was expected to nominate Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., as this issue of the AFL-CIO News went to press. Roosevelt announced that he would accept. The Conservative Party chose a Wesleyan College dean, Paul Adams, as its nominee in what thus becomes a four-man race, with Adams viewed as a minor factor.

O'Connor, president of the New York City Council, was an easy first-ballot victor against his only opponent, Howard Samuels, who interrupted the rollcall to move to make the vote unanimous.

Other Primaries

In primary elections two Democratic governors, Harold E. Hughes in Iowa and Grant Sawyer in Nevada, won renomination for third terms, Hughes without opposition.

Nevada Republicans nominated Lt. Gov. Paul Laxalt, who is expected to be a serious contender against Sawyer. Iowa Republicans chose William G. Murray, an Iowa State University economist who was given a close battle by Robert K. Beck, to challenge Hughes.

Also in Iowa, Democrats nominated a university historian, E. B. Smith, to face incumbent Republican Sen. Jack Miller in November. All seven House members — six Democrats and one Republican — were renominated without opposition. In three districts GOP former representatives upset in the 1964 Democratic landslide were nominated to try to reverse the results.

A major liberal effort to oust veteran Rep. Walter S. Baring failed in Nevada's only Democratic congressional primary when he narrowly defeated Ralph Denton for the second straight time. Republicans nominated a Las Vegas engineer, Ralph Kostelac, but Baring, a conservative who votes against most Administration measures, is heavily favored to win an eighth term.

In North Dakota's only significant primary, Republicans nominated the organization choice, former Bismarck Mayor Thomas S. Kleppe, by a 2-1 margin over a John Birch Society member, Martin Vaaler. The Democratic nominee is incumbent Rep. Rolland Redlin, one of the freshmen elected in 1964 in the party's landslide.

tion because it reflects increased worker productivity, he declared.

"This is the best contract ever negotiated in the communications industry," said Beirne, who has headed the union since 1948.

"With these wage increases, the cost of telephone service could still be reduced," he added, noting that the Bell System is highly profitable.

The old contract, due to expire July 28, was extended on a day-to-day basis. The new pact provides:

● Retroactivity to the scheduled expiration date—a nearly unique feature in Bell contracts, according to the union announcement.

● Reduction of group life insurance payments by employes and an offer of additional insurance at low rates.

● An increase in management payments toward the cost of health insurance from 50 percent to 75 percent.

● A cut in the amount deducted from pensions for social security benefits from one third to one-fourth beginning next Apr. 1.

● Four-week vacations after 20 years of service.

Other benefits include reclassification for some workers at higher rates, and improvements in Bell's sick leave system, inclement weather regulations, and per diem payments for certain classes of workers.

Western Electric negotiations began June 28. Talks with other Bell companies are scheduled to start Sept. 12 at Dayton, O., Sept. 15 for Illinois Bell and Sept. 20 for Michigan Bell, according to Beirne.

Labor Hits Profiteering Under Medicare Plan

Higher medicare payments to profit-making nursing homes and hospitals would be unjustified and could inflate the cost of the entire medicare program, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned.

Meany wrote Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner that labor opposes revising the medicare reimbursement formula so as to favor profit-making institutions over public and non-profit facilities.

A proposal to include part of the cost of capital expansion in payment to nursing homes and hospitals is under study by the department.

"A profit-making hospital or nursing home should, like any other profit-making institution, finance growth and development out of profits and borrowed capital," Meany said, "and not expect the medicare program to finance its capital requirements."

Meany cautioned Gardner that an unnecessarily high payment to health institutions could raise the costs of medicare above estimates, "require additional increases in the social security tax and delay much-needed improvements in the medicare program."

The AFL-CIO president agreed that "there is a need for greater funds to modernize and construct more of these facilities." But he said that "this worthwhile goal should be accomplished through other programs."

Meany suggested "as a first step" the "rapid expansion of the Hill-Burton program as well as additional federal legislation to assist in the modernization and construction of public and nonprofit hospitals and nursing homes."

Commenting that "the greatest single barrier to adequate health care is cost," Meany said that if there is any revision of the reimbursement formula in favor of profit-making institutions, "it should have a minimum impact on the cost structure of the program."

Meany Hails New Wage Bill As 'Potent' Poverty Weapon

Majority Falls Short:

Senate Rights Bill Loses Cloture Test

A solid majority of the Senate demonstrated its support of the House-passed civil rights bill—including a compromise "open housing" provision. But the majority fell short of the two-thirds vote needed to limit debate and break a filibuster against the bill.

The first cloture test found 42 Democrats and 12 Republicans voting to halt the filibuster. Voting to let the filibuster continue— and thus kill the legislation—were 21 Democrats and 21 Republicans.

A second cloture vote is scheduled for Sept. 19. If it again falls short of two-thirds, Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield may set aside the bill and go on to other legislation.

The legislative picture was almost a carbon copy of last February's effort to repeal the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. On both issues, a Republican-southern Democratic minority kept the Senate's majority from even voting on the routine motion to take up the bill. In both cases, Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen exercised what amounted to a veto power over the Senate majority.

Dirksen's support of cloture made possible passage of the 1964 Civil Rights Act and last year's Voting Rights Act. This year, however, he has complained of the "conduct" of Negro demonstrators, has gleefully sung "no, no, a thousand times no" to reporters who asked him if he might relax his opposition, and has mockingly pointed to "white backlash" votes in Maryland's gubernatorial primary as evidence of voter opposition to further civil rights legislation.

Dirksen revealed that Pres. Johnson had sought to persuade him to change his mind during a 90-minute meeting at the White House, but he said he told the President, "I will not retreat."

Dirksen said the bill "ought to be shelved" for this session. The legislation, he claimed, interferes with private property rights.

Sen. Philip A. Hart (D.-Mich.), floor manager for the civil rights bill, rejected Dirksen's argument that passage of the legislation would backfire politically on its supporters.

A senator, he said, "should adopt the principle of doing what he thinks is right, whether there is political jeopardy or not."

Hart branded as "pure and simple racism" the position that "some Negroes have rioted and therefore all should be denied rights."

It is not "because of riots" that the bill should be passed, Hart said, but because the legislation is needed and desirable "in spite of them."

Right-to-Vote

The issue before the Senate, he reminded his colleagues, was not the bill itself but whether the Senate should be permitted to take up and vote on the bill.

With the hard core of southerners opposed to the bill, about 20 Republican votes are needed to reach the two-thirds majority. Senators Jacob Javits (R.-N.Y.) and Thomas H. Kuchel (R.-Calif.) were able to round up only half that number in the face of Dirksen's opposition.

In other congressional developments:

- Opponents of the truth-in-packaging bill pulled off a coup in the House Commerce Committee by catching supporters off-guard.

LABOR must rally behind COPE and work actively at the polls for endorsed candidates in 1966, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany tells the Stereotypers at their 63rd annual convention. If the ranks of congressional liberals are thinned, Meany warned, the next session of Congress could enact new legislation hostile toward unions. (Story Page 2.)

Measure Cleared to President

By David L. Perlman

The new minimum wage law will prove America's "most potent single weapon in the war on poverty," AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany predicted.

As sent to the White House for Pres. Johnson's certain approval the bill raises the minimum wage in steps to $1.60 an hour and extends coverage to more than 8 million additional workers.

Included, for the first time in the history of the Fair Labor Standards Act, are some 390,000 farm workers who will begin with a $1 an hour guarantee, advancing in two steps to $1.30. (Details of bill, Page 10.)

While the minimum for farm workers is "not high enough" and the coverage is "not broad enough," their inclusion in the bill is "desperately needed breakthrough legislation," Meany said.

Overall, he said, the legislation is the "best" package of improvements ever made in the wage-hour law, a response to the "crying needs" of "workers receiving substandard wages."

The bill's last legislative hurdle was crossed when the Senate voted 55-38 to accept a conference report reconciling House and Senate versions of the measure.

As was the case in the House a week earlier, a hard core of Republicans and southern Democrats sought to upset the conference agreement and weaken the measure.

Their ostensible goal was to gain acceptance of two Senate provisions dropped by the conferees—permitting farm owners to pay less than the minimum wage to some piece-rate harvest workers, and cutting

Labor Backs Suspension:

Business Tax Credit Hit as 'Gravy Train'

Industry and business have been riding a "gravy train" arising from special tax subsidies, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger told Congress in backing Pres. Johnson's proposal for suspension of the subsidies.

The 7 percent investment tax credit for equipment and machine outlays and a fast depreciation schedule for new plants and structures have pushed up corporate profits in a one-sector capital goods boom, Goldfinger said in testimony prepared for the House Ways & Means Committee.

Accompanied by Federation Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, Goldfinger pointed out that corporate profits "soared 52 percent before taxes and 67 percent after taxes" in the 1960-65 period and that between the first half of 1965 and the same period this year, "profits rose an additional 11 percent both before and after taxes."

In contrast, "auto sales have declined, home-building has dropped sharply, the buying power of take-home pay of most workers has hardly increased in the past year."

The Federal Reserve Board "has pushed up interest rates to the highest levels since the 1920s" in "a vain attempt to curb the capital goods boom," he continued, making the 33⅓ percent rise in the prime interest rate the sharpest increase in any section of the economy since last December.

But the high and rising interest rates are "pushing residential construction into a depression," Goldfinger said.

"They are boosting the cost of living. They are making it both more expensive and more difficult for

Party Slates Shape Up For November Election

By Willard Shelton

The election lineups were largely settled Sept. 13 and Sept. 14 as voters of 12 states went to the polls in party primaries.

Incumbent Democratic Gov. Karl Rolvaag won renomination over Lt. Gov. A. M. Keith in Minnesota despite the fact that Keith had been the victor in a Democratic-Farmer Labor Party endorsement convention.

In Massachusetts former Atty.-Gen. Edward P. McCormack, a nephew of House Speaker John P. McCormack, defeated Kenneth O'Donnell, an aide to the late Pres. Kennedy, for Democratic nomination as governor.

A "white backlash" factor was apparently strong in Maryland, where George P. Mahoney, a perennial candidate, campaigned frankly in the Democratic primary for governor against "open occupancy" legislation, but the liberal Rep. Carlton Sickles steadily chopped into Mahoney's early narrow lead on the basis of complete unofficial returns and the absentee-ballot

Unions Study Offer By General Electric

New York—The General Electric Co. offered its 115,000 union-represented employes a wage and fringe-benefit package which union spokesmen called an encouraging "step in the right direction" but with some "glaring inadequacies."

The offer was for new three-year contracts providing successive yearly wage increases of 4, 3 and 3 percent; two additional increases of 3 cents an hour each in 1967 and 1968 as a cost-of-living supplement; an inequity adjustment of 1 to 10 cents an hour for skilled trades workers; and improvements in pensions, insurance coverage, health benefits, vacations, holidays and job security.

GE made the offer to a "mixed committee" made up of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and 10 other unions. It gave identical offers to these and other unions that bargain locally with plant managements around the country.

The offer, first by GE since the IUE submitted proposals in August, was on economic items only, with additional proposals on union secur-

Stereotypers' Delegates Weigh Plan To Form New Graphic Arts Union

By Eugene A. Kelly

A proposal to form a new Graphic Arts Intl. Union through merger with the Lithographers and Photoengravers dominated discussion as the Stereotypers opened their 63rd annual convention in Washington.

Delegates from more than 80 local unions debated whether to send the proposal to a referendum.

The union's two top officers signed a tentative merger agreement with the LPIU Aug. 4, subject to convention and membership action. The agreement, if approved by the convention, then requires a two-thirds vote of acceptance by members. After that the merging unions would draft a new constitution and submit it for another vote.

In other convention business, delegates heard the officers report that membership declined slightly in the last year as jobs were lost because of automation and new processes, but that the union remains in healthy financial condition.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a major speech called on the union to "pay more attention to COPE" and to work actively at the polls for "people who understand labor's problems and are sympathetic."

Seconding Meany's advice to be politically active, Stereotypers Pres. James H. Sampson noted that the union has for 12 consecutive years achieved a 100 percent rating in COPE's drive for voluntary dollar donations.

"You don't get favorable action on legislation unless you get people who understand labor's problems," said Meany. "That must be done at the local level, with the help of COPE and your international union."

The federation president said that in general, a "little more cooperation" in collective bargaining by newspaper unions would be helpful because "united action is always better than individual action."

That is why the AFL and CIO joined forces in 1955, said Meany, adding "strange as it may seem, there is more harmony in the AFL-CIO today" than there was in separate parts of the labor movement before merger.

The obstacles that labor faces today are not new, he observed. Times have changed from the days of company police and sheriffs, spies infiltrating unions and strikebreakers kept on company payrolls, he said, but unchanged is the determination of many employers to thwart the collective bargaining process.

Labor believes strongly, Meany continued, that "what keeps the economy going is the amount of mass purchasing power in the hands of the workers."

Discussing the recent election victory of California grape pickers on two farms of the DiGiorgio Corp., Meany said the AFL-CIO has since 1959 spent more than $1.5 million to organize agricultural workers. It will continue to help in that field and in strengthening minimum wage scales for this reason: "Whatever adds to the purchasing power of workers and brings them into the market as purchasers is good for our members, and for the country as a whole."

The AFL-CIO president reviewed the recent strike of airlines Machinists. Declaring that "there never was a strike with more justification," he recalled that one U.S. senator referred to the strikers as "rapacious" and called for controls by way of anti-strike legislation.

"We're going to hear more on that subject," he said, adding that labor will "continue to fight for the right to strike." Without that right, he declared, "you are helpless."

'Productive' Congress

In other respects the record of Congress in the past two years has been "most productive," Meany said, citing the educational aid bills alone as "standouts." He said they put the nation "well on the way" to an educational system in which any young person may get all the education he can assimilate "without regard to economic circumstances."

Other convention speakers included Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders; Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; Executive Dir. Henry C. Gronkiewicz of the Washington Publishers Association; Pres. L. C. Shomo of the National Publishing Co. division of McCall Corp., and Vice Pres. Walter Risden of the recently merged Lithographers & Photoengravers stressed the benefits of merger.

Simkin Hails Record Of Peaceful Settlements

A record 150 labor-management disputes were settled by federal mediators during each week of the fiscal year that ended last June 30, Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service reported.

On the average, 35 of the agreements ended strikes, he said, and 115 were reached with neither strike nor lockout. Peace was achieved through a weekly average of 582 conferences with union and management representatives, he said, noting they were held in addition to many times that number in other pending cases.

The agency had a staff at the end of June of 258 mediators in 77 industrial communities. Each of them, Simkin said in his review, was handling an average of 20 disputes.

"The fact that so many settlements are reached without work stoppages is a tribute to unions and management," Simkin asserted, "and warrants confidence in the institution of collective bargaining.

"This too often tends to be ignored at time of widespread preoccupation with some particularly annoying dispute. The over-all record needs to be emphasized in the interest of proper perspective."

Other highlights of the summary:

- Federal mediators helped in a record 7,836 settlements, or 5.2 percent more than in fiscal 1965.
- In an additional 11,348 bargaining disputes, mediators assisted to a lesser extent.
- In nine out of 10 of the disputes assigned to mediators (17,123 out of 19,184), settlements were reached without strikes; in the remaining 2,061 cases, the duration of stoppages was limited with the aid of mediators.
- In eight of every 10 cases where strike deadlines were postponed at the request of a mediator, settlement was ultimately reached without a strike.
- The FMCS received a record 5,654 requests that it name panels of arbitrators, an increase of 12 percent over the previous year.

Labor Board Member For Ontario Dies

Toronto, Ont.—G. Russell Harvey, veteran trade unionist and a member of the Ontario Labor Relations Board since its inception in 1944, died at his home here after a short illness. He was 63.

He had been president of the Toronto Photo Engravers Union from 1940 to 1942, Canadian organization director for the former AFL, Ontario organization director for the Canadian Labor Congress and, at the time of his death, was Canadian representative for the Office & Professional Employes.

Burdon Withdraws:

Bommarito Heads Rubber Workers

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Peter Bommarito was swept into the presidency of the Rubber Workers by a near-unanimous vote of delegates to the union's 25th convention here.

Incumbent Pres. George Burdon, who had served three two-year terms, declined nomination and told the convention he was stepping down "in order to bring about complete harmony and complete unity within this organization."

The popular Bommarito, a 51-year-old ex-tire builder from Detroit, had been vice president since 1960. His election by acclamation of the record 777 delegates was blocked by objection of one delegate.

Kenneth Oldham, 52-year-old director of the URW Pension & Insurance dept. and former president of a big Goodrich local, was elected vice president. Ike Gold, 55 and secretary-treasurer since 1960, was re-elected. Both were chosen by acclamation.

The URW, fiercely militant since its members introduced the sitdown strike in 1936, opened its convention on the union's 31st birthday in a restive mood.

Last June, Bommarito and Gold announced their candidacies with a proposed "program for progress and expansion" of the 172,000-member union.

They promised to seek a guaranteed annual wage, a cost-of-living clause, increased pensions and organization of white collar workers.

The URW's contracts with the big five rubber companies, covering some 70,000 members, expire next April.

Burdon had come under attack during his last term on union internal matters. He was sustained by the executive board but the convention delegates overruled the board before proceding to the election of new officers.

CabaretUnions Win Fight on Fingerprinting

New York—A successful union drive—against the city's practice of fingerprinting cabaret and night club employes and entertainers will be followed by another concerted effort—this time against the idenity card that the city requires 17,000 such persons to obtain.

Abolition of the fingerprinting rule had been urged by the New York City AFL-CIO in a resolution approved in June and read before the city council in July. While the council was considering action, Mayor John V. Lindsay (R) directed the city license commissioner to drop the fingerprinting rule and review the licensing laws.

Pres. Max Aarons of Musicians Local 802, active in the campaign of entertainment and service unions against fingerprinting, said "there is no more reason for an ID card in night clubs and cabarets than there is for fingerprinting and there never was any good reason for that."

Aarons said the drive was spearheaded by his union and others including the Waiters, Bartenders, Actors Equity and Variety Artists.

The fingerprint rule was adopted in the 1940s ostensibly to keep out "undesirable elements" which sprang up in the prohibition era, but was enforced against employes and entertainers only, according to union sources.

Canadian Unions Adopt Coordinated Approach

Ottawa, Ont.—Five unions affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress have agreed to coordinate their contract negotiations with the Canadian General Electric Co. and subsidiary companies, CLC Pres. Claude Jodoin announced.

The agreement follows the same approach as the program launched by unions that bargain with GE for employes in U.S. plants.

Jodoin said the development is an unprecedented step for Canada and one he hopes will provide a "practical example" to other unions.

"Workers join unions because they have found that together they can accomplish a great deal that would be impossible individually," he said. "It seems only common sense that unions with a common interest can by working together accomplish a great deal more than by bargaining separately."

The CLC is "solidly behind" the unions and will assist them in any way possible, Jodoin declared. The unions preparing to negotiate with GE are the Technical Engineers, Machinists, Molders, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

The unions established a steering committee under the chairmanship of IAM Vice Pres. Mike Rygus and met Sept. 10 to review contract proposals. They agreed to maintain close coordination while negotiations continue, with each union free to seek particular contract requirements besides broad general objectives.

The plants involved are those of Canadian GE at Peterborough, Toronto, Guelph, Cobourg, Oakville and St. Andrews; Montreal Armature Works, Ltd.; Amalgamated Engineering Corp., Markham, Ont.; and Dominion Engineering Works, Lachine, Que.

Medical Group Lab Staff Picks Retail Clerks

Hollywood, Calif. — Laboratory technologists employed in five Kaiser Foundation hospitals and 15 clinical laboratories have authorized Retail Clerks Local 770 to represent them in collective bargaining.

Formed as the Laboratory Technologists Guild of Southern California, the new group will seek professional recognition and a contract with "adequate" salary increases and other benefits.

A bachelor of science degree and one year of training in a recognized laboratory are required before the workers may take a state board examination. All the laboratories involved are operated by the Southern California Permanente Medical Group but others among the state's 10,000 technologists have shown interest in joint action, the union said.

Convention Approves Levy:

IUE Backs Contract Goals With 'Showdown' Assessment

By Robert B. Cooney

Bal Harbour—The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers adjourned the union's biennial convention after mobilizing its resources for the coordinated bargaining showdown with General Electric and Westinghouse.

The 609 delegates overwhelmingly approved an assessment of 50 cents per member per week to repay the millions of dollars in strike support already pledged by other unions. The IUE assessment, still to be ratified by local unions, would take effect only if a strike occurs. The IUE contracts expire in early October.

The confrontation with the electrical giants also will be the first major test of the new tool of "coordinated bargaining." All told, 11 AFL-CIO unions with 120,000 members at GE and 80,000 at Westinghouse have united to fashion coordinated bargaining goals. The IUE has 80,000 members at GE and 40,000 at Westinghouse.

"The IUE is determined," declared the assessment resolution, "that in the year 1966, negotiations with the General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Electric Corp. must be meaningful; they must be real; they must be more substance than form; they must produce the benefits to which our members are entitled."

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings told a press conference that the unity and strength developed at the convention were not aimed at a strike as a goal, but rather would back up "the absolute commitment to get honest bargaining."

Wage Policy Adopted

"If we get bargaining, then there will be no strike," Jennings declared.

In the wage policy adopted by the delegates, the IUE is pledged to seek "where appropriate, a one-shot catch-up increase to compensate for past shortfall."

The four-point wage policy also calls for annual improvement factor increases based on increased productivity, an end to geographical wage differentials, and a cost-of-living escalator to provide at least a one-half of 1 percent rise in earnings for each one-half of 1 percent rise in living costs.

In calculating the "shortfall" the IUE is seeking to overcome, the union compared the economic packages won in other industries with those at General Electric. Recent gains in steel, rubber, auto, aerospace, cans, aluminum and farm equipment and machinery were shown to be from 4.1 cents to 8.4 cents per year higher than at GE.

The GE worker's lag over the past six years ranged from 24.6 cents behind the rubber worker to 50.4 cents behind the auto worker.

A resolution on GE and Westinghouse negotiations pledged the IUE's full moral, organizational and financial support to the committee now negotiating with the electrical industry giants.

The delegates were told in a background paper that in electrical manufacturing, profits before taxes rose in six years from $2.1 billion to $3.6 billion and profits after taxes more than doubled, from $1 billion to $2.1 billion.

In the discussion on the need for a strike assessment Milton Weihrauch, president of District 3, reminded the delegates of the words spoken by a guest speaker, Cesar Chavez, who led successful grape-picker strikes in California:

"The people who pick the grapes ought to be able to drink the wine."

In a resolution growing out of the union's successful experience so far with coordinated bargaining, all IUE locals were urged to enter such arrangements wherever possible.

"A company that might have produced one product in one location 15 years ago might now produce a dozen different things in a dozen different plants," thus enabling the employer to play off one union against another, the resolution pointed out.

The IUE convention also took action in these other major problem areas:

Organizing—The delegates set the goal in the years immediately ahead of doubling the IUE's present membership and intensifying its efforts among the industry's professional, technical and salaried employes.

The IUE is now overwhelmingly a blue-collar union, operating in an industry whose workforce composition has become predominatly white-collar. Nevertheless, the union has grown by nearly 50,000 in the past 17 months to a total of 315,000.

Jennings' report to the delegates observed that, of 1.6 million employed in electrical manufacturing, at least 500,000 have no union representation.

Constitutional Changes—The delegates approved a number of changes intended to clarify and update the constitution and bring it into conformity with the Landrum-Griffin Act. The most extensive changes were designed to ensure that all elections within IUE are conducted "without manipulation or taint." For example, a candidate losing by 2 percent or less is guaranteed a recount on request at the union's expense.

Civil Rights—"Persons with jobs do not riot" declared a wide-ranging civil rights resolution. It called on labor, civil rights and liberal groups to join in winning passage of a 1966 rights bill with open housing and fair jury selection sections. The 11-point statement cited jobs and housing as the most critical civil rights problems today.

Political Action—The IUE pledged its resources, votes and door-to-door campaigns to the goal of re-electing labor's friends to Congress in the coming elections. It promised a COPE dollar drive to back up this pledge.

Domestic Economy—The convention pointed to the one-fourth of the nation still in poverty, to high jobless rates for teenagers, Negroes and blue-collar workers, to the profit inflation and imbalance in the economy. As remedies, the delegates urged increased real wages through bargaining, a $2 federal minimum wage, a curb on the capital goods boom and a step-up in federal programs to meet housing and other public needs.

Legislation—The IUE called for a national health care program, protection of the right to privacy against employer surveillance of workers, overhaul of federal labor law to end employer coercion and protect organizing rights, increased federal aid for classroom construction and teacher salaries, a substantial boost in social security benefits, a rollback of the soaring interest rates and passage of the stalled truth-in-packaging bill.

Unions Study GE Offer, Set Washington Parley

ity and other issues expected momentarily. The unions said they would study the offer and continue negotiating in the hope that a completely acceptable agreement can be reached before GE contracts start terminating Oct. 2.

Earlier the unions, in anticipation of a GE proposal, had set Sept. 28 as the date for a meeting in Washington, D.C., of the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining with General Electric & Westinghouse.

Federation Pres. George Meany and heads of the unions comprising the national committee will meet after the individual unions hear reports from their own bargainers.

'Mixed' Committees

Westinghouse contracts covering 65,000 workers will begin to run out Oct. 16. Both GE and Westinghouse managements have been meeting with "mixed" committees. Company objections to the multi-union technique are being tested in federal court.

The unions agreed last March to a set of common objectives which they called a "program of progress." It was presented to the two major electrical goods manufacturers in separate proposals by the cooperating unions, which also submitted additional proposals tailored to the situation in individual plants.

Almost 80,000 union workers are involved in national negotiations between GE and the IUE. The IUE has been appearing for contract talks with members of other unions, and similar mixed committees have been negotiating locally with both firms.

The unions proposed in August that management give workers a "catch-up" wage increase of 32 cents an hour, which they called the difference between what workers now earn and what they would have received under that 3.2 percent "guideline" formula of the President's Council of Economic Advisers if applied since 1960.

Also they asked for a further increase based on their manhour productivity, which is rising by more than 7 percent a year; a cost-of-living escalator; a grievance procedure submitting all contracts disputes to impartial arbitration; better protection against job loss through automation and plant removals; improvements in pensions, health insurance, vacations and holidays, plus a union shop.

The unions said that GE and Westinghouse have fallen far behind such industries as auto and steel on both wages and fringe benefits.

Besides the IUE, member unions of the committee include the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Steelworkers and Carpenters.

Historic Background

More than 300 delegates from 150 local unions were present at the founding meeting of the all-union committee in March. They agreed to abandon their long-time single-union approach in favor of coordinating their efforts behind a joint "catch-up" program of wage and benefit improvements.

GE first refused to meet with a committee representing more than one union but returned to the bargaining table after the National Labor Relations Board charged it with refusal to bargain and asked for a court injunction. A district court granted the injunction but an appeals court sent the case back to the NLRB, which assigned an examiner to conduct hearings although bargaining continued.

NLRB Takes Away Bargaining Rights Of 'Union' Dominated By Employers

The National Labor Relations Board has revoked the right of a self-styled Miami, Fla., union to represent construction workers in collective bargaining and ordered it to disestablish itself.

The board found merit in charges that the National Federation of Labor, Inc., makes "quickie" deals with employers and signs "sweetheart" contracts to head off bargaining attempts by building trades unions.

It affirmed a trial examiner's finding that the NFL is an employer-dominated instrumentality that has for more than five years "utilized the bargaining process to promote employer aims."

Unfair labor practice charges were filed against NFL in 1964 by the Carpenters District Council of Miami and Local 349 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. The board cited the examiner's hearing record in concluding that the NFL has been used by employers to "thwart the free choice of their employes and the organizational efforts of other unions" in violation of the labor act.

The record is full of instances where "a bargaining relationship with NFL was sought by various contractors to counter recognitional or bargaining proposals of building trades unions," a three-member board panel ruled.

Aside from its role in carrying out employer aims hostile to the freedom of choice for employes, the board said, "the bargaining practices of NFL reveal the type of inertia or docility to be expected of a labor organization tainted by employer influence and unconcerned with better working standards through bona fide collective bargaining."

NFL's customary method of "organizing" was to present employers with a standard form of agreement setting a wage scale but vesting the employer with "complete discretion in classifying employes for pay purposes" and including few real benefits and safeguards commonly found in union agreements, the board ruled. It added:

"NFL's indifference to employe interests is further evidenced by its failure to police outstanding agreements, its failure to process grievances, its allowing agreements to expire without renegotiation, and its failure to seek" contract reopenings even when agreed to by employers.

Also significant, the report noted, is "NFL's ambivalent position" concerning labor's drive for repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14(b) permitting states to outlaw the negotiation of union shop agreements. While opposing repeal and following a hostile line against "compulsory unionism," NFL itself signed agreements unlawfully making NFL membership a condition for job referrals, the board said.

Finding NFL to be a successor organization to one the board decertified in 1961—the United Southern Employes Association, the NLRB ordered it to stop representing employes, to cancel existing agreements with Miami area employers, and to disestablish itself as a labor organization.

Kingsport Strikers To Appeal Ruling

Kingsport, Tenn. — Unions on strike against Kingsport Press will appeal a ruling by the National Labor Relations Board's Atlanta regional director dismissing unfair labor practice charges against the firm.

A spokesman for the Kingsport Pressmen, Bookbinders and Stereotypers said there is ample evidence to prove the struck textbook plant violated the labor relations act by changing wages and working conditions unlawfully. The unions, on strike since March 1963, are conducting a nationwide "don't buy" campaign to get the employer to bargain on contract terms.

Virginia Parley Backs Call for Free Colleges

Roanoke, Va.—A proposal for free tuition and books at state colleges won the support of the Virginia State AFL-CIO at its annual convention here.

The 464 delegates also called for repeal of the state sales tax on food and reaffirmed labor's legislative program in a broad area including improvements in unemployment and workmen's compensation and minimum wage.

Shortly before the convention opened, Harold B. Boyd announced his resignation as president of the state federation—a post he has held since the merged labor body was established in 1956.

Delegates decided not to fill the vacancy until the next regular scheduled election at the 1967 convention. Vice Pres. Julian F. Carper will serve as acting president in the interim and Brewster Snow continues as secretary-treasurer.

The convention approved, after considerable debate, a change in voting strength to come closer to "one man, one vote" standards.

Henceforth each local will have one vote plus an additional vote for each 100 members. Previously a weighted formula gave proportionately greater representation to smaller locals.

Governor Welcomed

Gov. Mills E. Godwin, Jr., was given a warm reception as he became the first Virginia governor to address a state labor federation convention. Speaking of the state's expanding community college program, he said Virginians are demanding an equal opportunity for themselves and their children. "No responsible public official, at whatever level, can ignore this rising chorus," he said.

Miles C. Stanley, assistant to AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, told the delegates not to "go to sleep" politically this year or they might wake up after election day and find their best friends defeated for election.

Other speakers included Sen. Daniel K. Inouye (D-Hawaii), Rep. W. Pat Jennings—described by COPE Area Dir. Wilbur N. Hobby as "the best congressman Virginia has now"—and State Sen. Henry Howell (D-Norfolk), a leader of the state's liberal Democratic bloc.

During the convention, the State AFL-CIO's $500 scholarship for the best essay on organized labor was presented to David W. Bagley of Vienna, Va.

Latin Unionists Begin College Study Project

New Orleans—Sixteen union officials from Latin America have begun studies in labor economics at the Loyola University Latin-American Center here designed to prepare them for leadership roles in the social and economic development of their nations.

The program is sponsored by the American Institute for Free Labor Development and will stress the role of the labor movement in economic development, according to AIFLD Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr.

A minimum of theoretical material will be utilized to establish background for the analysis of economic processes and programs, Doherty said. Those who complete the course will fill a need for professionally-trained labor economists who can aid Alliance for Progress projects by helping unions plan and implement both local and national programs.

The course includes 10 to 12 hours of lectures and lecture-discussion classes each week, and an additional six to eight hours weekly spent in informal work-group discussions, case discussions and problems, reports, etc.

Before classes are completed in May, 1967, two one-week field trips are planned.

Dr. Robert Smith, labor economist from Louisiana State University, is directing the program. The instructors come from the faculties of LSU and Loyola, Tulane, Xavier and Dillard Universities, the AFL-CIO, U.S. government bodies and Latin-American organizations.

Hotel Union Wins Oklahoma Vote

Oklahoma City—The Hotel & Restaurant Employes scored a breakthrough in organizing here by winning a consent election at the Sheraton-Oklahoma Hotel. Employes voted for the union 53-45 in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The victory climaxed an organizing effort launched 2.5 years ago. The campaign was marked by a five-month strike in support of a union member who had been illegally discharged. Successful processing of an unfair labor practice charge brought the worker's reinstatement with $6,000 in backpay, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Woodrow Pendergrass reported.

Half of Jobs Destroyed:

First Issue of Merged Daily Signals End of Long Walkout

New York—Some 2,170 members of 10 AFL-CIO unions were back at work as the merged World Journal Tribune published its first edition Sept. 12. Appearance of the new paper ended the longest shutdown in American newspaper history—141 days dating back to April 24, when the Newspaper Guild of New York struck the merged corporation with the support of other unions.

The staff of the new afternoon and Sunday paper numbered less than half of the 4,368 previously employed by the merging papers, the World-Telegram & Sun, the Journal-American and the Herald Tribune.

The 900,000 copies of the WJT that rolled off the presses on its first day were quickly sold out to a newspaper-hungry public. It was doubtful that the new paper would retain such a high circulation once the newness wears off, but its first issue contained 80 pages crammed with advertising. During the 20 weeks of the strike the New York Post was the only general circulation afternoon paper in the city. The Times and the Daily News, both morning papers, also continued to publish.

Leaders of the 10 unions said they were pleased with the outcome, except for the unavoidable loss of jobs. Matt Meyer, president of the WJT, professed to be equally pleased.

One Paper Killed

On the dark side was the announcement in the midst of the strike of the death of the Herald Tribune as an individual morning paper. All three papers had reportedly been losing money, but the Trib was deepest in the red, its losses dating back prior to its purchase from the Reid family in 1959 by John Hay Whitney, wealthy Republican and former ambassador to Great Britain.

Whitney acknowledged that the Herald Tribune was "never quite able to stand on its own" under his leadership.

Thomas J. Murphy, executive vice president of the New York Guild local, voiced satisfaction at the union's success in establishing the principle that seniority should govern in the retention of editorial employes affected by a merger. But he suggested that the time has come when the newspaper unions should seriously consider a merger or "federation" themselves.

Pres. Bertram A. Powers of Typographical Local 6 commented that "we are going to have to establish joint bargaining in New York City."

"It's an impossible situation when they (the publishers) have to run the gauntlet of 10 unions every time they negotiate new contracts," Powers said. "We're going to have to do something about it, and whether we do it through the Allied Printing Trades Council or through the Newspaper Unity Committee makes little difference."

Powers noted that contracts of all of the unions with the city's newspapers expire early in 1967. He announced that the printers will present new contract proposals within the next 30 days.

At the offices of the World Journal Tribune, confusion reigned in the first week, although somehow the paper managed to get out five editions a day. Newsstand operators in the Grand Central area and in the Park Ave.-Madison Ave. business district complained of a lack of papers on the first day of publication, when deliveries were spasmodic. But by Tuesday they began to get their quotas.

Simultaneously, sales of the Post, which had jumped from a normal 350,000 to about 850,000 during the long drought, dropped noticeably in the midtown area.

In the business, accounting, payroll, circulation and advertising departments of the WJT, telephones went unanswered for hours at a stretch as both switchboard and departmental phones were deluged with all kinds of inquiries.

Many last minute staff changes were made as a result of management's effort to hold the number of employes to the absolute minimum needed. Editorial assignments were being changed and a few more people were being called back to work off the new rehiring lists.

Antitrust Suit Filed Against New Paper

The Justice Dept. has filed an antitrust suit to require the World Journal Tribune to give other New York City newspapers a chance to bid for syndicated columns and features previously run in the Herald Tribune.

The city's only other afternoon paper, the New York Post, had sought an opportunity to bid for rights to several syndicated columns. The Justice Dept. said the allocation of the features should be "determined by the market place."

It asked the court to enjoin the new newspaper from publishing syndicated columns which appeared in the Herald Tribune unless they were made available to other newspapers on an equal basis.

Office Union Wins J. C. Penney Unit

Oakland, Calif.—Office & Professional Employes Local 29 has been certified by the NLRB as bargaining agent for 175 clerical workers in the J. C. Penney Co. regional accounting office here.

The unit is the first purely clerical operation of the nationwide retail chain to be unionized, according to Pres. John Kinnick of Local 29. The certification followed a union election victory which the company vainly appealed to both regional and national NLRB offices.

Galbraith Terms Minimum Income Nation's Best 'Solution for Poverty'

Consideration of a universal minimum income, "the one prompt and effective solution for poverty," was urged by John Kenneth Galbraith, Harvard economist, in the keynote speech at a three-day Urban America Conference in Washington.

"The arguments against this solution are numerous," Galbraith said. "Most of them are excuses for not thinking about anything so exceedingly plausible."

Declaring "we can easily afford a floor income," he estimated it would cost about $20 billion to bring everyone up to what the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare considers a "reasonable minimum."

"This is a third less than the amount by which personal income rose last year," he pointed out, adding that it is not "so much more" than the nation will spend next fiscal year in Viet Nam.

"And there is no antidote for poverty that is quite so certain in its effects as the provision of income."

Galbraith blamed the decline in urban life on the nation's concern with increased production and sales. Economic growth does not solve the problems of environment and especially urban environment, he declared, adding that "on the contrary, it makes these problems infinitely more urgent."

To improve urban life, he said "we must explicitly assert the claims of the community against those of economics." He urged "far more effective planning and control of land use" and called for "planning and control to permit the architect to work within a suitable framework—a consistent design."

Urban America is a non-profit organization formed last year by merger of the ACTION Council for Better Cities and the American Planning & Civic Association. Representing organized labor at the conference were Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee and Ben Fischer of the Steelworkers.

Philadelphia Local Wins School Cafeteria Unit

Philadelphia — School Cafeteria Workers Local 434 of the Hotel & Restaurant Employes has won recognition as the sole bargaining agent for 1,000 city school district employes. Contract negotiations will begin soon, the union said.

The local won bargaining rights by presenting cards signed by more than 60 percent of the eligible workers. On Aug. 8 the school board, headed by former Mayor Richardson Dilworth, authorized the superintendent to bargain with qualifying unions.

In a message to the session Pres. Johnson challenged the participants to find "new ways to make man's environment more amenable to his nature."

"The quality of life in urban America does not match the affluence of our society," the President observed.

Galbraith and Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey both urged federal financial and technical aid to help lower-level governments tackle the problems posed by growing populations and aging cities. The solutions, the latter claimed, must be local.

"There is little doubt," Humphrey said, "that we can—and very soon—reverse the trends we see today in our cities. . . .

"The way lies open to build a society in which the human values above all count uppermost. . . .

"We have the knowledge. We have the resources. And, I believe, we should have the wisdom to put them intelligently together. The critical question is this: Do we have the will?"

Features Full Portability:

ITU Convention Sets 2-Point Pension Plan

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Establishment of an industrial pension program composed of two industrywide plans, each with full portability, was approved by the 108th convention of the Typographical Union.

The new program is in no way connected with the existing ITU plan, in operation since 1908, but is designed to complement it.

One part will be a jointly-trusteed plan supported by employer contributions to be negotiated. The other will be a union-trusteed plan which will be supported by voluntary contributions of members acting through units of all shop members or all local members.

The convention also approved a resolution giving the convention Committee on Appeals authority to enforce decisions of the international executive council between conventions. The committee was authorized to summon and examine witnesses when the executive council files reports of non-compliance and to assess fines not to exceed $500 in cases where non-compliance is found.

Discussing the subject of mergers and unity among graphic arts unions, ITU Pres. Elmer Brown called on rank-and-file members of the union "who want unity to build it on the bottom."

Must Come From Below

"Yes, we want merger—we want unity," he said. "And we will provide it, but it has to come from down below. We can't build it from the top. Build it with the men you work with in the shops. Build it in your contract negotiations."

In a series of resolutions the convention:

- Approved amendment of union laws to allow apprentices to acquire seniority under stipulated conditions.
- Opposed the 3.2 percent wage increase guideline of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.
- Urged investigation by the Justice Dept. "in a more militant and vigorous manner" to determine if any contemplated newspaper or magazine merger or suspension violates the anti-trust laws.
- Called on locals to accelerate campaigns for state, provincial and municipal anti-strikebreaker statutes.
- Hailed striking agricultural workers and urged that ITU members buy products produced by union farm workers.

In his keynote address, Brown reported "another year of progress on all fronts" with more signed contracts than at any time in the union's history and with annual earnings averaging better than $8,000 a member, or $598 above the previous year.

He also reported a substantial gain in membership "despite the wider introduction of automation and the efforts of some employers to give our jobs to others." Since 1958, when his administration took office, ITU membership has increased from 111,000 to 121,795 as of last January, he said.

Among speakers were Rep. Frank Evans (D-Colo.), State AFL-CIO Pres. Herrick Roth, and State Sen. Roy Romer, Democratic opponent of U.S. Sen. Gordon Allott (R-Colo.) in the November election.

Evans, who is seeking a second term in the House, warned the 350 delegates and union members in general that they must be more active politically.

"You men and women in the union movement are going to have to pay particular attention to what is happening in terms of major legislation in your country," he declared, noting that the proportion of union members in the nation has been declining and there is a "growing body of people in this country who do not understand the history of your movement or anything about collective bargaining."

He warned, too, of moves in Congress to outlaw strikes in certain industries.

Roth complimented the ITU on its long fight in the Kansas Color Press strike at Lawrence, Kan., and expressed the hope that national organizations doing business with the struck firm will withdraw their patronage.

"This small ITU local, assisted by your international, could very well duplicate the story of David and Goliath — 20th Century version," he said.

Roth also spoke of the need for strong union support for liberal candidates in the coming state and national elections.

Wirtz, Ackley Oppose Rigid Wage Guideposts

Wage increases "significantly more than 3.2 percent" are needed to bring "real wages" up to productivity gains, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told Congress.

Both Wirtz and Chairman Gardner Ackley of the President's Council of Economic Advisers acknowledged widespread dissatisfaction with the guidepost formula.

They agreed that the President's Committee on Labor-Management policy—with representation from unions, employers and the public—should be brought into the formulation of future guideposts. But both officials opposed any move by Congress to give the guideposts the effect of law.

Ackley and Wirtz testified at a House Government Operations subcommittee hearing on a bill by Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) which would bring Congress into the guideline picture, with the option of drawing up a different formula if it was dissatisfied with that adopted by the President's economic advisers.

Ackley strongly warned against any move "giving legal status and a flavor of compulsion" to a program which, he said, can succeed only by voluntary acceptance. And he commented that "a policy is more likely to be accepted, even if it is not thought to be completely logical or fair," if the parties affected or their representatives participated in its formulation.

While public attention has focused on above-guideline wage increases, Wirtz noted that public discussion has "largely overlooked" the guidepost principle that prices should be decreased where productivity in an industry goes up more than that of the economy as a whole.

The principle of price cuts, he said, has "been paid exceedingly little respect" by management, "virtually none."

Philadelphia, Detroit Teachers Win Pacts

Chicago—New contracts with special benefits for classroom teachers were won by Philadelphia and Detroit locals of the American Federation of Teachers in last minute settlements that averted strikes and cleared the way for schools to open on time.

Philadelphia AFT members voted to ratify a new two-year pact providing pay raises of $400 to $800 this year and again next year for 11,000 teaching employes. The contract also provides final and binding arbitration as the last step in the grievance procedure, and two unusual provisions:

- The school system will provide teachers in overcrowded rooms with a teaching aide at least half of the day when enrollment exceeds 32 pupils in special classes, 39 in regular classes.
- Teachers who choose to take summer studies instead of teaching in summer sessions will be paid 70 percent of the regular summer school pay.

Salary maximums will rise to $9,900 a year over the contract term for teachers with bachelor's degrees, and to $12,000 in September 1967 from the current $10,400 for those with a doctor's degree in education.

Detroit teachers by a slender margin approved a new contract providing pay raises of $300 to $700 a year for 10,000 public schoolmen and women. The union wanted a shorter workweek but compromised on a severance pay clause giving double pay for each day worked in the 40th week of the school year for those who retire at the end of that school year.

The strike-ending settlement also:

- Guarantees that teachers' report card markings will not be changed by higher authority.
- Gives the AFT school representative released time for union duties.
- Provides assurance that the schools will try to achieve "quality integrated education" with the aid of federal funds.

New salary schedules increase as follows: for the AB degree, from the old range of $5,500-$9,000 a year to $5,800-$9,500; for the MA degree, from $5,800-$9,300 to $6,300-$10,000.

Both locals hold exclusive bargaining rights for teaching employes. The new contracts are the second for each.

Other last-minute AFT settlements headed off strikes in the Detroit suburbs of Warren, Ferndale and Trenton and ended a six-day walkout at Henry Ford Community College in Dearborn.

The AFT represents the 150 teachers at Henry Ford College who won pay hikes of $500 to $900 a year and a pay scale of $5,950 to $11,775 a year.

Clothing Workers Reach Pacesetting Shirt Pact

New York—The Clothing Workers have negotiated a new agreement with shirt manufacturers which the union said, will serve as a pattern for more than 125,000 workers in the men's cotton garment industry.

The three-year settlement extends the present contract to Sept. 1, 1969. It provides wage hikes of 10 cents an hour next Nov. 1 and another 10 cents a year later, hospitalization and surgical benefit improvements for members and their dependents, and higher pensions for present and future retirees.

1965 Gains Recalled

ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky recalled that the union also negotiated benefit improvements a year ago for cotton garment industry workers—a general wage increase of 10 cents an hour, a third week of paid vacation after one year of employment, and improved hospital, surgical and pension benefits.

The latest boost in welfare and retirement benefits will be financed, Potofsky said, by an increase of 1 percent in employer contributions to a new total of 7.5 percent of payroll. Daily hospitalization allowances are increased from $22 to $30, incidental benefits while hospitalized from $200 to $300, and surgical benefits from $250 to $300 on a set fee schedule.

Pensions for retirees will go from the present $55 a month to $60 next January, $65 on Jan. 1, 1968, and $70 a year later. The benefits are in addition to social security payments.

Life insurance for covered employes increases to a top of $2,000. For retirees, insurance is increased by 50 percent.

Besides Potofsky, the union negotiating team included Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum, Executive Vice Pres. Hyman Blumberg and vice presidents and joint board managers from major manufacturing centers. The employers group was headed by Vice Pres. Robert M. Dale of the Arrow Co. division of Cluett, Peabody, Inc.

The major shirt firms traditionally set the pattern followed by makers of men's and boys' cotton garments, the union noted.

Meany Praises Fire Fighters' Atlanta Local

Strong support for members of Fire Fighters Local 134 who stayed on the job in Atlanta, Ga., despite a wildcat strike by an unaffiliated breakaway organization has been voiced by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and IAFF Pres. William D. Buck.

In a telegram to Pres. James Moore of the Atlanta AFL-CIO, Meany lauded Local 134 members "who have remained loyal to observance of their international union constitution prohibiting strikes" and urged the local council to "lend all moral support" to the loyal members "who are aware of their obligation, as fire fighters, to the public safety of the city of Atlanta."

Buck expressed the union's gratitude at Meany's support for "the responsible and courageous members of Local 134 who have kept faith with their responsibility to protect the people of Atlanta from fire."

"The good union members in Atlanta," Buck said, "are the members of Local 134 who have stayed at their posts, in accordance with their union constitution and their personal oath of responsibility.

"In all the excitement of charges and accusation, propaganda has clouded over the fact that these Local 134 members are the real trade unionists, who deserve the support of organized labor and the general public."

He blamed the crisis on the Atlanta municipal government's slowness in responding to the long-standing needs of its fire fighters, but added that even that failure "does not justify . . . those who walked away from their union and their obligation."

Sheet Metal Union Beats Teamster Bid

Verona, Wis.—The Sheet Metal Workers repelled an attempted raid by the ousted Teamsters to retain bargaining rights for 350 employes of the Carnes Corp. here.

The election was conducted by the Wisconsin State Labor Relations Board chairman under a plan approved in August by the National Labor Relations Board. The vote was 209 for Sheet Metal Local 565 to 105 for Teamsters Local 695.

The AFL-CIO union signed a labor agreement at Carnes earlier this year when management recognized the Sheet Metal Workers after an independent check of union authorization cards. The Teamsters objected and filed charges with the NLRB.

The plant produces air conditioning equipment.

In another election, conducted by the NLRB, the Sheet Metal Workers bested a long-entrenched union at the Columbus, O., plant of Lennox Industries. The vote was 291 for Sheet Metal, 253 for the Lennox Employes Association, a 21-year-old group.

The Gunman

THE MAN WHO LEADS the Republican Party in the U.S. Senate—the "party of Lincoln"—seems about to notch another "killing" on his legislative six-shooter. This time the victim is the House-passed Civil Rights bill of 1966, a bill that would bar discrimination in the sale or rental of housing.

The man—Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen of Illinois, the Senate GOP leader—has single-handedly and effectively blocked the bill by supporting the southern Dixiecrats in a filibuster to prevent the civil rights measure from coming to a vote on the Senate floor.

The handful of liberal Republicans in the Senate who are strongly supporting fair housing legislation are helpless; the majority of the GOP members in the Senate follow Dirksen's lead.

His tactic on the civil rights bill is the same one he employed in killing the bill to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. He led a filibuster with the southerners to prevent the Senate from voting on the repeal measure passed by the House.

He came within a few votes of helping to nullify the U.S. Supreme Court's historic decision that state legislatures should be reapportioned on the principle of one man, one vote. Only a determined battle by a labor-liberal coalition prevented Dirksen from notching his third "killing."

THE CIVIL RIGHTS battles of 1964 and 1965 in the Senate demonstrated that without Republican help a Dixiecrat filibuster could not be stopped. In both years the bills were trimmed and compromised and finally won Dirksen's support to stop the talkathons and go to a vote. He was widely hailed as one of the "heroes" of the civil rights legislative battleground.

But in 1966, when the moderates and liberals in the Republican Party are struggling to regain control from the right-wingers and the Goldwater forces, Dirksen has reverted to kind—the old-line conservative dedicated to preserving the era of the McKinley whose name he bears.

The ultimate irony is his leadership of the "party of Lincoln," a phrase that has oozed from his lips at politically opportune moments.

Lincoln's "government of the people, by the people and for the people" means today fair housing for all Americans, freedom for labor and management to enter into agreements on union security, fair representation at all levels of government so that one man's vote is equal to any other man's vote.

Dirksen has violated all of these principles to the injury of the nation and to the dismay of the Republicans in the House and Senate who understand the heritage of Lincoln and cast their votes for his principles.

The Senate minority leader has long enchanted some segments of the press, radio and television as the "wizard of ooze." The enchantment routine is over. He stands exposed as the man who killed 14(b) repeal and thus far blocked a civil rights bill that would have established fair housing as a national policy.

Liberal Candidates Under Attack:

Conservatives Mounting Drive To Shift Makeup of Congress

IT'S RARE that the party holding the White House does not lose some congressional seats during non-presidential election years.

On the average, such losses run about 40 seats. However, if the liberal Democrats and Republicans should lose anywhere near that many seats this year, the Great Society would receive a serious blow.

Evidence for this comes from the ultra-right-wing Americans for Constitutional Action. ACA has just released its liberal versus conservative tally of key votes in the first six months of the second session of the 89th Congress.

The issues selected in the Senate include the airlines strike, unemployment compensation, community development under the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development, school lunches and foreign aid. The House rating includes civil rights, federal reclamation and foreign aid.

According to the ACA, 188 members of the House had a 50 per cent or better "conservative" voting record.

A shift of 40 votes would give the conservatives 228 votes or a majority of the 435 members, 228 to 207.

In such a makeup of the House, there would have been no possibility of passing, for example, medicare. The bill was saved by 45 votes. Even a switch of 23 votes would have killed it.

The vote on repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act passed the House by 23 votes. It would have no chance with a switch of even 12 House seats.

Almost the same situation exists on the open housing section of the Civil Rights Act of 1966. The key section passed by only 17 votes.

The picture is not quite so clearly drawn in the Senate. Those who scored 50 percent or better in the ACA rating in the Senate numbered 29 out of 99 members. There was one vacancy, that of the late Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), now filled by Robert Griffin, a Republican.

A small shift here would not have hurt the liberal majority, but on major issues a filibuster or even the threat of a filibuster can block action—as it did on repeal of 14(b).

So, any loss of liberal seats in the Senate would negate the possibility of passing Great Society legislation.

The battle in the 1966 elections on the House side will be over the seats held by the 48 Democratic freshmen who were elected two years ago. They have provided the margin for the Great Society legislation.

A TOTAL of 36 of these 48 seats were won by margins of 55 percent or less. This year these candidates will not have the advantage of a vote-getting Pres. Johnson at the head of the ticket or a vote liability like Barry Goldwater around the neck of their opponents.

ACA makes another point that, while it might be debatable, cannot be completely overlooked. The conservative group claims that the voting patterns by members of Congress have shifted toward the conservative side. It even provides some evidence.

Its 1966 tally shows there were six receiving zero ratings (solidly pro-labor), five in the House and one in the Senate. In 1965 there were 50 receiving zero ratings—six senators and 44 congressmen.

One explanation for this could be the selection of key votes by the ultra-conservative group. However, throughout the years a zero by ACA usually has meant a 100 rating, or close to it, by an officeholder on labor's rating.

The patterns in the primary elections to date have not been very comforting to liberal or moderate Republicans. In most instances, Goldwater-type GOP candidates have defeated them.

ACA reports that to date it has participated in five primary campaigns with three wins, one defeat and one election yet to be held. The ultra-conservatives seem well aware of the crucial aspects of the November elections. They are utilizing all their resources in it. (PAI)

Key to Viet Nam Success Lies In Joint Military, Civilian Effort

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

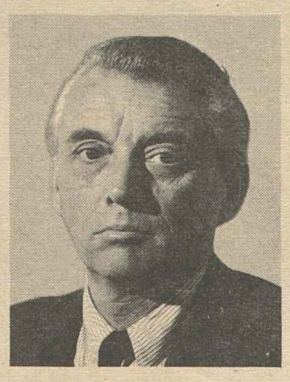
SAIGON—No matter how hopeful or discouraging post-election developments turn out actually to be in nurturing the thinly but bravely planted seed of representative government in South Viet Nam, there is an immediate job ahead for American and South Vietnamese forces, military and civilian. It is huge. It is staggeringly complicated. Indeed it is well-nigh impossible. But it must somehow be done if this tortuous struggle is not to fail. It may fail anyway. It will surely fail if the key job is not done. There is a tenuous but tantalizing hope that it can be done.



Morgan

The job is almost unique in the history of military and political warfare—except that the Communists themselves have done it—not here, but with some qualified success in North Viet Nam and elsewhere in the unsolid bloc of so-called peoples' democracies. The assignment, in brief, is to combine the combat on the civilian and military fronts into one integrated battle. This has long been a theory. It has never yet become the practice, all the pious declarations, including the hullabaloo of last February's Honolulu summit conference between Pres. Johnson and Premier Ky, notwithstanding. There is slivery evidence that efforts are moving in that direction. Great obstacles still lie in the path, not the least of which is negative psychology, a paralyzing reflex action which says: "But we've never done it that way before."

The Communists have. It is an article of faith of Mao Tse-tung's Chinese-Marxist philosophy that the army is not, as one American China watcher puts it, merely a knife blade but a can-opener and a corkscrew. The army not only fights but it organizes, administers and polices civilian institutions behind the front at the same time. The classic western approach to warfare is: destruction of the enemy first, reconstruction of the country later. This order of priority simply has not worked in South Viet Nam. But out of that failure may come success if both American and South Vietnamese leadership recognize the urgency of ordering, executing and adapting to major change.

Perhaps the hardest change of all involves the restructuring of the South Vietnamese armed forces. The military brass is the only power structure in this country. Officers not only command troops in the field, they are the province chiefs and the district chiefs controlling the civilian population—where the Viet Cong is not in control. And the marshals and the generals in Saigon are the government itself.

The time must come, sooner rather than later, when military units are assigned to and controlled by a civilian province chief, who would be roughly the equivalent of the governor of an American state, with contingents of the national guard at his command. This, obviously, would not apply in a major engagement with Viet Cong forces. But it would apply in situations where police action is necessary. At the moment the idea of a Vietnamese officer taking orders from a civilian is not only impossible but unthinkable.

Yet there is a pilot project already in operation that may be the base on which to build these needed changes. In Binh Dinh, one of the largest and most populous South Vietnamese provinces, three districts (or counties) are now in a state of "control." That means that some 125,000 citizens —nearly 15 percent of the population—live in comparative security day and night.

THE RECIPE for this extraordinary operation cannot be cooked up into a solution for the whole country overnight. It has taken 13 months to "pacify" even this tiny area, 20 kilometers square. It is hugely expensive. It has taken months of training of Vietnamese regional forces, popular forces and "revolutionary development" cadres, which are a kind of military-civilian government, police-force combination operating on different echelons.

It has tied down one whole South Korean division as a tough but efficient screen fanned out to prevent major guerrilla penetration. Behind them the Vietnamese regional forces operate. Behind them in the villages are the popular forces, indigenous, if possible, to the area. Behind them, in the hamlets, are 59-man revolutionary development teams.

The major assignment of virtually all the armed forces in South Viet Nam is to search out and destroy the enemy. But another function is emerging, "to clear and pacify." Though some observers are dubious of the effectiveness of Vietnamese soldiers in units smaller than 100 men, it is learned that top-level plans are now in the works to detach elements of this army from combat assignments to "pacification" duty.

Even some American units might be assigned to similar duty although this is now only in the amorphous and controversial stage of future planning. This over-all Binh Dinh concept would not mean the Americans would "do all the fighting" while the South Vietnamese simply did security and military government chores. Nor would it mean static warfare on the so-called enclave theory. Nothing can remain static in South Viet Nam if we're going to get anywhere. The Binh Dinh experiment, with refinements, may point the way.

Contract Safeguards Urged On Hiring, Promotion Tests

APTITUDE and psychological testing by untrained persons in the hiring and promotion of workers is a dangerous practice, the AFL-CIO's industrial engineer has warned.

"Some kind of testing might be appropriate, but not by a personnel manager in a factory," said Bertram Gottlieb of the federation's Dept. of Research. His statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, a weekly AFL-CIO public affairs production on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Noting that "the use of these devices has been rapidly increasing in recent years," Gottlieb said there is growing concern among union negotiators that proper safeguards against the practice be included in collective bargaining agreements.

"Testing today is, in most cases, in the hands of salesmen who make money" selling them, he said. "No matter how poor a test may be, if it is nicely packaged and if it promises to do all sorts of things which no test can do, it will find gullible buyers," he added.

Gottlieb said that promoters of some tests claim they can be designed to determine whether a worker is liberal or conservative, pro-union, anti-union or neutral.

IF THOSE CLAIMS are true, Gottlieb said, "a management—without directly attacking a union, without doing anything to the union that is in existence—can, in the long run, seriously weaken the union and weaken its ability to protect the workers by using the test to 'weed out' those people they feel would be good union members."

He said the AFL-CIO Departments of Research and Education are presently discussing a possible training program to "teach full-time union representatives what testing is all about—what we mean by validation and reliability—and how they can negotiate the necessary protections."

Reporters questioning Gottlieb were James Millstone of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

PASSAGE OF THE new minimum wage bill might have been considered a climax of an ordinary session of Congress, but the 89th Congress is different.

There were eight regular appropriations bills still to be completed as the Ides of September was passed, plus a supplemental money bill that would cover, among other things, estimated needs for support of our troops in Viet Nam. The White House and Bureau of the Budget have not yet submitted the figures for the supplemental.

The amendments to the poverty program authorization law cleared the House Education & Labor Committee last June 1 but have not yet reached the floor for action.

A new elementary education authorization bill also has been approved by the House Education & Labor Committee—last Aug. 5. It hasn't been taken to the House floor either.

The administration bill to launch its program of urban modernization by a "demonstration cities" project has been passed by the Senate and reported by the House Banking & Currency Committee. It may be brought up in the House Sept. 26 under the 21-day rule that allows the Rules Committee to be bypassed.

An unemployment compensation bill has been passed by the Senate with new federal standards requiring all states to pay a minimum benefit equal to one-half a jobless worker's previous wage or one-half the state's average wage, whichever is smaller, and setting a minimum state benefit term of six months.

An unemployment compensation bill has also been passed by the House but it provides no such federal standards, and a House-Senate conference committee to work out an agreed version has not yet been appointed.

The House has passed a higher education bill but the Senate hasn't, although hearings have been completed in the Committee on Labor & Public Welfare.

A water pollution control bill was passed by the Senate on July 13 and a favorable report has been ordered by House committee, but the bill has not yet reached the floor.

The House, on the other hand, has completed action on a bill to establish a new Dept. of Transportation but with the Maritime Administration excluded. A Senate committee has completed hearings but a bill has not yet been sent to the floor.

And then there is civil rights, on which Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield says he will try again for a two-thirds cloture vote to shut off a filibuster but is getting active opposition from GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

The House passed the strongest possible bill, including a section guaranteeing that Negroes and other minorities could not hereafter be systematically barred from major apartment developments and new housing, that could command a House majority. Dirksen has the Republican votes to invoke cloture in the Senate but insists he will not furnish them.

He said his objection to the open-occupancy sections involved a doubt about their constitutionality. But so-called doubts about the constitutionality of legislation—particularly when the language has been modified to meet all objections of the ranking GOP member of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. William M. McCulloch of Ohio—are likely to mean that the hostility arises from fear that the bill would be upheld by the Supreme Court.

IT HAS BEEN a long hot summer for members of Congress. It seems likely to be a long, if not a hot, autumn, despite Mansfield's expressed hope that adjournment can be reached by Oct. 15.

That would give members three weeks to campaign before the Nov. 8 elections. But a good many members are spending much of their time campaigning already, returning to Washington for important rollcalls.

The session may rock along until near the end of October with the Administration pushing to get final action on bills that have received favorable committee action.

APTITUDE AND PSYCHOLOGICAL tests for hiring and promotion purposes should not be given by untrained persons such as personnel managers, AFL-CIO Industrial Engineer Bertram Gottlieb (center) told reporters Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and James Millstone of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch on Labor News Conference, weekly nationwide interview on the Mutual radio network.

How to Buy:

Medicare Working Well Despite Fee-Grabbing by Some Doctors

By Sidney Margolius

ELDERLY PEOPLE who had long waited for medicare to help solve their medical-expense problems are finding that some of the anticipated benefits may be cancelled by increases in fees charged people over 65 by doctors.

One woman who enrolled in Plan B (the part that costs $3 a month and pays doctor bills), told this writer that her doctor now is charging her $10 for an office visit instead of the previous $7. Others have reported jumps from $5 to $10. Some specialists are reported to have raised fees from $10 for an office visit to $15.

Actually, many doctors had started to raise fees last spring even before medicare went into effect on July 1, as the doctors' trade magazine, Medical Economics, reported.

The doctors are claiming that they are merely eliminating a cut rate previously given moderate-income older patients now that medicare is helping to pay the bill.

The increases can wipe out some of medicare's expected help for many older people. Those who may not use up their entire $50 deductible under Part B before they become eligible for payments for doctor bills now find themselves paying more than before. For example, an older person who may go to a doctor four or five times during the year will find he is paying $40 or $50 out of his own pocket. At the old rates of $5 to $7, his out-of-pocket expenses before satisfying the deductible would have been only $20 to $35.

For those who do use more than $50 worth of doctor services in one year, the fee increase may or may not be damaging, depending on whether the doctor agrees to take an assignment of the bill, and collect from the plan, or insist that the patient pay and collect himself.

If the doctor insists that the patient gets his own reimbursement, the problem for the patient is that the law requires payment of only a "reasonable" fee. If the doctor charges more, the patient pays the difference. For example, a doctor may charge $350 for an operation, but the Administration may consider that a reasonable fee should be only $250.

In that event, medicare then takes the disappointing path of private indemnity insurance, paying only part of the bill, with doctors usually charging more than the fee allowed.

Even some union-management-operated group care plans, such as those in the mining and railroad industries, are finding that some of their doctors who work on the retainer or contract basis now are seeking to raise fees or to handle patients over 65 on a private-fee basis.

Early indications are that about half of all doctors so far are accepting assignments, and the rest are billing patients directly, although the proportion varies by locality.

BUT ANOTHER prospect is that medical costs will go up for younger families too, warns Dr. Palmer Dearing, executive director of Group Health Association of America. Fee increases for older people will tend to inflate prices for all groups, since doctors won't be able to justify charging just the older people more for similar services, he points out. Total medical-care costs already have gone up over 4 percent in the past 12 months, compared to 2.8 percent for the full living-cost index.

The doctor's fee grab affects only Plan B of medicare, not Plan A which pays for hospital care, and is provided whether or not you sign up for Plan B.

Except for the fee grab, reports show that medicare is operating effectively. There has been no trend, as some medical authorities earlier predicted, that older people would rush to take advantage of the hospital insurance for minor illnesses. The fear, of course, was unnecessary. Not many people like to be cut up even if they can have it done free.

One tip for older people whose doctors may be inclined to bill directly, is to point out that he will get paid sooner if he accepts an assignment, especially in the case of a large bill. Also, in the case of low-income patients, an assignment assures him he will get paid.

Median Income Up For Families in '65

ANN ARBOR, MICH.—A larger proportion of American families received income increases in 1965 than ever before.

Data collected by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research shows that while higher income from wages and salaries was the rule, not all families shared in the good times.

The survey showed that the median income in 1965 was almost $6,700, up from $5,800 in 1962. The figures are for family units (including single persons living alone).

The report, part of the 1966 Survey of Consumer Finances, shows that for the first time in history more than half of the dollars earned by American families in 1965 went to families earning $10,000 or more before taxes. The percent of families in this income bracket received 53 percent of the dollars.

In 1962, a comparable 18 percent received 41 percent of the dollars.

Some 55 percent of all family units reported that their incomes went up during the last year. Two years earlier, only 40 percent experienced an income increase. In both years, about one family in every six reported an income decrease.

The data, based on a national sample of nearly 2,500 families, revealed that young families were most likely to report an income rise. About 70 percent of families headed by someone under age 35 reported increases compared with only 30 percent among those over 65.

INCOME INCREASES were frequent among families whose heads had education past high school, either college or vocational training. Among families whose heads were employed in a professional, technical, or supervisory occupation, three out of four reported income increases.

The education of the major wage earner had a pronounced influence on the family's income. The median income of families whose heads had five grades or less of schooling was only $2,730, while family heads with advanced or professional college degrees had a median income of almost $13,000. In the latter group, two out of every three families had incomes of $10,000 or more.

The working wife has come to be a significant factor in the economy, the SRC report states. Four out of every 10 wives worked at some time during 1965.

The survey also reveals that the median income of white families was 1.7 times larger than that of Negroes. In 1961 it was twice as large and in 1956 it was 2.5 times larger. In 1965 four out of every 10 Negro families, but only two out of 10 white families, had incomes of less than $3,000.

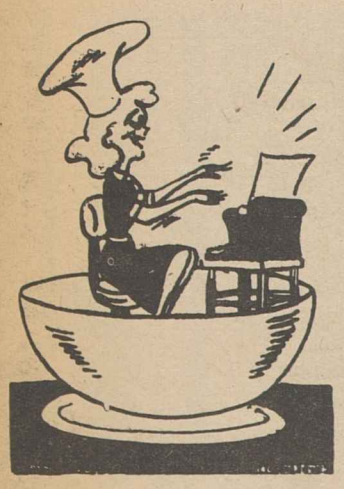
The Trouble Boils Down to This: Too Much News Is Fit to Print

By Jane Goodsell

LET'S FACE IT. It is no longer possible to keep up with what's going on in the world. Too much is happening for the human mind to assimilate, and news of current events blurs into an incomprehensible mishmash of elections, earthquakes, air attacks, corporate mergers, congressional hearings, missile launchings, beauty contests and coups d'etat.



Who can keep track of what happened where and to whom? Who can make heads or tails out of one critical situation before it is superseded by another? Who can truly understand the British sterling crises? The black power movement? Spectrometers? Tight money? Laser beams? LSD? Hard-core art? The Rhodesian situation?

Not only is too much happening too fast, but it's happening in too many unidentifiable places to too many people with unpronounceable names. I've finally managed to get Sukarno and Suharto straight in my head, but when the cast of characters includes Buwono, Motuto and Belewa, I'm darned if I can figure out who's who. I not only can't keep the good guys and the bad guys straight, I don't even know if Phu Yen is a place or a person.

Still, I can't pretend that it's only foreign news that befuddles me. I get hung up on news stories with U.S. datelines, too. It's all those initials that confuse me. I do know what LBJ and RFK and CIA stand for, but I can't seem to remember that HHH is Hubert Humphrey.

TO BE a well-informed person nowadays, it isn't enough to stay abreast of major news developments in Washington, Moscow, London, Hanoi, Peking and Nigeria.

One must also be au courant with the latest developments at Yankee Stadium, Cape Kennedy, the Senate cloakroom, the Paris openings, Harvard Square, the Guggenheim Museum, the LBJ ranch and the Cannes film festival, not to mention keeping track of the betting odds on Ronald Reagan and the state of Lynda Bird's romance with George Hamilton.

Difficult as it is to keep up with what's going on, things could be worse and doubtless they'll get worse. Sooner or later, they'll discover life on other planets. Quicker than you can say Inter-planetary Communications, the world will be deluged with news reports from interstellar space———politics, monetary crises, sporting events, literary squabbles, beauty pageants, etcetera, etcetera.

I hope I'm not around when the news communiques start coming in from Mars and Jupiter. I'm having enough trouble keeping track of what's happening now on only one planet.

Key House Vote on Minimum Wage

Before giving final approval to the minimum wage bill, the House rejected, 183-163, a Republican motion to send the legislation back to conference with instructions to delay the $1.60 wage floor an additional year. Voting against the stretchout were 165 Democrats and 18 Republicans. Voting to delay the increase were 101 Republicans and 62 Democrats.

On labor's scoreboard, a vote against postponing the $1.60 rate was a right vote (R), while a vote for delay was wrong (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong. Numerals indicate districts; AL—at large.

LONGSHOREMEN'S MEDICAL CENTER in Brooklyn will appear as in the architect's drawing above after it undergoes the second expansion since it was opened in 1957. The enlargement will add two floors to meet increasing demands for comprehensive care and service offered by the center, which is under the joint administration of the union and the New York Shipping Association.

Meany Calls Expanded Wage Bill 'Most Potent' Anti-Poverty Weapon

down on new coverage by exempting additional smaller businesses.

The Senate had a choice of accepting or rejecting the conference report. Rejection would have scuttled the entire agreemnt, leaving conflicting House and Senate bills requiring a new effort at negotiations.

Meany praised the leadership of Sen. Ralph Yarborough (D.-Tex.) and Rep. John H. Dent (D.-Pa.) Senate and House floor managers of the bill. It was a victory, he said, for the President, who "fought hard" for the bill, and for the bipartisan majority in Congress which beat off crippling amendments.

Most of all, Meany said, the bill's passage "was a victory for millions of Americans, whose lives are certain to be brightened, and for increased purchasing power — the lifeblood of our economy."

The Senate fight against the conference agreement was led by Sen. Winston L. Prouty (R.-Vt.) and GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. But opponents could muster only 23 Republican and 15 Democratic votes. For approval of the report were 45 Democrats and 10 Republicans.

Over the next few years, the bill will add billions of dollars in purchasing power to America's lowest-paid workers. The first year impact alone—starting Feb. 1, 1967 when those now at the $1.25 minimum move up to $1.40 and newly-covered workers are guaranteed $1-an-hour—is estimated at more than $1 billion. More than $2 billion additional purchasing power will be added the second year, when the rate for those now covered goes up to $1.60 and the newly-covered rate advances to $1.15

In less astronomical terms, the worker who now makes $2,600 a year at the $1.25 legal minimum will be guaranteed at least $3,200 at the $1.60 rate.

When the Fair Labor Standards Act was enacted in 1938, the minimum wage was set at 25 cents an hour. In the period to World War II, it moved gradually to 40 cents. In 1950, it jumped to 75 cents, and in 1956 to $1. A two-step increase then brought the wage floor to $1.15 in 1961 and to $1.25 in 1963.

First Extension

The first extension of coverage was enacted as part of the 1961 bill, adding some 3.5 million workers.

Expansion of coverage and a substantial increase in the wage floor were given equal stress by the AFL-CIO in labor's high-priority campaign for improvement of the wage-hour law.

The final version adopted by Congress was a compromise. Labor had sought a $2-an-hour minimum as the most effective weapon against poverty. The Administration initially had asked only for extension of coverage to 4.5 million new workers, leaving the question of an increase in the minimum to the discretion of Congress. Both the AFL-CIO and the Administration had sought higher penalty pay for overtime, but Congress sidetracked that issue.

Meany, in his comment on enactment of the bill, had this to say on the final version:

"We wanted more; we think the minimum wage should be higher and the coverage of workers in interstate commerce should be absolute. But this is a triumph without peer for all who believe in decency in the marketplace."

Rollcall Vote in Senate On Minimum Wage Bill

The Senate on Sept. 14 approved the conference report on minimum wage improvements, thus clearing the bill for the President's signature.

The AFL-CIO strongly supported the bill and urged all Senators to vote to approve the conference report. The vote for approval was 55-38.

Details of Changes In Wage-Hour Act

Its official title is the Fair Labor Standards Act. Most people call it the Wage-Hour Act or simply the minimum wage law.

On Sept. 14 Congress sent to the President's desk the biggest package of improvements in the law's 28-year history. It includes the twin legislative goals of the AFL-CIO—a major extension of coverage and a substantial boost in the amount of the minimum wage. Here in brief are the main provisions:

WAGES

The minimum wage for the 29.5 million persons already covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act will rise from the present $1.25 an hour to $1.40 on Feb. 1, 1967 and to $1.60 a year later.

Newly covered workers will begin with a $1-an-hour minimum on Feb. 1, 1967. On Feb. 1 of each year thereafter, their minimum wage will rise by 15 cents—until farm workers reach $1.30 and until non-farm workers catch up with the $1.60 minimum.

For workers in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands now covered by industry wage orders, minimums will be increased 12 percent as of Apr. 1 or one year after the most recent wage order prior to that date—whichever is later. One year after the 12 percent increase, an additional 16 percent raise will be put into effect. As was the case in the 1961 amendments to the law, the Secretary of Labor may order postponement of the increases on the recommendation on so-called "review committees." The minimum wages for newly covered workers will be set by the Secretary of Labor.

HOURS

Newly-covered workers will gradually be brought under the 40-hour ceiling on straight-time work which applies to those already covered. Unless otherwise specified, they will have to be paid at least time-and-one-half for work beyond 44 hours after Feb. 1, 1967, beyond 42 hours a year later, and beyond 40 hours starting Feb. 1, 1969.

For workers in seasonal industries, the maximum workday at straight time is lowered from 12 to 10 hours and the maximum straight time workweek reduced from 56 to 50 hours and to 48 hours for workers in perishable fruit and vegetable processing.

COVERAGE

About 7.1 million additional workers will be covered the first year of the new law, with an additional 955,000 included on Feb. 1, 1968. The reason for the second-year gain is that the "voume of business" test for coverage of retail and service enterprises drops in two steps from its present $1 million level to $500,000 on Feb. 1, 1967, and to $250,000 on Feb. 1, 1968.

Major groups of newly-covered workers are as follows:

Retail Trade—An additional 1.5 million retail employes will be covered. The only retail firms still exempt will be those doing less than $250,000 in business, most of it in the same state.

Restaurants—Coverage will be extended to 425,000 workers.

Hotels, Motels—Coverage will be extended to 275,000.

Hospitals, Nursing Homes—This major expansion of coverage will bring 1.47 million workers under the law. Nursing home employes still could be worked up to 48 hours a week at straight-time wages. The maximum hours for hospital employes could be scheduled over a 14-day period if the worker agrees and is paid time-and-one-half after eight hours in any day and after 80 hours in a 14-day period.

Laundry, Dry Cleaning—All laundry and dry cleaning establishments will be covered, adding 505,000 workers.

Construction—All construction employment, regardless of size, will be covered, adding 581,000 workers.

Federal Employment—Prevailing wages paid to federal blue collar workers may not be less than the $1.25-$1.40-$1.60 minimum. In addition the minimum wage will be extended for the first time to persons paid from non-appropriated funds under the jurisdiction of the armed forces, such as post exchange stores. They will receive the wage applicable to persons already covered. Persons employed in the Panama Canal Zone, will begin with the $1 minimum applicable to newly-covered employes.

Transit, Taxi Firms—Coverage is extended to an additional 65,000 employes of smaller local transit companies and to some 100,000 taxi employes. Drivers are exempt from overtime restrictions.

School Employes—Non-teaching employes of public schools are covered for the first time, adding some 900,000 workers.

Farm Workers—An estimated 390,000 farm workers are brought under a $1-an-hour minimum, rising in two annual steps to $1.30. They will not be covered by the overtime provisions of the law.

Other groups—The exemption for employes in small logging crews is lowered from crews of 12 or less under present law to crews of eight or less. Gasoline service station employes will be covered by overtime provisions for the first time. Some 34,000 cotton ginning workers and 90,000 other agricultural processing workers are brought under a minimum wage guarantee.

TIPPED EMPLOYES

If an employe regularly receives at least $20 a month in tips, his employer may credit tips for up to 50 percent of the applicable minimum wage. At the $1.40 level, for example, a worker who averages at least 70 cents an hour in tips could be paid as little as 70 cents an hour in cash wages. However, if he contends that his tip income was actually less than reported by the employer, the worker or his union may protest to the Labor Dept., and the employer would have to make up the underpayment.

Close Votes Back Wilson:

British Trade Unions Accept Wage Freeze

Blackpool, Eng.—British trade unionists decided unhappily to support the Labor government's policy of banning all wage increases for six months at the annual Trades Union Congress here.

Prime Minister Harold Wilson came to the congress to persuade delegates to support his policy, introduced last July when the currency again came under speculative attack and aggravated Britain's serious balance of payments problem.

Wilson told the delegates that if they did not give him the support he demanded, he would use the reserve power given him by the House of Commons to enforce the "wage freeze" by law.

Vote a Cliff-hanger

Cliff-hanging votes on four motions at the end of the TUC's vital economic debate finally favored the government's stand.

Closest vote was on the TUC general council's decision of last July to give grudging "acquiescence" to the Wilson measures. It was supported by a majority of only 344,000 votes out of the 9 million cast. (British trade union general secretaries cast a block vote for each of their members.)

Leader of the opposition to Wilson from the floor of the congress was Frank Cousins, general secretary of the nation's largest union, the Transport & General Workers. Until July a member of Wilson's cabinet, Cousins resigned to fight the government's legislative program because it interferes with collective bargaining.

But the motion he put to the congress proposing outright opposition to the freeze was defeated by more than a million votes.

The Mineworkers' vote was primarily responsible for the government's victory on Cousins' motion. When their delegates arrived at the congress, their 446,000 votes seemed likely to go against the freeze. But in a last minute switch, whose legality was unsuccessfully contested in the courts, they swung behind Wilson.

Many of the unionists who voted for the government did so out of loyalty; the older unions regard the Labor government as their offspring, and to defeat it over its most vital economic policy would have been regarded as a slap in the face which could seriously hurt.

Underlying the debates was expressed concern for the future of free collective bargaining in Britain. Wilson pledged that when Britain's economic difficulties were over, the freeze policy would be removed. But it is to be followed by a period of "severe restraint" in which only lower-paid workers and groups with special claims will be allowed wage raises.

Absent from the congress this year was TUC Gen. Sec. George Woodcock, who was in the hospital following a mild heart attack. His place was filled by the assistant general secretary, Victor Feather, who put to the Congress the general council's case for supporting the government.

Economic issues dominated the congress this year, but motions were passed on a whole range of workers' interests, from investment policy in Britain's forests to opposition to racial prejudice in employment.

Motions opposing outright America's commitment in Viet Nam were withdrawn, preventing what might have been an embarrassing debate for the Labor government, which generally supports the Johnson Administration's policy. The congress did, however, pass a motion supporting Wilson's stated opposition to the bombing of targets in Hanoi.

DOCTOR OF LAWS honorary degree was bestowed upon Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers by Fordham University, New York, in recognition of his service to the labor movement. Placing the doctoral hood in position are Rev. Gerald Fagan, S.J. (left), and the Rev. Leo McLaughlin, S.J. (right), president of the university.

Union Funds to Finance Housing in Puerto Rico

Unity House, Pa.—The executive board of the Ladies' Garment Workers at a meeting here agreed to put up $25 million in mortgage funds to finance a workers housing project planned for Puerto Rico by the Intl. Basic Economy Corp.

The IBEC was founded in 1947 by the five Rockefeller brothers, with the now-Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R-N.Y.) as president, to promote socially beneficial economic development in different parts of the world.

ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg in announcing the loan said the money will come from the union's general funds and from retirement and welfare funds to which employers contribute.

The program calls for the construction of individual homes for about 2,000 families in six areas—Arecibo, Mayaguez and Ponce, and in and around San Juan. The general areas were selected by Stulberg, Rodman Rockefeller and Alberto Sanchez, ILGWU representative on the island, after an air inspection tour in July. The specific spots are being chosen in cooperation with the island government and the local authorities.

Priced at $12,000-$15,000

The homes will have two, three or four bedrooms and are expected to sell for $12,000 to $15,000. The price is within the reach of ILGWU members on the island—there are about 14,000—and other workers. Stulberg said sales will not be confined to garment workers.

One of the units will be named in honor of David Dubinsky, who retired in June after 34 years as ILGWU president and who is an AFL-CIO vice president.

A union spokesman said the loan is the largest single investment the ILGWU has ever made and grew out of successful cooperation with the IBEC in a smaller building project in Puerto Rico nine years ago.

The original project involved 400 homes. The use of poured concrete cut the cost to about $7,000 each, the spokesman said, with the value doubling since then.

Medicare Extension Ends This Month

Persons 65 and older who for good reasons missed the May 31 deadline for enrolling in the medical bill insurance portion of medicare can still sign up during September, Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball announced.

They will be protected beginning the sixth month following enrollment, Ball said. If they delay beyond Sept. 30, they will be unable to sign up until Oct. 1, 1967, and their premiums will be higher, he added.

Fraternal Delegates Review U.S. Goals

Blackpool, Eng.—The AFL-CIO "most emphatically" supports the foreign policy of the United States including "our commitment in Viet Nam," AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Paul Hall told the British Trades Union Congress here.

Hall, president of the Seafarers and an AFL-CIO fraternal delegate to the annual TUC meeting, vigorously defended U.S. policies although, as he said, he was "keenly aware that the course of the U.S. in Southeast Asia is, to put it mildly, not fully supported here."

His fellow fraternal delegate, Executive Vice Pres. William J. Farson of the Newspaper Guild, reviewed domestic problems and progress the AFL-CIO has experienced in the past year and pointed to the beginnings of "new and dramatic activity" which he said could lead to significant change in the U.S. and in which organized labor is "very much involved."

Hall emphasized that the AFL-CIO is "absolutely dedicated" to the cause of peace with freedom, and specifically is for a peaceful settlement in Viet Nam.

"This is the settlement which the U.S. government has sought to bring about through negotiations," he emphasized.

"Your government, as co-chairman with the Soviet government of the Geneva Conference, has made many efforts to have it reconvened for the purpose of seeking a peaceful settlement of the present conflict. But these efforts were fruitless, because Moscow would not do a thing to get the problem to the conference table. We, like you, believe in negotiated settlements. But it takes two sides to negotiate."

Hall said he was "frankly bewildered" by claims that "Viet Cong terrorists represent the will" of the South Vietnamese. South Viet Nam leaders proposed the election held Sept. 11, while the Communists tried to "sabotage" it, he pointed out.

"Some of you may have reservations about the policy of the U.S. in other respects," Hall added, "but I think I can say this for my country: For nearly half a century, at least as far back as the days following the first war, the American people and the American government have recognized that freedom and democracy tend to flourish best on full stomachs, on a tolerable present and a hopeful future—except in the case of Czechoslovakia whose democracy was subverted and destroyed by a fifth column backed by Russian military threats and pressures.

"The AFL-CIO is wholly in accord with that policy and seeks to further it in many ways . . . We have learned that what helps other free nations, or what helps new nations to be free, is also helpful to us. Some might want to call this a policy of enlightened self-interest. It certainly is not narrow self-interest. This policy is first and above all else in the interest of those whose freedom is protected and expanded."

Farson said that "thanks to organized labor's success in electing the right kind of people to office," the U.S. has "finally come around to putting some of the finishing touches" on the New Deal.

"And more than that, we have moved on to try to deal with some of the problems of a more recent change," he said.

'Inevitable March'

"There is resistance, of course. But throughout our history, the AFL-CIO has confronted the same sort of resistance—and overcome it—in our inevitable march toward social progress and economic justice. I am confident that we shall continue to do so."

Among the problems Farson pointed up was price increases in the face of lowering unit labor costs in manufacturing.

"If we have any kind of inflation in the U.S. today, it is a profit inflation," he said. "And it means not only distortions in income distribution, but it has other serious consequences as well. The huge profits that have been flowing into the corporate coffers, when combined with the incentive for investment which our present tax laws provide, have resulted in excessive spending and investment for new plants and equipment.

"Over the past three years, investment spending has been growing twice as fast as the total output of the economy. This is an imbalance which cannot be permitted to continue, for it means that we are adding to our productive capacity much more rapidly than our purchasing power is growing."

Trainmen's Book Tells Union's Story

Cleveland, O.—The Railroad Trainmen are distributing 300,000 copies of an illustrated booklet called "Cliff Merritt Sets the Record Straight." The 24-page book of drawings tells the story of railroading and BRT history in the United States and Canada.

Copies may be secured from the union at 666 Euclid Ave., Cleveland, O. 44114. BRT Pres. Charles Luna said.

Fordham Cites Wharton with Law Degree

New York—Pres. Hunter P. Wharton of the Operating Engineers was awarded an honorary degree of doctor of laws by Fordham University at a special ceremony in the Law School.

The citation, presented by Dr. John Meng, executive vice president for the university's Lincoln Center Campus, pointed out that Wharton "during 40 critical years . . . has served with distinction the cause of good trade unionism."

"That the members of his union walk with honor in the halls of labor is due in no small part to his dedicated and enlightened leadership," it declared.

Meng hailed Wharton's humanitarianism, and called his concern for accident prevention and safety for the man on the job "his distinctive hallmark" and his "consuming passion." Wharton, an AFL-CIO vice president, is a member of the AFL-CIO Standing Committee on Occupational Health, chairman of the accident prevention committee of the Building & Construction Trades Dept. and a former chairman of the National Safety Council's Labor Conference.

Rev. Leo McLaughlin, S.J., president of Fordham, presided at the ceremony. Those attending included AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Pres. Raymond J. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO.

That evening more than 2,000 persons attended a testimonial dinner for Wharton at which speakers included Fr. McLaughlin, Meany, Pres. Charles D. Aquadro of the Roofers, Pres. Edward J. Leonard of the Plasterers, and Executive Vice Pres. Richard H. Nolan and Reg. Dir. Howard Dalton of the Operating Engineers.

Major Jobless Areas Decline in August

The Labor Dept. reported that in August there were only 10 major job areas with substantial unemployment — in excess of 6 percent—compared to 19 a year ago.

Last month three such areas were reclassified as having joblessness ranging from 3 to 5.9 percent—Scranton, Pa., Wheeling, W. Va., and San Diego, Calif.

Areas still in the substantial unemployment category include Fresno, San Bernardino - Riverside - Ontario and Stockton, Calif.; Fall River, Lowell and New Bedford, Mass.; Atlantic City, N.J.; Altoona, Pa.; Mayaguez and Ponce, Puerto Rico.

state and local governments to borrow money to expand needed public facilities . . ."

"The buying power of weekly take-home pay" from June 1965 to June 1966 "rose only three-tenths of 1 percent" for a factory worker with three dependents and "six-tenths of 1 percent" for workers in contract construction, he told the committee.

Unit Costs Stable

There has been a "remarkable stability" in unit labor costs of manufactured goods this year after a "declining trend" between 1960 and 1965, but wholesale prices of industrial goods in July of this year were "2.5 percent more than a year ago and 4 percent above July 1964," he testified. "The spread between wholesale industrial prices and unit labor costs is greater than at any time since 1951."

The AFL-CIO opposed "these government subsidies" and the investment tax credit when they were enacted, Goldfinger reminded the committee. If there was any justification for them at the time, when business outlays were low, "there is a powerful argument for eliminating them at present," he said.

Government analysts expect business investment in new plants and machines to rise 17 percent this year, about twice as fast as the Gross National Product. This would mean a business investment "in the newest automated plants and machines about 55 percent greater than in 1963, when the capital goods boom began."

Such a trend is "unsustainable," he declared. "Business outlays for plants and machines cannot continue to rise twice as fast as total demand for too long," because it results "in a build-up of idle plants and machinery."

That is what happened after the capital goods boom of 1957-58, he pointed out, and businessmen in 1958 "cut back such outlays rather drastically, resulting in widespread plant shutdowns, layoffs and short workweeks."

The present situation "is one of unbalanced economic trends," Goldfinger said.

Removal of the special tax subsidies "would help to slow down the soaring rise of business outlays," he observed. "It would prod companies into reviewing their plans to boost such investment outlays and into postponement of some proportion of their expansion plans. It would curb the boom psychology that has been fanning out from the one-sector capital goods boom."

There is no "general economy-wide condition of inflationary shortages, no consumer scare-buying or hoarding," he observed. "There is yet a road ahead before America achieves job opportunities, at decent wages, for all persons willing and able to work."

Three top Administration officials backed up Johnson's request to Congress for suspension of the special tax provisions for business in testimony before the Ways & Means Committee.

Commerce Sec. John T. Connor said the boom in capital spending had proved a "major source of inflationary pressures." Treasury Sec. Henry H. Fowler attributed "a strong upward thrust in the demand on our resources" to "unforseeable" escalation of the Vietnamese war.

moved to table the legislation just seconds after the committee convened. His motion carried 12-7. But Rep. John D. Dingell (D.-Mich.), a backer of the bill, quickly changed his vote to support the tabling motion so that he could move for reconsideration at a later date. Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D.-W. Va.), who favors truth-in-packaging, scheduled a meeting Sept. 20 to vote on reviving the bill.

● Pres. Johnson vetoed—as "inflationary"—a bill strongly supported by AFL-CIO postal and federal employe unions to raise the government's contribution to life insurance for its employes. It had passed both the House and Senate with virtually no opposition, but the Administration contends that, added to the pay raise and benefit package earlier approved for federal employes, it would exceed the 3.2 percent "guidepost."

● Johnson signed two major safety bills at a White House ceremony, both backed by labor and consumer groups.

The auto safety legislation directs the secretary of commerce to set safety standards for all new cars and later for used cars. The first interim new car standards would apply to 1968 models, with stronger, permanent standards to be devised a year later.

The bill also authorizes federal safety standards and a uniform quality grading system for tires.

A separate Highway Safety Act applies a carrot-and-stick approach to encourage states to give greater attention to reducing traffic accidents.

The bill authorizes $322 million over three years for states which adopt federally-approved highway safety programs. That's the "carrot." The "stick" is a reduction of 10 percent in federal highway aid funds for any state that does not undertake an approved safety program.

Congressional leaders spoke hopefully of an Oct. 15 adjournment in order to free House members—and a third of the Senate—for the final election campaign effort. They had before them, however, a huge backlog of major bills. These include a number of appropriation bills and such key measures as the demonstration cities housing bill, continuation of the poverty program, further aid to elementary and high schools and to colleges, federal standards for unemployment insurance, truth-in-packaging and several health bills.

Hotel Unions Win Stronger Job Security

New York—Stronger job security provisions for workers hit by hotel closings have been won by the Hotel & Motel Trades Council, AFL-CIO, for 32,000 employes of more than 150 hotels.

A new four-year contract with the Hotel Association sharply restricts the contracting-out of work, limits overtime during layoff periods, gives a union the right to examine payroll records, and speeds up the recall of laid-off workers.

Retraining Program

The new pact also establishes a permanent training and promotion program. Workers who lose their jobs because of closings are assured separation pay and preference in rehiring.

Wages will increase up to $10.50 a week over the contract period, with a wage reopener in the fourth year and a 50-cent "subway escalator" in the event of another hike in subway fares.

Council Pres. Jay Rubin said the contract is retroactive to June 1. Under it, pensions will rise from $40 to $60 a month. The vacation pay of tip employes will be doubled, and vacation leaves are liberalized.

The loss of more than 3,000 jobs in recent industry shutdowns was the prime issue in talks that started last February. The new pact continues a record of essentially peaceful bargaining since 1939, said Rubin, whose council represents 10 local unions.

Election Lineups Take Final Form With Party Primaries in 12 States

count. A recount seemed inevitable even after the official tabulation.

The Democratic organization candidate, Atty. Gen. Thomas B. Finan, ran a bad third.

In the Democratic Senate primary in Massachusetts, former Gov. Endicott Peabody, a civil rights advocate, defeated Mayor John F. Collins of Boston.

Rep. Joseph W. Martin, former Republican Speaker of the House and former chairman of the Republican National Committee, was beaten for renomination in Massachusetts' 10th Congressional District. Eighty-one years old and a veteran of 42 years in the House, Martin was defeated by 35-year-old Mrs. Margaret Heckler.

No Anti-War Trend

There were no upsets of incumbents except for Martin, few indications that the primaries showed a trend for the November elections, except that self-described "anti-war" candidates fared badly.

These are the state-by-state results:

Arizona—Democratic Gov. Sam Goddard won renomination and will face former Mayor Jack Williams of Phoenix in his re-election campaign.

Colorado—A long-time Republican House member beaten in 1964, former Rep. J. Edgar Chenoweth, lost a comeback bid when he was defeated in the GOP primary in the 3rd Congressional District by the younger David Enoch, a former U. S. judge. GOP incumbent Gov. John A. Love and Sen. Gordon Allott were renominated. Democrats nominated Lt. Gov. Robert L. Knous for governor, State Sen. Roy R. Romer for the Senate.

Georgia—Former Gov. Ellis Arnall was the leader in the Democratic primary for governor but faces a runoff Sept. 28 against either State Sen. Jimmy Carter, also a racial moderate, or Lester Maddox, segregationist who closed his restaurant rather than serve Negroes. Rep. Howard W. (Bo) Calloway, a Goldwater backer, is the GOP nominee.

Sen. Richard B. Russell won renomination easily and will have no Republican opponent but three incumbent Democratic House members were either trailing or held only narrow leads in their primaries.

Maryland—Republicans nominated Spiro T. Agnew, administrator of Baltimore County suburban areas for governor to run against Sickles or Mahoney. Agnew indicated that on open-occupancy legislation, he was closer to Sickles, who voted for the House-passed civil rights bill, than to his other possible Democratic rival Mahoney.

Massachusetts—Republicans renominated Gov. John A. Volpe to run against McCormack and chose Atty.-Gen. Edward W. Brooke to face Peabody for the Senate seat being vacated by three-term Sen. Leverett G. Saltonstall. Brooke is a Negro and if elected would be the first of his race in the Senate since immediately after the Civil War.

Minnesota — Rolvaag, triumphantly renominated for governor in the Democratic primary, will be challenged by Republican Harold LeVander. Democratic Sen. Walter F. Mondale, appointed when Hubert H. Humphrey became Vice President, will face GOP nominee Robert Forsythe.

New Hampshire — Democratic Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre and Gov. John W. King won renomination without opposition. Former Gov. Hugh Gregg was named by the GOP to oppose King and a retired brigadier general, Harrison R. Thyng, a conservative, to challenge McIntyre. Deloris Bridges, widow of the late Sen. Styles Bridges, ran last against Thyng.

New Jersey—Republican liberal Sen. Clifford P. Case was renominated, with Warren Wilentz the Democratic victor over four other contenders.

Rhode Island—Incumbent Republican Gov. John H. Chafee, winner in 1964 despite the fact that Pres. Johnson got 81 percent of the state's vote, will face Warwick Mayor Horace E. Hobbs. Incumbent Sen. Claiborne Pell, Democrat, is challenged by Republican Ruth E. Briggs.

Utah—With neither governorship or a Senate seat at stake, the battle is in the congressional districts, with incumbent Republican Laurence J. Burton opposed by Democrat J. Keith Melville, a Brigham Young University faculty member, and incumbent Democrat David S. King challenged by former Rep. Sherman P. Lloyd.

Vermont — Democratic Gov. Phillip H. Hoff, seeking a third term, will face Richard A. Snelling, who beat a staff aide of Sen. Winston L. Prouty, Thomas L. Hayes, in the GOP primary.

Wisconsin—Incumbent Republican Gov. Warren P. Knowles will face Lt. Gov. Patrick J. Lucey, victor over three other candidates in the Democratic primary.

Unions to Help Restore Landmark

Virginia City — Members of building trades unions in northern Nevada will donate their labor on weekends to restore the Fourth Ward School at Virginia City — a historic landmark.

The state legislature had appropriated only part of the funds requested by the Virginia City Restoration Commission for the emergency work. Area contractors then agreed to provide materials and the building trades unions volunteered the skilled services of their members.

Network Pact Wins Approval Of Musicians

New York—Musicians Pres. Herman Kenin announced ratification of a new contract with the Columbia Broadcasting System, the National Broadcasting Co. and American Broadcasting Co. by a margin of more than two to one.

The agreement, covering musicians' wages, hours, working conditions, and staff orchestras in network TV and radio, calls for an average increase of about 10 percent for casual TV musicians as well as a continuing 5 percent in employer pension contributions and residuals. The NBC agreement also provides for four weeks vacations for staff musicians with 10 years of service, prorated after five years of service, and a three percent increase for staff musicians.

The two-year contract is effective Aug. 1, 1966. It also provides substantial gains for arrangers, orchestrators and copyists employed by the networks.

The agreement was approved by the affected musicians 426 to 198, with 869 members eligible to participate in the ratification vote. Balloting was under the supervision of the American Arbitration Association.

Major Conventions Tackle Challenges Facing Workers

THE LARGEST Steelworkers convention in the union's 30-year history roared its approval of a speech by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warning of attacks on the right to strike. USWA Pres. I. W. Abel pins a convention badge on Meany after his address. Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke is at the left.

Steel Union, IBEW, Carpenters Shape Programs for 3 Million

Three unions embracing nearly 3 million AFL-CIO members convened simultaneously this week to hammer out policies aimed at achieving true prosperity for the workers they represent.

Delegates to the three conventions—the Steelworkers in Atlantic City, the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in St. Louis and the Carpenters in Kansas City—faced a number of problems peculiar to their own industries and crafts. But overriding these were common issues stressed in officers' reports and speeches as posing major challenges to the labor movement and the nation. Among the most immediate were:

- The need to expand the broad base of worker buying power to counter threats to economic stability from runaway profits.
- The need to achieve and maintain jobs for all workers in the face of the revolution in productivity wrought by automation.
- The need to return and elect liberals to extend the progressive record of the 89th Congress and beat back attacks from the resurgent right wing.
- The need to press forward on every front the battles to wipe out poverty and fulfill the promise of full equality.

Detailed accounts of the opening sessions of the three conventions follow.

IBEW

By Willard Shelton

St. Louis—"Now is the time to press hard for the shorter workweek," Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told the union's 75th anniversary convention here.

Both the United States and Canada, he pointed out, "are enjoying the closest thing to full employment since World War II, and in four years since the IBEW's last convention there has been an increase of 4.5 million civilian jobs.

"Profits are at an all-time high," showing a 66 percent gain across five years for "net income after taxes," he continued. "Increased productivity has been a major cause of the tremendous rise."

"Have wages kept pace? They have not," he told the delegates. "And it is our belief that now is the time to raise wages."

"But more important than wages

Carpenters

Kansas City—The anti-poverty program initiated in Congress in the last two years "is merely the extension of a war the labor movement has been conducting for the better part of a century," Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson told the 30th convention of the Carpenters here.

In a wide-ranging keynote address, Hutcheson said that labor's objectives are exactly the same as those of the legislative program—"to ensure for every worker a wage sufficient to allow him and his family to live in reasonable comfort and security; to make the fullest amount of education possible for every child; to endow work with dignity and safety."

Reporting to the 2,200 delegates that membership in the union is nearing a record high of nearly 800,000, he nevertheless cited several potential dangers.

Steel

By Saul Miller

Atlantic City—The 1.1 million-member Steelworkers Union marked its 30th birthday at its largest convention ever with a "new sense of purpose" dedicated to turning back the conservative challenge in the November elections and calling for policies to prevent the country from going into an "economic tailspin."

These themes were set out in the keynote speech by USWA Pres. I. W. Abel and the officers report to the 13th constitutional convention, attended by a record 3,600 delegates.

They were strongly reinforced and coupled with a warning from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany that there are forces in Congress threatening to restrict the right to strike in private employment, which would, he stressed, be an attack "on the basic foundation of the American trade union movement."

Meany, emphasizing the importance of the congressional off-year elections, praised the Steelworkers' support for COPE and called on all labor to "work a little harder this year" to maintain liberal margins in Congress.

As to the basic attack on labor that was evidenced during the airline strike when proposals to force the strikers back to their jobs were made in Congress, Meany said: "We intend to fight to preserve the right to strike, to preserve collective bargaining, and to preserve the American trade union movement with its tradition of freedom for the individual under our constitution."

The convention had before it nearly 3,000 resolutions submitted by local unions and districts in the U.S. and Canada dealing with basic policy positions and possible changes in the union's bargaining structure.

The officers report from Abel,

Union Proposal to GE Cites 8 Priority Areas

By Eugene A. Kelly

New York—Union negotiators gave General Electric Co. representatives a counter-proposal at contract bargaining sessions here with a warning that the company's first contract offer must be improved if agreement is to be reached by Oct. 2.

The counter-proposal was presented by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, whose bargaining committee includes representatives of the 11 unions that make up the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining.

On the legal front, Supreme Court Justice John M. Harlan granted an application temporarily staying an appellate court ruling that GE need not bargain with the 11-union committee representing 115,000 employes. Harlan, sitting alone while the high court is in summer recess, acted on an application filed by the U.S. solicitor general for the National Labor Relations Board.

GE had been ordered to bargain with the IUE committee by a U.S. District Court, but the order was set aside by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Harlan's action stays the Circuit Court ruling at least until Oct. 24, or until the Supreme Court acts on a petition for review. Bargaining continues in the meantime with all members of the national committee free to participate.

The latest union proposal was drafted by the IUE and the 11-member national committee. The group is composed of AFL-CIO unions which have collective bargaining contracts with either GE or Westinghouse or both.

The union bargainers told GE they are willing to modify their original proposals, presented in August, provided GE will improve

Meany Links 'Shabby' Filibuster On Rights Bill to Repeal of 14(b)

By David L. Perlman

The 1966 civil rights bill was blocked by the same "shabby" filibuster tactics used to block repeal of Taft-Hartley's "right-to-work" Section 14(b), AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared, pointing up the analogy with this statement:

"It is with sincere regret that I am forced to repeat the exact words that I used when the Senate, using the very same tactics, killed the bill to repeal Section 14(b). I said then, and I repeat now:

" 'The AFL-CIO is, of course, deeply disappointed that the democratic process in the Senate has been thwarted by the shabby parliamentary tactics of Sen. Dirksen and a minority of senators.' "

The Senate dropped the House-passed civil rights bill as it had dropped the House-passed 14(b) repealer—after two cloture votes showed a majority in favor of bringing the legislation to a vote, but not the two-thirds required under Senate rules to shut off debate.

On the second cloture try, the official vote was 52-41. Including absent senators who were paired or whose positions were officially announced, the Senate division was 57-43 for ending the filibuster. On a party breakdown, 45 of the 67 Democrats supported cloture while 22 of the 34 Republicans followed Dirksen's lead in opposing consideration of the bill.

It was a Mississippi Democrat, Sen. James O. Eastland, who pointed up another aspect of the filibuster battle.

Eastland issued a press statement declaring: "The old-time coalition

Rubber Workers Urged to Press For 'Fair Share' of Huge Profits

By Robert B. Cooney

Bal Harbour—Peter Bommarito, newly elected president of the Rubber Workers, has served notice on the Big Four rubber companies that the union intends to seek and win "a fair share" of the industry's record profits in negotiations next spring.

Bommarito, who became the fourth president of the 31-year-old union in a near-unanimous vote of 783 delegates here, stressed unity in his acceptance speech.

He pointed the URW towards the crucial negotiations with the Big Four — Goodyear, Firestone, U.S. Rubber and Goodrich. Contracts with these companies cover 70,000 members and expire Apr. 20. Pension and insurance pacts with the Big Four expire next Sept. 15. All told, negotiations in 1967 will affect 80 percent of URW membership.

"I want each of the companies to know that the full resources and support of the URW are behind the negotiators," Bommarito said.

One of the thorny issues, he said, is the growing spread between the wage and benefit levels of other skilled workers—particularly those in the construction industry—and skilled trades rates in URW plants. This problem must be solved without sacrificing the gains to which production workers are entitled, Bommarito declared.

No Breathing Spell

He said the union will have no breathing spell from the time its international policy committee meets to set contract goals. He emphasized that leadership is needed throughout the union to make clear to the companies that a union which just changed its officers is not disorganized but unified and determined.

"The profits of the rubber and plastics industries are at an all-time high, as evidenced by the financial reports issued by the various companies. The nation's economy is strong and expanding. We intend to expand with it.

"The membership of the URW is entitled to receive, expects to receive, and will receive a fair share of this profit pie," Bommarito told the convention.

PETER BOMMARITO

In other actions, the delegates:

- Created a URW Political Education Dept. whose function will be to promote dollar drives in support of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education and to coordinate URW political action programs. Each local union was directed to set up a political education committee.
- Called for restoration of the former tariff on imported rubber-soled footwear, protesting that the impact of rising imports has cost URW locals a 21 percent drop in jobs.

The Rubber Workers warned it has "serious reservations" about continuing its support of the trade development and multi-national tariff reduction policies of the Trade Expansion Act of 1962 unless Congress and the Administration provide protection of jobs and standards of American workers.

The resolution called on union members to press their congressmen to bring Senate Res. 100 to the House floor so the House can join the Senate in opposing any tariff negotiations in the Kennedy round which go beyond the authority of the 1962 trade act.

- Affirmed their support of Pres. Johnson's proposal to suspend the 7 percent investment tax credit and the rapid depreciation allowance.

The convention also hit the Administration's guidelines for ignoring "the fantastic rate of increase in profits" and urged that the URW policy committee which will map wage goals in January pay full attention to the role of bargaining in expanding purchasing power.

- Demanded that the present session of Congress act to clamp a ceiling on interest rates and also move to divert funds into the residential mortgage market to reverse the downturn in housing starts.

The URW also backed labor's demand for a larger voice in the formulation of monetary policy by including consumer representation in the structure of the Federal Reserve System.

- Called on the incoming 90th Congress to hold public hearings on plant piracy and plug the loophole which permits federally subsidized industrial bond financing.
- Praised the value of the Negro-labor alliance, with labor backing civil rights goals and Negroes voting against anti-labor candidates.

The URW pledged full support to the social revolution of Negroes and other minorities and "all assistance possible to the legitimate civil rights groups" which seek full equality, justice and brotherhood in the total community.

Katzenbach Shifts To State Dept. Post

Pres. Johnson has named Atty. Gen. Nicholas Katzenbach to be under secretary of state, succeeding George W. Ball, who has resigned. The President also filled next ranking jobs in the department, naming Eugene V. Rostow under secretary for economic affairs and Foy D. Kohler, now ambassador to Moscow, as deputy under secretary.

The President did not immediately name a successor to Katzenbach as head of the Justice Dept.

'Now Is the Time':

IBEW Drive Pushed For Shorter Week

are fringes, and still more important is the shorter workweek."

"I hope delegates will go home determined to push for the shorter workweek here and now," the IBEW president said in his keynote address.

"Should unemployment come in the future, we will be better prepared for it. The shorter workweek, with no loss in pay, creates more jobs for all."

The 2,500 delegates to the IBEW's diamond jubilee convention came back to the city where the union was founded in 1891 to lay plans for future organizing and for coordinated bargaining with other unions. They also were to consider a series of resolutions dealing with the 850,000-member organization's internal affairs.

"Our union stands tall today, but there is no time to rest on our laurels," Freeman said.

"The experts project that electricity consumption will increase approximately 200 percent by 1980," which means "more installation, more equipment, more communications and transportation."

But "the electronic world of today demands very special training and skills," he warned. "We have the training courses. We can man the jobs. But IBEW members must be ready for them."

The jobs "must be organized, too," he said. "There are perhaps a million workers in some phase of electricity who are completely outside the labor movement who should be in it."

More Apprentices Urged

The construction locals, Freeman said, must expand their apprenticeship classes. The manufacturing, telephone and utility locals must bring new workers into their membership.

"The smooth-working relationship" worked out by 11 unions in current Westinghouse-General Electric collective bargaining should lead to "a better spirit of cooperation" in regard to organizing in the manufacturing field, he told the delegates.

"Our relationships with the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers are better than they have ever been," he continued. "With all the hundreds of thousands of unorganized there are, it is my hope that we will come to amicable understandings about campaigns and expend more of our energies fighting anti-union attitudes" among companies and the general public.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz in a major convention speech acknowledged that there was a rise in living costs that must be checked, but pointed out that in the four years since the last IBEW convention the purchasing power of workers has risen, along with their incomes, "by at least twice as much" as the 8 percent attributed to inflation. He said:

"Behind all the argument about who killed the guidelines — or whether they are dead—is the story of the most remarkable period of economic growth and economic stability in the country's history."

There is "a feeling in the country of both achievement and restlessness and discontent," the secretary said, that perhaps "too many people are still left out."

"This economy can stand anything it is necessary for it to stand for human good," Wirtz said. "It has been the proudest thing of my four years to see labor support every public-interest program."

In another speech, Pres. Richard W. Osburn of the National Electrical Contractors' Association pointed out that his group had been able to stand "side by side with labor on controversial issues," back to the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 and the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959.

"It was not popular in management circles" for the contractors' association to urge passage of the situs picketing bill and repeal of Section 14(b), but years of "successful and practical" harmony in the construction industry had gone before, he pointed out.

Harold Russell, chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, paid tribute to Freeman's work as vice chairman and the support given by labor generally to the placement of handicapped workers.

Delegates voted to increase the salary of Freeman from $28,000 to $40,000 and that of Sec. Joseph D. Keenan from $26,500 to $38,000.

Increases also were vote for members of the executive council, vice presidents and international representatives.

Freeman, Keenan and Treas. Jeremiah P. Sullivan were re-elected to new terms without opposition.

House Unit Clears Packaging Bill Limited to 'Voluntary' Standards

The House Commerce Committee approved a compromise "truth-in-packaging" bill, somewhat weaker than the Senate-passed legislation.

The compromise won unanimous approval, ending a weeks-long battle within the closely-divided committee over whether to have any legislation at all.

At one stage, when most supporters of the packaging bill were absent, the committee voted 13-6 to table—and thus kill—the legislation. The measure was revived at a later meeting by a 17-14 vote for reconsideration of the tabling action. All 17 votes to revive the bill came from committee Democrats; nine Republicans and five Democrats opposed reconsideration.

As passed by the Senate by a 71-9 vote in June, the bill would give authority to the government to regulate the variety of weights and measures in which food and most items found on supermarket shelves could be packaged. The government would act only if the manufacturers couldn't agree on voluntary standards.

The House committee amended the bill to authorize only voluntary standards. The secretary of commerce would have to seek specific authority from Congress to set standards in the absence of industry agreement. Committee Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.) said the "compromise" was suggested by the Commerce Dept.

In other congressional developments:

- Pres. Johnson signed and hailed a new federal mine safety law setting safety standards and federal-state inspection of mines not covered by existing laws, which deal mostly with coal mines. Newly-covered mining operations would include copper, uranium, sand, gravel, iron, potash and crushed stone.

The legislation, Johnson said, will give "sorely needed protection" to an "important segment of American labor."

- The House made an additional cut in a foreign aid appropriations bill already reduced in committee. The Appropriations Committee had sliced $293 million from the $3.5 billion authorization and the House voted 187-182 approval of a Republican recommittal motion which pared another $45 million. The money bill was then passed, 234-141, and sent to the Senate.
- By voice vote, the House amended the Manpower Development & Training Act to set up a new program of job training and placement assistance for older workers—those over 45.
- The House approved a Senate-passed bill establishing a 12-member commission to study the Hatch Act and other legislation restricting political activities of federal employes.

Election Drive, Income Needs Set Themes for Steel Union

Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke and Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony urged a more vigorous national economic policy, stressing that workers are not sharing fairly in corporate profits. They were critical of the wage-price guideposts, said the country can afford to provide a minimum income for all Americans and called for devoting more of the nation's resources to curing the causes of poverty, discrimination, lack of skills and ill health.

On the guideposts, the report said that if the government is to salvage anything from its policy it must at least "be willing to apply an after-the-fact, cost-of-living catch-up formula as part of its wage policy."

In a section on the basic steel industry, the officers declared that the incomes of workers "deserve the guarantee and continuity that managerial salaries possess."

77,000 New Members

Abel, in his keynote address, reviewed the activities of the USWA in the past two years and reported "a surge of vigorous activity in our local unions." A total of 77,000 new members have been organized and 428 new local unions chartered.

He hit a number of dangers the union faces—immediately the threat from the right in the November elections, the implications of automation in the steel industry, the spectre of poverty in an affluent society, the unfinished job of full civil rights and civil liberties for all, and the rising prices and interest rates that threaten the stability of the economy.

On the recent election in the union, Abel commented that the contest with former Pres. David J. McDonald strengthened the union and that the USWA has in the past two years taken its "proper place" and is playing its proper role in the trade union movement.

He defined also the role of the union as existing "to resolve the problems of its members." And on union officials he commented: "The man who works for this union must be a man with a deep sense of compassion for people. He must possess a sense of conviction and dedication to the labor movement. We have too much to do in this union, we have too far to travel, to be burdened with people whose only interest is a good job."

Meany, praising Abel for his "outstanding leadership," said the labor movement faces a series of problems and challenges. Of the legislative picture he said the past two years "despite some disappointments have been outstanding in the record of legislation enacted for the benefit of the little people of America."

He noted that the minimum wage bill adopted by Congress will not directly affect very many members of the AFL-CIO, but that everybody will benefit from the new purchasing power it will bring to the economy.

For the legislative work to continue, he stressed, labor must have "more friends, more of those who believe in the ideals and principles of the American trade union movement, in the Congress." Labor, he said, must be more effective at the polls than in the past although its record is continually improving.

However, he noted, labor places its greatest reliance in collective bargaining and the right to strike, adding, "I can say to you that there is a strong possibility that this right may be challenged in the legislative halls of the nation before very long."

Referring to the airlines strike and the legislative proposals made at the time—and actually passed in the Senate—to send men back to their jobs, Meany declared:

"There are people in Congress who would enact legislation compelling you and me to work for somebody else's private profit on the ground that there is a paramount public interest in what you do. Well, I say if there is a paramount public interest that is so great that you have to take away the liberty of the individual worker, that you have to take away from him his right to quit work, then I say the paramount public interest is so great that nobody should make a profit from the business."

Through collective bargaining and the strike weapon, Meany asserted, "labor has rendered a service to the country" through a long record of achievement. He cited elimination of child labor, safety legislation, ending sweatshops, sanitary and protective laws, protection of women in the shop, workmen's compensation and employment compensation as stemming from the activities of the trade union movement. These were good for all of America, not just the members of unions, he declared.

There has been no legislation for the benefit of the people as a whole that has not always had the support of organized labor, Meany said. But now labor's effectiveness is being challenged: "They are going to try to make nice unions. They want nice unions, you know, unions that do not disturb people and do not disturb the peace." That kind of union, without the right to strike, comes to the bargaining table "with merely a prayer," he observed.

As to the future of the nation's economic system, the AFL-CIO president averred that the mass production system must be matched by increased mass purchasing power "or it will fall on its face," and the increased purchasing power must come from strong unions striving to advance the good of the nation.

Same Old Arguments

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz told the convention that the arguments used today to allegedly protect the nation from inflation "are exactly the same arguments cast sometimes in different form which have been used to stop every forward step this country has taken in the last 35 years. I don't want to see the American economy and the American society stopped in all that it is doing in the name of protecting against inflation, because it isn't necessary."

He praised the USWA officers' report as coming closer to "marking out an agenda for new liberalism than anything else that I have read in hardheaded, practical but idealistic terms."

Wirtz said there are three elements in a new liberalism for the nation: recognition of the absolute necessity of full and complete equal education; recognition of the necessity of absolutely complete and equal representation of all people in this country, economic as well as political representation; recognition that individuals are not made to serve an economic system "but to be served by an economic system."

He noted that in his four years as Secretary of Labor the trade union movement "has supported every single public interest program," that labor "never loses sight of the fact that the only thing that counts is the fulfillment of the individual human purpose."

United Nations Ambassador Arthur J. Goldberg, former general counsel of the union, told the delegates that the basic principles that have brought a reasonable approach to industrial relations in the U.S. are applicable to foreign affairs, the principle of self-determination and the duty on both sides to bargain in good faith.

The conflict in Viet Nam will be settled in accordance with those principles, he said.

Auto Hikes Blunt Drive For Economic Stability

Government regulatory agencies clamped a ceiling on interest rates banks can pay depositors as an anti-inflation step. But the Administration's drive for economic stability appeared to have been blunted by new car price increases announced by the Big Three manufacturers—General Motors, Ford and Chrysler.

Pres. Johnson expressed "regret" at the price boosts and Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther denounced them as "unjustifiable and outrageous."

Reuther said auto companies could have cut car prices and still made fat profits. "There should be an immediate congressional investigation of the whole field of prices, costs and profits in the automobile industry," he declared.

As was the case last year when auto prices were raised by smaller amounts, the companies ascribed the increases to the cost of previously optional equipment made standard. The price boosts varied by car models, up to $89 at General Motors, up to $347 at Ford and up to $359 at Chrysler.

Based on anticipated sales, the higher prices will take nearly $1 billion additional out of consumer pockets during the coming year.

The curb on bank interest was designed in part to halt what Pres. Johnson termed a "fierce race" between commercial banks and savings and loan associations for deposits. The drain on savings associations—the traditional source of mortgage money—is regarded as a major factor in the money squeeze which has pushed home construction to recession levels.

Johnson termed rising interest rates "among the most dangerous threats to the economy."

Both at the signing ceremony for the interest rate control bill—a much weaker measure than the AFL-CIO had urged Congress to pass—and at a later news conference, Johnson hinted that a tax increase may still be necessary.

He said he will review the situation with his advisers when Congress completes work on pending appropriation bills, "then we will make our judgment and we will immediately submit it to Congress."

Showdown Near

The House Ways & Means Committee, meanwhile, neared a showdown decision on the President's request for a temporary suspension of the 7 percent investment tax credit—originally designed to encourage business spending on new equipment at a time when the economy was stagnant.

The suspension move is strongly supported by labor, but is being fought by many corporations which stand to lose out on "windfall" profits.

Bilik to Join Staff Of State-County Union

Cincinnati—Al Bilik has announced that he will resign effective Oct. 31 as president of the Cincinnati AFL-CIO to become assistant to Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, with headquarters in Washington.

Counter Proposal to GE Cites 8 Priority Areas

the offer it made Sept. 14, particularly in these eight areas:

- An escalator clause keyed to changes in the cost-of-living index, instead of two 3-cent-an-hour increments proposed by GE.
- Nine paid holidays now, instead of three years from now.
- A better wage offer, including a cents-per-hour minimum.
- Higher increases for skilled trades workers, applied over a wider range of jobs.
- Changes in the GE pension offer to eliminate those instances which would mean a loss, rather than a gain, for some workers.
- A start on a definite program for eliminating geographic wage differentials, some of which are now very wide.
- Improvements in three aspects of life, health and hospital insurance—full employer financing, payment of benefits without deductions, and provisions for sickness and accident pay.
- Stronger contract protection in such areas as arbitration of grievances, union security, and released time for workers on union business.

While the IUE was presenting these proposals, the NLRB delayed to Sept. 26 the start of a trial examiner's hearing into refusal-to-bargain charges pending against GE.

At recent meetings with the IUE and its "mixed" committee, GE management has treated the non-IUE members as if they were not present and ignored questions and comment from them, union sources reported.

The national committee, which will meet with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany for a report on bargaining Sept. 28 in Washington, was formed last March. Member unions agreed to a set of common objectives and coordinated bargaining. GE first walked out of a meeting of the enlarged committee but returned when the NLRB obtained the bargaining order from the U.S. District Court in New York City.

Behind in Wages

The unions say GE and Westinghouse have fallen far behind other leading manufacturers on wages and fringe benefits.

Both firms have been bargaining with the national committee under protest. Besides IUE, member unions are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Steelworkers and Carpenters. They represent 115,000 union workers at GE and 65,000 at Westinghouse.

Sharp Rise in Food Costs Pushes Price Index Up

A sharp increase in food prices sent the Labor Dept.'s consumer price index up four-tenths of 1 percent in August, further whittling away factory workers' purchasing power.

Paced by a 18 percent hike in egg prices and sharp increases in the cost of meat and vegetables, as well as the higher cost of medical services, the CPI was up 3.5 percent above August a year ago.

Over the year, food prices have climbed 5.2 percent and consumer services were up 4.3 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said. Food prices did not decline last month as expected.

Coupled with the increase in prices was a continuing drop in net spendable earnings for factory workers—down 20 cents. Although take-home pay was up $2.50 a week over August 1965, the increase was offset by the rise in consumer prices resulting in a seven-tenths of 1 percent reduction in purchasing power since July.

A Blow Against Poverty

"THE TEST of our progress," in the memorable words of Franklin D. Roosevelt, "is not whether we add more to the abundance of those who have much; it is whether we provide enough for those who have too little."

It was in this spirit that the 75th Congress in 1938 passed the Fair Labor Standards Act to set a floor under wages, a ceiling over hours.

That first wage floor was only 25 cents an hour, low even by depression standards, and the ceiling was 44 hours a week. But it was a start. As with social security and so much other New Deal legislation, it provided a foundation on which to build.

The 89th Congress last week applied FDR's test of progress by voting to raise the minimum wage in steps to $1.60 an hour and to extend its coverage to 8 million additional workers. Signing the 1966 amendments into law is a President who, in 1938, was one of the congressmen signing the discharge petition which brought the original wage-hour bill to the House floor and made possible its passage.

This latest improvement in the Fair Labor Standards Act is more than routine. It marks the biggest step forward in the 28-year history of the law.

For the first time persons receiving the minimum wage will rise above the bare poverty level, although not by much.

For the first time such traditionally low-paid groups as laundry and hospital workers will be fully covered and retail employes, hotel and restaurant workers will be largely protected.

And for the first time—in what AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has termed a "desperately needed breakthrough"—Congress voted to include a substantial group of farm workers in the law.

The minimum for farm workers will rise only to $1.30 an hour and many of the neediest will not be covered. It is, Meany noted, "not a high enough minimum and not broad enough coverage." But this, too, is just a start. The massive corporate farm enterprises are no longer immune to social legislation. And it is about time. Poverty may be more visible in city slums, but it is no less real and tragic in the countryside.

DURING THE LENGTHY congressional consideration of this latest advance in the minimum wage, we were treated to the familiar cries of alarm. A higher minimum wage, we were told, would curtail employment opportunities by pricing the less-efficient workers out of the job market.

The argument might carry more weight if it were not such an old tune. It has been used against every increase in the minimum wage. And after each increase Labor Dept. surveys have found that the feared job loss just didn't take place. The economy was healthier and stronger.

Higher wages have long been recognized as the most effective weapon against poverty and as an essential ingredient to a healthy, balanced economy.

Labor's satisfaction at this monumental step forward does not dim the case for a $2-an-hour minimum. That figure was not advanced by the AFL-CIO as a mere bargaining point. It represents what is needed for a self-sufficient economy so that persons with full-time jobs will no longer be "the working poor," depending in many cases on welfare grants to supplement an inadequate family income. Society in effect has been subsidizing low-wage employers.

The goal will be reached if future Congresses do as well as the 89th in meeting Roosevelt's still-valid "test of our progress."

Dead Aim

As Knowledge Advances:

Shortage of Health Manpower Poses Crisis in Medical Care

THE NATION is in the throes of a medical revolution that gives promise of richer, healthier and more rewarding lives for all citizens. Whether the promise is realized depends on whether critical challenges can be met.

Strides already made over the last three decades are impressive. Scientific and medical miracles have become almost commonplace. Recently an artificial heart was developed and put to use with the expectation that in time it could add many years to the lives of millions of people.

In 1965 more medical care legislation was passed than in any other year of the nation's history. Some 15 bills were enacted, the most impressive of which was medicare.

In 1929 we were devoting about 3.5 percent of the Gross National Product to medicare. In 1965 the allotment reached about 5.9 percent of the GNP. This is only one yardstick, but it does indicate the spurt even before the revolution was in full swing. Today we as a people are putting about $40 billion into medical care each year. Yet, is it enough?

About 3 million persons are now employed in the total health industry. It is estimated that at least 500,000 additional health workers are needed in all categories—physicians, dentists, nurses and all the allied personnel that make up the industry. Legislation has been enacted to provide training in some of these fields, but few believe it is sufficient to meet the shortage.

Just as critical a stumbling block is the shockingly low pay for semi-professional and non-professional workers in the health field. Some progress is being made here where nurses, technicians and other hospital workers have taken the problem into their own hands and organized unions and have used, where necessary, the strike weapon to improve their economic status.

Earlier this year Under Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare Wilbur J. Cohen told a Conference on Job Development & Training for Workers in Health Services:

"The salary level in the allied health fields . . . is still so low that recruitment and retention of personnel are a recurring headache to administrators of hospitals and nursing homes and other health facilities.

"I think the public has to be educated, if you will, has to be persuaded to the concept that good health has to be paid for in terms of relative opportunities in other fields in our economy, in terms of payment to all workers in the health field, if we are going to get the supply of trained manpower and woman power that is required for the future expansion of health programs."

LOOKING DEEPER into the health manpower shortages at the same conference, the then commissioner of education, Francis Keppel, estimated that by 1975 an increase of a million persons will be needed in all medical occupations—about 10,000 new jobs a month.

The total includes some 60,000 more doctors, but the greatest demand will be for non-professional workers.

The conference, sponsored by the Departments of Labor and HEW, gave number one priority to raising wages as a way of improving the image of these non-professional jobs and attracting new workers. Also high on the list were improvements of fringe benefits, working conditions, providing opportunities for advanced training and promotion and greater job security.

In this fast-paced, complex industrial age the American people are not getting the medical care this rich nation is capable of providing.

Keppel pointed out that:

"We no longer have the lowest infant mortality rate in the world. Life expectancy is greater in most of the other industrial countries of the world, exceeding ours in some places by as much as five years. The U.S. death rate from heart disease is the highest in the world.

"The mortality rate of males in the highest productivity bracket, from ages 40 to 54, is substantially higher in the United States than in other industrial countries, and is twice the rate of Sweden.

"These are tell-tale indicators. We are not doing our best. We are not doing what we should. Our knowledge is not lacking, but our service personnel and facilities are." (PAI)

Reconstruction Goals Widen Task of Marines in Viet Nam

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

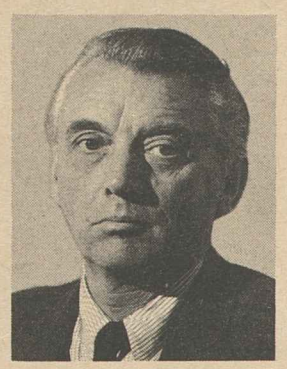
SAIGON—From the halls of Montezuma and the shores of Tripoli, the United States Marines have greatly expanded their travels. They now hold, for instance, an exotic beachhead on the northeast coast of South Viet Nam edging the South China Sea.

It is both a treacherous and a promising place. It brims with wild, tropical beauty—vaulting mountains clothed in tightly-knit forest growth with thin white waterfalls tumbling down it like trimming on a garment; dense jungle; green rolling valleys and rivers serpentining through them to the sea which comes up to caress and polish wide stretches of glistening sand.



Morgan

You can close your eyes and, in a moment of both fascination and horror, imagine the Danang Hilton rising on that crescent beach across the bay, a country club and suburban development just over the ridge toward the ancient imperial ctiy of Hue, all connected, naturally, by an expressway to Danang's supersonic international airport.

We're getting a little ahead of ourselves, however. Danang's huge base handles almost nothing but military traffic still, and the Marines' business is unfinished. The mission of the 57,000 Leathernecks in Viet Nam, says a corps release, "is to destroy the Communist Viet Cong and to build the confidence of the Vietnamese people in their government."

In other words, the Marines are not only at war, they are in politics. But it is a little different from the gunboat diplomacy in vogue when they occupied the banana republics of Central America two generations ago. There is an added facet to the assignment that would make an old-time drill sergeant at boot camp burst a blood vessel in outrage and humiliation. It is not enough to kill the enemy any more. A Marine must know—and do—something now about civil reconstruction too.

A native of Waubaunsee County, Kans., Lewis William Walt, age 53, eyes blue, hair salty brown crewcut, build bulky and powerful, dedication deep, is running this double-barreled Marine show in Viet Nam. A lieutenant general since March, he commands the Third Marine Amphibious Force whose Operation Hastings in August may have been the most important military action yet against the Communists because it surprised, broke up and defeated large elements of North Vietnamese army units before they could mount their own apparent objective: seizure of key towns and the city of Quang Tri, capital of South Viet Nam's northernmost province.

This reporter had the good fortune to accompany Walt by helicopter, jeep and foot on an inspection of some of his outermost positions on the very edge of the demilitarized zone along the 17th parallel boundary between North and South Viet Nam.

There is an exhilaration to such an experience that is both reassuring and dangerous. The causes of wars can be terribly involved and efforts to end them even more complicated. But until recently the individual battle problem was refreshingly—if ruggedly and perilously—simple: seek out the enemy and destroy him. Some politicians, who may have failed at their own assignments, insist on applying this formula to every combat situation. In this subversive guerrilla war it is often impossible to identify the enemy until he shoots first and then it may be too late. Still, an observer, and a civilian observer at that, is intoxicated with pride and humbled in awe at the job the young American fighting man is doing in the treacherous jungle of war and politics in Viet Nam.

RECENTLY a Marine artillery position at Cam Lo in Quang Tri province, only seven miles from the DMZ, was surprised at night by a North Vietnamese force. Third Marine Division officers briefed us on the action. The unit had been punished but the enemy had suffered brutally by comparison. Seventy-eight enemy bodies were counted in and around the barbed wire circling the Marine tanks and howitzers. A captured North Vietnamese yielded a map of the position, drawn, perhaps by a "farmer" in the field below. Root them out, military instinct says, be ruthless with our superior fire power and fantastically refined equipment and make them suffer.

But the enemy keeps coming. He must have a breaking point somewhere but we haven't touched it yet. Walt and other wise generals in other branches of the armed services know that such engagements are only part of this war. That is why Walt, for one, has formed coordinating councils with Vietnamese officials so that eventually the "farmers" in the fields will be planting rice, not sabotage or subversion.

This happy day is a long way off. It may be that joint civilian-military efforts to bring it about will fail. But we are in it too deep to abandon the experiment at this point. The key rule must be not to let the military effort outrun the effort for civil reconstruction. Then if the Marines want to weekend at the Danang Hilton, that's their business. Certainly they and the remainder of the armed forces, U.S. and South Vietnamese and allied, engaged in this war, will have earned a rest.

Stalling by Carriers Charged As Rail Rules Dispute Persists

THE SEVEN-YEAR DISPUTE over railroad work rules is further from settlement today than when it first erupted, the president of one of the railroad unions declared.

The compulsory arbitration law Congress enacted "merely postponed settlement" of the issues rather than disposing of them as intended, said Pres. Neil Speirs of the Switchmen's Union on Labor News Conference, a weekly network radio interview over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

"We have not been able to reach any agreement with the railroads" on the "crew consist," or train crew size issues, Speirs said, pointing out that the carriers have "refused to negotiate at the local level or on the individual railroads."

That is where "the dispute should and must be resolved," he asserted. He said that rail management is now "demanding that we again bring the dispute up to the national level and handle it as a national railroad dispute."

"We believe that they have a very definite purpose in doing this," he said. If they are successful in getting (the issue) to the national level, he declared, the management could then create another national emergency in the hopes of getting additional Congressional action.

SPEIRS SAID that collective bargaining can't work effectively under a threat of compulsion.

"You must have an atmosphere where there is a degree of uncertainty."

He said that the threat of a forced settlement prolonged the recent Machinists' strike against the airlines, just as it has dragged out the railroad work rules dispute.

Reporters questioning Speirs on the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview were Stanley Chapman of Traffic World magazine and Duane Emme of Labor Newspaper.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE GRIM TRIUMPH of Sen. Dirksen's cooperation in filibustering the civil rights bill was forecast in advance, and it ended a series of successful bills in which the conscience of the white majority in America attempted to meet a century of wrongs since the Yankee slave traders entered with their ships. The Dirksen operation was a sadness—and not least because the aging, flamboyant Republican from Illinois did a good deal of showboating about it in press conferences.

The potential power of the Republican leader in the Senate to block a two-thirds vote for cloture on a southern Democratic filibuster of a civil rights bill was never in doubt.

He could have blocked passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 by leading GOP senators to vote against cloture to shut off the filibuster.

He could have blocked passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 by leading GOP senators to vote against cloture.

It is not necessary any more to thank him for his kindnesses of 1964 and 1965 when he helped break the filibusters.

CONGRESS HAS been dealing this year, in the bill Dirksen defeated in the Senate, with the issue of de facto segregation of Negroes in northern cities into internal ghettos—in housing, schools, education and social services.

It is a far more difficult issue to handle than the crude violence against Negroes in southern communities, because that can be enjoined by the courts.

What the country is up against is whether all the cities turn black, whether all the suburbs turn white, whether the real estate operators can block any and all Negro families from buying a house in a "white" neighborhood.

The courts cannot compel a property owner to sell his property to a member of a minority race.

Congress, however, can pass a law declaring that the operators of major apartment developments and the owners of other residential property cannot in the future refuse to sell or rent to a member of a minority race.

This was all that was involved in the open-occupancy section of the civil rights bill that Dirksen killed in the Senate this year.

The question of comparisons between the North and the South must be perceived clearly. The northern cities are more severe on housing, which is the key issue, than the South. The majority of the Negro minority in American life now lives in the North, not the South—and still has not found a way to full citizenship.

THE ISSUE that Dirksen raised about the constitutionality of an open-occupancy section disappeared when the Illinois Republican leader suddenly told reporters that there were other sections of the Civil Rights Bill of 1966 to which he objected.

The other sections involved proposed restrictions on discrimination in jury selection. A jury of one's peers is a basic right in Anglo-American jurisprudence, and "peers" does not mean an all-white grand jury or an all-white trial jury.

The torment in American society cannot be cured without a full acceptance of the proposition that all men are created free and equal.

Spokesmen of both political parties recognized this in earlier civil rights measures, and they were approved by bipartisan majorities. Bipartisan action is the only way in which issues of human rights can be kept free from entanglements in wholly extraneous matters of party politics.

Sen. Dirksen removed himself from a contribution when he went against the bill. Sometimes there are choices in American political life.

Dirksen made a bad choice, an irresponsible choice, for the party he leads in the Senate, as he has done throughout the 89th Congress on other issues—including 14(b) repeal and his own attack on the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote decisions.

THE RAILROAD work rules dispute is locked in more conflict today than in 1959 when it first cropped up, Pres. Neil Speirs (center) of the Switchmen told Stanley Chapman of Traffic World magazine (left) and Duane Emme of Labor Newspaper on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public service interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

RETIREMENT for reasons of health was announced by Bricklayers Pres. John J. Murphy (center) at the union's convention in Montreal. He was succeeded in the top post by Sec. Thomas F. Murphy (right). William R. Connors (left), first vice president, became secretary. John J. Murphy, no relation to his successor, will continue with the union as a special consultant.

John Murphy Steps Out As Bricklayers' Leader

Montreal, Que.—John J. Murphy retired for reasons of health as president of the Bricklayers during the union's 69th convention here and was succeeded by Sec. Thomas F. Murphy.

The two Murphys, who are not related, took office in May 1960 following the retirement of Pres. Emeritus Harry C. Bates. They were re-elected two years ago to four-year terms. Thomas Murphy, under the constitution, will fill out the remaining two years of his predecessor's term.

During the convention the executive board named John Murphy, who was AFL organizing director in the mid-1940s, as a special consultant to the union. Thomas Murphy, who was treasurer before becoming secretary, was succeeded in turn by First Vice Pres. William R. Connors. The latter's place was taken by Treas. George King. John T. Joyce, administrator of the health and welfare fund of Chicago Local 21, was appointed treasurer.

The new president was born in New York, apprenticed as a bricklayer at the age of 15 and became a journeyman four years later. He held various local and regional union offices before being elected treasurer at the 1948 convention, holding that post until his election as secretary.

In his report to the convention, the retiring president told the delegates that membership and stability were at their "greatest strength in our century-old history" with members "working under the best wages and conditions they have ever enjoyed."

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz told the 700 delegates that if he could repeal just two laws, "the first of them would be Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act and the second would be the law of averages" because it "camouflages" the condition of those at the bottom of the economic ladder.

Jodoin on Goals

Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress called working for the goals of the CLC "Charter of Tomorrow" more important than the better living standards, shorter hours and liberalized fringe benefits Canadian organized labor has helped gain for all workers.

Charter goals, he said, include job security, wages that assure workers a fair share of the benefits of the new technology and an expanding economy; improvements in pensions, unemployment insurance, family allowances and health insurance; elimination of all forms of discrimination, and broadened international cooperation.

Rep. John E. Fogarty (D-R.I.) reminisced about his days as a working member of the union and recalled how when he first ran for Congress in 1940, his union told him to "stop laying brick and get yourself elected," and gave him $500 for campaign expenses.

The convention passed a series of resolutions on trade and jurisdictional matters and instructed the officers to print in the monthly publication the voting records of all members of Congress.

14(b) Tactics Block Action On Rights Bill

of southern Democrats and Republicans were united and effective."

Looking ahead, Eastland went on to predict that it would not be long before "we can start the fight to repeal these vicious measures," referring to civil rights bills passed in recent years.

Clarence M. Mitchell, legislative chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, saw Dirksen's support of the filibuster as the key factor in the setback.

"We have seen a wonderful chapter in American history," Mitchell said, "when a President from Texas takes a stand for civil rights while a senator from Illinois, a leader in the party of Abraham Lincoln, is lynching the bill on the floor."

Civil rights supporters in both parties pledged a renewed drive for the legislation and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany hammered home the 14(b) analogy in a speech to the Steelworkers convention.

Meany told the delegates that Dirksen has again "won a battle" by keeping the Senate from acting. Meany added: "But this does not mean that the war is lost. We will pass additional civil rights legislation in the years to come despite all that Mr. Dirksen can do, and we will pass the repeal of 14(b)."

Pres. Johnson commented that Congress had "bowed temporarily to the doubters" by failing to pass the civil rights bill. He added: "But I think we are going to get fair housing legislation because simple justice demands it." He spoke at a White House swearing-in ceremony for Stephen Shulman, new chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunities Commission.

Stereotypers Set Vote on Merger Plan

The Stereotypers & Electrotypers took a second step toward merger with the Lithographers & Photoengravers when delegates to the former union's 63rd annual convention voted to send a merger plan to referendum.

The convention, largest in the union's history, cleared the way to referendum after two days of discussion and debate, including a special night session addressed by LPIU Pres. Kenneth Brown and Vice Pres. William J. Hall. The vote, with 78 percent of the delegates in favor, was 126 to 35.

Last year, Stereotyper convention delegates and members, by referendum vote, authorized the officers to explore merger plans.

Other Talks Set

Brown announced that further steps exploring graphic arts unification will take place next month. His union will meet Oct. 4 with officers of the 62,000-member Bookbinders and Oct. 10-12 with leaders of the 115,000-member Printing Pressmen, he said.

The LPIU itself was created on Labor Day 1964 through merger of the Lithographers and the Photo Engravers.

If members of the Stereotypers and the LPIU vote by a two-thirds majority for merger, special conventions of the two organizations will be held no later than June 1, 1967, to draw up a constitution for another vote of the members prior to Labor Day next year.

The merger would unite all union platemakers into a single organization of 64,000 members — the Graphic Arts Intl. Union.

The merger terms were reached after 13 months of discussion and won the approval of the executive bodies of the two affected unions.

The executive boards of both organizations ratified four documents dealing with the terms of merger —an agreement to amalgamate, an addendum defining the duties of the president and executive vice presidents of the Graphic Arts union for the first seven years; an implementation agreement transferring property and liabilities to the new union; and a declaration of principles involving job security and job opportunity for members; wages and hours, local options, and local mergers.

Delegates voted to continue support of union members on strike since 1963 against the Kingsport, Tenn., Press, and defeated a proposal to let foremen keep their numerical priority rating as journeyman in the event they lose foreman status.

Senate Rollcall Votes On Rights Filibuster

The Senate made two unsuccessful tries to break a filibuster against the civil rights bill by invoking cloture—the procedure for limiting debate. Both votes found a majority for cloture, but not the two-thirds necessary under Senate rules. The first vote, on Sept. 14, was 54-42 for cloture. The second vote, Sept. 19, was 52-41. The difference lies in the number of absentees.

Hutcheson Asks New Programs:

Carpenters Press Organizing Goals

the union each year approximately 100,000 new members but at the same time "90,000 or 95,000 leave the fold through the back door," he reported. He urged the convention to give careful attention to alternative new and expanded organizing programs.

He also said bluntly that "too many locals" are using "subterfuge" to avoid admitting as members people "working at our trade and receiving journeyman wages."

It may be that older members "feel concern that newer members will furnish competition for jobs when conditions slip backward a little," he observed, but the viewpoint is "shortsighted and unrealistic."

Warns of Danger

"In the union they are fair competition; outside the union they are unfair competition," or may become so when they are willing to cut the union scale $1 or so if jobs become less numerous, he warned.

The union must also step up its apprenticeship programs, he continued, because they are now "barely turning out enough journeymen to replace those members who die in a given year."

In a filmed speech to the delegates AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany underscored Hutcheson's warning that rapidly spiraling interest rates had become a threat to housing construction.

Noting that much is heard — "mostly from the editorial pages" and similar sources — about the "power" of labor, Meany also commented:

"I fail to see why anyone should have any objection to a powerful trade union movement as long as that power is directed to the good of the nation as a whole."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler was warmly applauded when he reported that the AFL-CIO had gained 1.2 million members since the middle of 1964 "and we are still going up."

Two Filibusters

Referring to defeat of the bill to repeal Section 14(b) by Senate Minority Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen's filibuster, Schnitzler pointed out that "the same mechanism was used to kill the Civil Rights bill of 1966" a short time later.

"I think the Senate is running itself into a crisis of great proportions" that will have to be rectified through "a combined uprising by the people of America," he said.

The great progress made in social legislation in the past two years could not have been achieved "without the votes of the 51 liberal congressmen elected in 1964," he emphasized.

"We are not going to sit on the sidelines in the coming election and turn congress over to the enemies of the labor movement," he added.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz spoke with great appreciation of labor's support of Pres. Johnson's policy in Viet Nam.

"It is a source of infinite strength to a President who must muster a nation's courage from its sometimes divided convictions," he said. "I think part of labor's position is that it knows that the right answer can't be negotiated from weakness and can't be negotiated in retreat.

"I would have expected the first of this year to come with a statement that 14(b) had been repealed and situs picketing recognized as the legitimate activity which it is."

"I feel worst of all" about the fact that "we didn't take a beating on the merits," he continued, "but I took great encouragement from the fact that the President said on Labor Day that 14(b) goes right back to the top of the agenda" in the next Congress.

Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and Seafarers reviewed activities of the "Save Our Shipping" conferences and expressed appreciation to the Carpenters for their help in keeping the Maritime Administration as an autonomous agency rather than merely a division of the proposed Dept. of Transportation.

Construction Projects

Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building and Construction Trades Dept. reported that programs authorized by the current Congress would lead to some $70 billion in construction projects—schools, highways, housing—across the next several years.

It will mean full employment for building craftsmen in most areas, he said, but he warned that much of the employment would be open shop with many areas still only partially organized.

Delegates rejected proposals to transfer the election of officers from the convention to a referendum vote of all members after it was pointed out that convention elections had themselves been authorized by referendum.

All five general officers were nominated without opposition to succeed themselves and unanimously re-elected. They include Hutcheson, Vice Presidents Finlay C. Allan and William Sidell, Sec. R. E. Livingston and Treas. Peter E. Terzick.

Sheet Metal Parley Told of Profit Gouge

San Francisco—The United States is in the grip of a "profit inflation," constantly increasing the gap between production costs and prices, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler told the 32nd general convention of the Sheet Metal Workers.

Schnitzler spoke soon after Pres. Edward F. Carlough called to order the 840 delegates representing 288 local unions and 30 councils.

Carlough told the delegates the union's membership has grown 14 percent in the last four years — to more than 128,000. The expansion will continue, Carlough predicted.

He urged the convention to authorize a strike fund — the first in the union's history.

Such a fund, he said, is necessary to assure future growth.

Schnitzler refuted claims in Congress and the press that working people's attempts to improve their purchasing power are instrumental in causing inflation.

"Corporate profits between 1960 and 1965 soared 52 percent before taxes and went to 66 percent after taxes," he pointed out.

Labor costs, meanwhile, have increased less than 2 percent and in some key manufacturing industries have actually declined.

"The facts prove that the profits of America's corporations, those same corporations which periodically accuse us of driving them to ruin, are so great, so fantastic, that they threaten to blow the top off our economy.

"The unhappy fact is that our nation is in a profit inflation—a skyrocketing, zooming, galloping profit inflation—and nothing else. This is excessive pricing, it is excessive profit, it is the cause of the inflation which is gripping our nation today."

Airline Profits

He singled out the recent airlines strike as a prime illustration of excessive profits—and of the unfounded charges against labor's wage proposals.

"Among the five airlines involved in the strike," Schnitzler said, "company profits after taxes were 35 percent, 67 percent, 70 percent, 90 percent and the fifth company went from a deficit of $5 million to a profit of $30 million in one year," Schnitzler noted.

"With these profits, it is obvious that the airlines could meet the needs of their workers to catch up, but we know what happened . . . the needs of the airline machinist and his family were smothered under a torrent of abuse."

Despite hysteria against the strikers and near-enactment of compulsory arbitration legislation to break the strike, "the strikers proved by their determination that they could win their demands," Schnitzler noted.

Another speaker was labor Under Sec. John F. Henning, a former California AFL-CIO official.

Henning decried the high jobless rate in the construction industry and urged that government, management and labor devise a program to assure building trades workers employment for 12 months of every year.

"America must find a way, if it has power to put men into space, to assure the building trades workers of this nation constancy of employment," he declared.

Ohio Bell, CWA Agree On 7% Pact

Cleveland, O.—An agreement calling for wage and fringe benefits valued by the Communications Workers at more than 7 percent was reached in negotiations between CWA and the Ohio Bell Telephone Co. for 17,000 CWA-represented employes.

The new pact follows a pattern established in a recent settlement between the same union and the Western Electric Co., a Bell subsidiary, the union said. Ohio Bell is the first Bell operating company to settle since then.

The agreement is retroactive to Sept. 11. It provides pay hikes of up to $11.50 a week, CWA said, adding these details:

Basic wage increases of $5.50 to $8 a week were won for plant craftsmen, and of $3.50 to $5.50 for traffic and clerical employes, with $5.50 going to all top-rated telephone operators and clerical employes who are at or above the top operator's rate.

Plant craftsmen in 34 towns were upgraded, with many getting $11.50 raises. Cleveland plant employes also were upgraded, with pay hikes of $9 to $10 a week for 1,400 men.

The company's social security pension deduction was reduced from a third to a fourth. Ohio Bell will increase its hospitalization and medical insurance contribution from 50 percent of cost to 75 percent.

The contract may be reopened in 18 months for negotiations on wage items. Improvements in life insurance and vacations also were agreed to, along with a new maintenance of membership clause.

Meany Affirms Support Of City Bargaining Plan

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reaffirmed support for a plan to establish an Office of Collective Bargaining to serve New York City municipal employes as a City Council committee held a public hearing on the proposal.

In identical telegrams to Mayor John V. Lindsay, Council Pres. Frank D. O'Connor and Council Majority Leader David Ross, Meany reminded them that on Mar. 31 he had endorsed the plan advanced by a tripartite panel of union, city and public members as "a step toward establishing sound and sensible procedures for municipal collective bargaining."

"I reiterate this endorsement and urge that the plan be made operative," Meany said. He added:

Fair Dealing

"Built into the plan are the means for effectively dealing fairly with the causes of conflict in relations between government and public employes."

Describing the panel's program as a "positive approach to realistic collective bargaining for public employes," Meany said it is "in marked contrast to repressive measures which have failed in New York and in other states."

Emphasis under the panel proposal, he observed, is in developing "collective negotiation, mediation, fact-finding and generally in finding a mechanism for solving workers' grievances."

The panel that drew up the plan was established by former Mayor Robert F. Wagner 14 months ago. Last March it reported to Lindsay, who asked the City Council to approve its findings. The plan would apply to city employes under the mayor's jurisdiction.

The panel proposed a new independent agency consisting of two union representatives, two members appointed by the mayor and three impartial members.

It would settle disputes on bargaining units and certification, make binding decisions on contract interpretations and play a major mediation role in bargaining impasses.

If the board found collective bargaining stalemated after 30 days, it could name a panel to mediate, hold hearings and, if it so decided, make public recommendations for settlement. For 30 days after a board report, the city could not unilaterally change conditions and the union would forego a strike.

The proposal is in line with policies urged by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which called statutes like New York's Condon-Wadlin Act "repressive" and a "barrier" to realistic bargaining. That law provides severe penalties against public employes who engage in strikes.

A labor panel headed by Victor Gotbaum of the State, County and Municipal Employes helped shape the proposal for a city Office of Collective Bargaining. Participants included top officers of the Building Service Employes, Plumbers, Fire Fighters and other unions which bargain for 113,000 of the city's 175,000 employes.

Idaho Democrats Name Liberal for State Race

A liberal will replace a conservative as Democratic candidate for governor of Idaho.

The death in a plane crash of the party's gubernatorial candidate, Charles Herndon, left the choice of a replacement to the Democratic State Central Committee. By the narrowest of margins—84 to 82—the committee chose liberal State Sen. Cecil Andrus, who had come in second in the party primary last month.

Andrus had the backing of Sen. Frank Church, Rep. Compton I. White and former Rep. Ralph Harding, who is the party's nominee for the U.S. Senate this year. He was picked over H. Max Hanson, who has been state Farmers Home Administration director.

The official canvass of Maryland's close Democratic gubernatorial race continued, with George P. Mahoney maintaining a slim lead over liberal Rep. Carlton Sickles. The margin moved up and down as the count uncovered errors in tallies on both sides of the ledger.

As the fall primary season neared its end—Hawaii's Oct. 1 primary is the last—Washington state voters renominated incumbents of both parties for the seven congressional seats. All were unopposed or had only token opposition.

ACWA Official Dies in Indiana

New Albany, Ind.—Thomas Marsella, manager of the Kentuckiana Joint Board of the Clothing Workers, a member of the Kentucky AFL-CIO executive board and a leader in Southern Indiana civic activities, died here.

Meany Tells Executives:

Union Wage Goals Basic to Prosperity

New York—A "super-boom" in business investment in new plants and machines, coupled with the "misguided" high-interest policies of the Federal Reserve Board, threatens to unbalance the economy, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany warned.

Meany told a blue-ribbon audience of business and industrial executives that present policies are creating "a big gap between the economy's ability to produce and its ability to buy."

He said that "unless the ever-rising tide of goods that American enterprise can produce is matched by the increased real earnings of workers, these goods cannot be sold. . . . The higher take-home pay that unions seek is indispensable to the sustained growth of production, jobs and profits."

The setting for Meany's address was the 50th anniversary world convocation of the National Industrial Conference Board, which provides economic research and analysis for leading business firms.

In a free society, Meany declared, there is "no alternative" to collective bargaining and there can be no "meaningful" bargaining without the right to strike.

Fair Share Labor's Goal

Labor, he emphasized, doesn't want to "do away with profits" or "put the employer out of business." The trade union demand is "a fair share for workers who make their contribution to the economic system. . . . Unions are going to continue to seek a fair share through every legal method, including strikes, when necessary."

Theme of the three-day conference was "The Future of Capitalism," and Meany was invited to speak on the topic "Labor Looks at Capitalism."

The AFL-CIO president noted that America's "constantly-changing" economic system is unique among capitalistic nations. The Bill of Rights, the Constitution and our educational system are "integral parts of our economic order," he said, "and more essential to it than the stock exchange or any corporate board."

Acting "within the basic structure of our society," he pointed out, "trade unions have served to humanize the economic system. And in humanizing it, they have made it stronger and more prosperous, through the development of broader mass markets for the sale of the products of industry."

Meany Defends Johnson

Shortly before Meany spoke, U.S. Steel Board Chairman Roger M. Blough attacked Pres. Johnson's proposal to suspend the 7 percent investment tax credit and called instead for a cut in government spending.

Meany retorted that "the fires that feed this unbalanced capital goods boom" are the soaring corporate profits of recent years.

"The need for housing, schools, mass transit, clean air and water, recreation and other facilities and services demand progressive legislation and far heavier public expenditure for such facilities and services than has ever been provided in the past," he said. "We, of organized labor, insist that such massive efforts are a vital, necessary public investment in the future of America and its people."

Meany spoke also of the need for further steps to remedy "decades of neglect, prejudice and discrimination . . . particularly when automation is wiping out large numbers of unskilled and semi-skilled jobs in farming and industry."

The labor movement, he added, "with all of its weaknesses, imperfections and occasional mistakes, has contributed much to the flexibility and strength" of the American economic system.

The need, Meany stressed, is "to move ahead. There is no canned ideology — Communist, fascist or other—that can give us workable solutions, within a free society, to the problems of today and tomorrow."

IN PREPARATION for the first public concert by the Musicians' Congress of Strings Orchestra, Conductor Josef Krips of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra leads the young musicians through a rehearsal on the Michigan State University campus at East Lansing, Mich.

AFM Wins Plaudits for Music Camp

East Lansing, Mich.—Roger L. Stevens, director of the National Endowment on the Arts & Humanities, paid a surprise visit to the Musicians' Congress of Strings and warmly praised the union's contribution to the nation's cultural growth.

He came to get a first-hand picture of the work being done in the project, held on the campus of the co-sponsoring Michigan State University, and attended the final rehearsal of the congress orchestra.

He also spoke at the annual banquet, praising the young musicians —who are 16 to 23 years old—for their talent and pointing out that only now is the role of the government in support of the arts being realized in this country.

The congress, at which 100 promising young strings musicians, chosen at open auditions, receive eight weeks of top-level instruction at no cost, was hailed as the "most successful season" by Donald Johanos, music director of the Dallas Symphony and dean of the congress faculty.

Johanos led the congress orchestra in its final concert. Earlier performances had been directed by William Steinberg, Pittsburgh Symphony; Josef Krips, San Francisco Symphony, and Henry Lewis, former assistant director of the Los Angeles Symphony.

Faculty members included Concertmaster Rafael Druian of the Cleveland Symphony; Concertmaster Hyman Goodman, Toronto Symphony; Concertmaster Leonard Posner, Dallas Symphony; Concertmaster Frank Houser, San Francisco Symphony; Robert Jameison, principal cellist, Minneapolis Symphony; Theodore Salzman, former principal cellist, Pittsburgh Symphony; John A. Di Janni, principal violist, Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, and Warren Benfield, double bassist, Chicago Symphony.

House Labor Group Acts to Curb Powell

The House Education & Labor Committee voted almost unanimously to curb the power of Chairman Adam C. Powell and to give greater authority to the committee majority and subcommittee chairmen.

Powell, who initially had attacked sponsors of the rules reform, abstained from voting at a showdown committee meeting. Later he told newsmen the changes were "salutory and progressive," and said he would like to see similar rules adopted by all House committees.

Under the changed rules, bills approved by subcommittees will automatically be scheduled for a vote in the full committee. The committee will meet more often and subcommittee chairmen are empowered to call their bills up for action on the House floor if Powell refuses to do so.

The chairman's previously unlimited authority to hire and fire staff employes of the full committee has been curbed by requiring prior consultation and approval by the committee majority. Republicans maintain their present control over their share of the full committee's staff.

The vote on the new rules was 27-1, with Rep. William H. Ayres, the senior committee Republican, casting the only opposing vote. Two committee Democrats besides Powell abstained from voting.

Powell's refusal to call up in the House several major bills approved by his committee was a major factor in the "revolt," along with charges of delaying tactics and absenteeism. Among the key bills sidetracked by Powell have been anti-poverty legislation and the on-site picketing bill.

Rep. Sam M. Gibbons (D-Fla.), last year's floor leader on the poverty bill, first proposed a major reform in the committee's operating rules. The final version was drafted by Rep. Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) and other members at a Democratic caucus.

Committee chairmen in Congress, chosen on the basis of seniority, normally have broad powers to dispose of legislation, to reward supporters and punish opponents. Committee action to curb the powers of its chairman is rare, although not unprecedented.

U.S. Standards Backed On Radiation Hazards

The AFL-CIO endorsed legislation to encourage states to keep records of on-the-job exposure of workers to radiation and to meet federal standards for workmen's compensation coverage of radiation-caused ailments.

Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller testified before the Congressional Joint Committee on Atomic Energy in general support of Administration proposals. But he urged that the bill be strengthened by making certain provisions mandatory rather than permissive. Biemiller's testimony was in line with unanimous recommendations of the Atomic Energy Commission's Labor-Management Advisory Committee.

Uniform Records Sought

The proposed legislation would allow the AEC to allocate funds to states to help them set up a uniform system of record-keeping for workers in occupations involving exposure to dangerous radiation.

This, Biemiller noted, would accomplish a threefold purpose:

- It would greatly assist research on the relationship between "chronic low-level doses of radiation" and ailments which are suspected of being caused or aggravated by radiation.
- It would lead to more effective safeguards against exposure of workers to radiation.
- It would improve adjudication of workmen's compensation cases.

The Administration bill specifies that standards set by the Atomic Energy Commission as a condition for grants to the states "may" include requirements for workmen's compensation coverage.

Biemiller argued that "this leaves entirely too much latitude to the commission." He urged that workmen's compensation standards be made mandatory by changing the word "may" to "shall."

He also urged that a time limit be set for states receiving grants to comply fully with federal standards.

With the improvements suggested, Biemiller concluded, "this legislation will make a large and significant contribution to the health and welfare of American workers who may be exposed to dangerous radiation on the job."

Auto Workers Win Burroughs Clerical Unit

Detroit — Salaried clerical employes at three Burroughs Corp. plants in this area voted 141-127 for representation by the Auto Workers in a National Labor Relations Board election.

The UAW previously won its first Burroughs election in a production worker unit but nearly 2,000 white collar workers have been non-union until now. Elections will be sought in other units where organizing drives have been launchel, UAW Board Member Douglas Fraser said.

Clothing Workers Win Votes in South

Harriman, Tenn. — Workers at the T & W Clothing Co. plant voted for the Clothing Workers, 357-228, after a seven-month union organizing campaign. This followed another successful campaign in Russellville, Ala., where the vote was 182-94 for ACWA in a National Labor Relations Board election at the Prepmore Apparel plant.

ACWA Vice Pres. Charles English said both were "typical southern organizing campaigns" complete with discharges and terror tactics by management. The T & W plant has 700 workers making sport jackets. Prepmore employs 300 sports shirtmakers.

W.H.Rohrberg Dies, Painters Union Leader

Toronto—William H. Rohrberg, veteran secretary-treasurer of the Painters, died Sept. 18 at Toronto General Hospital. He had been stricken with a heart attack while attending a session of his union's executive board. He was 64.

Funeral services were held at Hammond, Ind. Rohrberg is survived by his wife, Helen, two daughters and two sons.

In a telegram of condolence, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler mourned the passing of "a sincere trade unionist who served the members of his union and the entire labor movement with dignity and devotion."

Rohrberg became a union member on his apprenticeship as a decorator in 1922. He served as recording secretary of Local 460 at Hammond and later as business agent for 14 years. He had also been president of the Lake County Building Trades Council, secretary of the local central body, and president of the union's Indiana State Conference. He joined the international union staff in 1941, was elected secretary-treasurer in 1952 and re-elected three times since.

GOP Loses Bid to Kill Poverty Bill

By David L. Perlman

The House beat back a series of Republican attacks on the anti-poverty program in an angry four-day legislative battle and moved towards passage of the $1.75 billion Administration bill.

At one stage, GOP congressmen "hidden" in the cloakroom rushed to the floor to catch Democrats off-guard and ram through a 128-118 teller vote to kill the bill. But the maneuver backfired minutes later when the action was reversed on a 208-156 rollcall.

The poverty bill was scheduled to be followed on the House floor by another key Administration measure—a tax bill designed to check what the AFL-CIO has termed the "profit inflation" in the economy.

At stake in the poverty legislation was whether the federal government would renege on its commitment to a program designed to salvage young people headed for society's scrap heap and help families ground down by slum life to get a new foothold.

A Republican substitute bill which would have left only bits and pieces of the poverty program was handily beaten on an early test vote, 143-115. It would have turned over most of the functions of Sargent Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity to other agencies.

Another sharp battle on the poverty program was set for the Senate, where a $2.5 billion bill—higher than the Administration's budget request—was sent to the floor by the Labor Committee.

Senate Republicans were prepared to wage an "economy" fight to slash the amount.

The Senate, meanwhile, mixed civil rights and economy in a battle over a multi-billion dollar appropriations bill carrying funds for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and several related agencies.

The Administration stayed out of the dispute and a bipartisan band of civil rights supporters lost two fights.

A motion by Sen. Jacob K. Javits (R-N. Y.) to restore $500,000 of the $927,000 the House cut from the civil rights enforcement budget of HEW was beaten, 40-25.

Javits had asked that the extra money be voted both because it was needed and additionally as a "symbolic" repudiation of language in the Appropriations Committee report on the bill criticizing the government's school desegregation guidelines. The committee report has no force of law.

On another phase of the bill, the

'Full Weight' of AFL-CIO Backs Unions in GE Talks

Drive for Contract Moves to Deadline

By Eugene A. Kelly

Eleven AFL-CIO unions made a last-ditch effort to reach agreement with General Electric before the Oct. 2 contract expiration date, supported by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's pledge to keep the "full weight of the AFL-CIO and all its unions behind them."

The unions forming the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining met in Washington to make final revisions in contract proposals after they had earlier rejected the latest GE contract offer.

"Let the word go out," Meany told a meeting of 320 delegates from all the affiliates that bargain with GE and Westinghouse, "that labor is united, that it wants a decent fair deal, that we are ready to bargain and that under no circumstances are we ready to surrender."

Meany added: "I think your demands are conservative. You modified them, now it's up to the corpoations to come back and bargain in good faith. Just rearranging the package is not going to be enough."

Saying he "shares your hopes you will be able to reach agreement" before the GE contract expires, the AFL-CIO president declared that "no responsible union leader looks with satisfaction on the idea of going on strike," but "I like the idea of having that right and of being able to exercise it when you must."

He said "I am sure you will give your best efforts to reach a successful conclusion" of contract negotiations, but "if your efforts fail . . . you're going to have the support of the AFL-CIO and all its affiliates."

Delegates from locals representing 115,000 GE workers and 65,000 at Westinghouse voted in separate meetings to reject the latest contract offers by the companies.

2d Election Proposed at DiGiorgio

San Francisco—A second major representation election among West Coast farm workers has been proposed by Prof. Ronald Haughton, special adviser to Gov. Edmund G. Brown, but the Teamsters stand in the way of the vote.

Haughton called for an election Oct. 21 at the giant DiGiorgio Corp. King Ranch in Arvin following procedures used in the Aug. 30 vote at the company's Delano operations where the AFL-CIO Farm Workers won an overwhelming victory.

The Teamsters, ousted from the AFL-CIO nine years ago, rejected the proposal, however, and management turned down a recommendation that the election be held without them. Haughton scheduled a conference of the parties here Sept. 30 in a final effort to set an election.

Meanwhile, there were these other farm labor developments:

- The AFL-CIO Farm Workers launched a consumer boycott against A. Perelli-Minetti & Son of Delano, producers of Ambassador

GOP Tries Comeback:

Liberals vs. Rightists Is Pattern in Rockies

By Willard Shelton

Billings, Mont.—The Republican Party is trying for a comeback in the Upper Rocky Mountain States this year, and the pattern for the November election is GOP conservatives against Democratic liberals.

In 1964 Pres. Johnson swept all five states—Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Utah and Wyoming—and in his landslide victory four Republicans were knocked out of the House of Representatives. The Democrats who replaced them formed part of the freshman class that was the margin of victory on medicare, school aid, minimum wage and other major Administration and labor-supported bills.

Four of the ten Senate seats are up this year. Three have been held by Republicans—Senators Len Jordan (Ida.), Milward L. Simpson (Wyo.), and Gordon Allott (Colo.)—with Sen Lee Metcalf (Mont.) the only Democrat.

Three governorships are up—in Colorado, Wyoming and Idaho—all held by Republicans at present, although Gov. Robert Smylie was beaten in the GOP primary in Idaho.

The five states have these things in common:

- They are sparsely settled, accounting for only 11 members of the House of Representatives.
- The Republican Party ranges almost exclusively from the conservative moderate to the extremist right wing and was a basic source of Goldwater strength in the GOP's 1964 nominating convention.
- Elections tend to be extreme-

Agencies Seek to Mesh Welfare Aid Programs

There will be two-way cooperation—not rivalry—between government and private organizations in the welfare, health and anti-poverty areas.

A union president, representing a citizens movement that includes many of the nation's top executives, helped frame the broad jurisdictional agreement signed by the heads of five big government departments.

Its aim, Joseph A. Beirne told a Washington news conference, is to help both voluntary and government agencies do a better job by eliminating "conflict or overlapping of services."

Beirne is an AFL-CIO vice president, the president of the Communications Workers and chairman of AFL-CIO Community Service Activities. He made the announcement of the agreement in a fourth role—as president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America, with affiliated single-fund federations in some 2,000 communities.

The agreement was termed a major "breakthrough" by both Beirne and Sargent Shriver, director of the government's anti-poverty agency, the Office of Economic Opportunity. Also signing the compact for the government were Health, Education & Welfare Sec. John W. Gardner, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Housing & Urban

Real Earnings Off Despite Rise in Take-Home Pay

"Real" spendable earnings of factory production workers—buying power in terms of 1957-9 prices—dropped off in the year ending with August despite higher paychecks, the Labor Dept. has reported.

An industrial worker with three dependents had net spendable earnings—what he took home after deduction of social security and Federal income taxes—of $98.46 last August compared to $95.87 in August 1965. But his real spendable earnings over the same period dropped from $87.15 to $86.52 a week.

The worker without dependents suffered a similar erosion in his buying power. His net spendable earnings rose from $88.21 to $90.63 over the year, but his real earnings dipped from $80.19 in August 1965 to $79.64 a year later.

Between July and August, the survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics showed, both net and real spendable earnings declined. The former dropped by about 20 cents for both categories of workers. Real earnings fell off more sharply—52 cents for the worker with no dependents and 58 cents for the worker with three in the family.

HISTORIC AGREEMENT on cooperation between voluntary and government agencies in the social welfare field is announced by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne in his role as president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America. Joining him at the news conference is Sargent Shriver, left, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver and Commerce Sec. John T. Connor.

The "statement of consensus" issued by the government and voluntary groups calls for "total mobilization" of both sectors to overcome "the age-old enemies of our society: poverty, ignorance and disease."

It views the voluntary agencies as both complementing governmental programs and using their flexibility to pioneer in the development of new services and new programs.

A key section of the agreement declares that the citizen leadership traditionally associated with voluntary health and welfare activity should participate actively in the planning and operation of the new community programs involving the war on poverty.

It suggests that united funds match government appropriations for local community action programs "and should insist upon representation on community committees administering these programs." Voluntary agencies are also urged to "develop methods by which their clients and the residents of the areas they serve can participate meaningfully in the operation of their own programs."

Beirne noted the swing of the pendulum from the era of "Lady Bountiful, with her basket of little charities" to the other extreme of believing that "only government resources should be employed in the field of social welfare, and that voluntary activity was old-fashioned."

The agreement, he said, is a recognition of the need for "side by side" voluntary and government effort . . . "a solemn pledge among men of responsibility in government, business and labor to work together, collectively and individually, on America's most important social welfare problems."

Vermont Parley Pushes Register-Vote Campaign

Burlington, Vt.—The Vermont State AFL-CIO, meeting here in convention, cheered reports that a vigorous register-and-vote campaign is proceeding in most areas of the state and agreed that the major concentration now must be aimed at turning out all of labor's 40,000 votes at the polls in November.

The turnout from 86 local unions made the annual state labor gathering one of the best attended in years.

In major actions, the convention approved endorsement of only two candidates for state office—Gov. Philip H. Hoff (D) and Lt. Gov. John Daley (D) after hearing Hoff and his Republican opponent, Richard Snelling, outline their plans.

The delegates re-elected Pres. Ralph E. Williams, Sec.-Treas. Carroll P. Comstock, Jr., both of Rutland, and Mrs. Lena Brown of Bridgewater as executive vice president—the latter in a contest with Robert McClure, Rutland. They approved reappointment of Mrs. Ruth Colombo of Barre as women's activities director for another year.

The convention defeated a proposed increase of 3 cents per member in the per capita assessment and a resolution to withdraw American forces from Viet Nam. It endorsed 19 resolutions calling for legislative improvements, including one urging recodification, updating and strengthening of state safety laws, which now lack teeth for enforcing safety in the shop.

Gov. Hoff said he would continue to vigorously oppose any move to enact a state "right to work" law forbidding union members and employers from making union shop agreements, and any new state sales taxes. He will seek again to secure passage of a state labor law and a state labor department empowered to enforce it, he said.

Snelling, an industrialist from Shelburne who beat Thomas L. Hays, staff aide of Sen. Winston L. Prouty in the primary, told the convention he favors additional state sales taxes and supports proposals for an anti-union shop law.

The officers recommended, and the delegates approved, a long-range organizing campaign to add an additional 10,000 members to state unions and the central body.

Convention speakers included Rep. Robert T. Stafford (R); Mrs. Stella Hackel, state employment security commissioner; Louis Lavin, state commissioner of industrial relations, and AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Hugh Thompson.

St. Albans was chosen as the site of the 1967 state convention.

Income Protection Stressed:

Steel Union Spells Out Goals, Reshapes Bargaining Tools

Atlantic City—The Steelworkers retooled their negotiating machinery by voting at their 13th convention to bring the bargaining process closer to rank-and-file members and by setting "complete income protection" for 1.1 million USWA members as the union's over-all contract objective.

A record 3,600 delegates ended five days of deliberation and debate after voting overwhelming approval of a proposal to give four industry conferences enlarged authority to reject or ratify contracts. Departing from past practice, the convention conditioned this power on the right of members to take part in a referendum vote on any proposed strike action.

Contract goals were spelled out in detail in convention resolutions —a guaranteed annual wage, with salaries paid in dollars per month instead of per hour; lifetime job security for qualified workers; shorter workweeks without reduction in pay, and "substantial" improvements in wages and other benefits.

The delegates heard major talks by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, Canadian Labor Congress Pres. Claude Jodoin, Auto Workers' Pres. Walter P. Reuther, Pres. A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters, United Nations Ambassador Arthur Goldberg, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, and Dai Davis of the British Iron & Steel Confederation.

The convention in other actions:

- Ratified a no-raiding agreement with the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers, unaffiliated, and authorized the continuation of talks looking toward merger with that union "at the earliest practicable date."
- Endorsed a drive to organize more than 100,000 presently unrepresented office and technical workers and called for "full and complete protection" for the white collar victims of newly installed data processing machines and the consolidation of engineering works. More comprehensive contract provisions dealing with these problems must be negotiated, the convention declared.
- Called for expedited grievance handling to avoid the need for "wildcat" strikes, and the rejection by grievance committeemen of complaints that have no merit.

Vice Pres. Humphrey congratulated the union on its accomplishments but noted that its work is not completed in organizing, in helping achieve a better education for every boy and girl, in helping reduce poverty.

Referring to the Administration's proposal to suspend the 7 percent investment tax credit for business, Humphrey said such a curb is "not only in the national interest but in the interest of the free enterprise system and business itself."

"This is no time for profiteering. This is no time for price gouging. This is the time for self-discipline. 'Ask not what your country can do for you, ask what you can do for your country' is still good doctrine."

Reuther called for "bold, adequate action at the federal, state and local levels to wipe out the tragic deficits in education."

The central unresolved problem in America today, he said, is "that if we can have full employment and production for the negative ends of war, why can't we have it for the rewarding purposes of peace?"

He urged also the development of "new tools and techniques" to achieve a broader degree of "coordinated cooperative collective bargaining."

Randolph told the convention "I believe the time has come when the street marches and demonstrations have about run their course. . . . The strategy now in order is to shift from the streets to the conference room to find an answer to the problems confronting the black people and white people of America." (Excerpts Page 6.)

The convention defeated proposals to establish a centralized strike fund and to increase membership dues. It made several changes in the constitution.

The delegates considered 2,911 resolutions submitted by local unions and approved most of those concurred in by the resolutions committee.

The vote on changing bargaining procedures came after an explanation by Vice Pres. Joseph P. Molony, who headed an executive board committee that recommended policy revisions.

Molony reported that union policy on industry-wide bargaining will "have to be somewhat flexible" to fit conditions in each industry. But he warned "I use this platform to advise the leadership of the American steel industry that if they do not take care of the needs of the people . . . in the plants . . . we will come to you again and perhaps ask you to abandon" the new approach.

The convention endorsed goals recently enunciated by USWA Pres. I. W. Abel in calling for the guaranteed annual wage, a comprehensive solution to all problems affecting a worker from technological changes, and compensation for time spent by a worker traveling from his home to his job.

The resolution on collective bargaining gave particular endorsement to "our goal of comprehensive income and employment protection." Future bargaining must focus, the resolution said, upon such matters as "contracting-out of work which our members can do, cost-of-living provisions, more realistic premium pay, provisions for overtime, holidays, shift work and weekends, effective restraints on foremen performing bargaining unit work, and arbitrary use of temporary foremen."

The resolution also called for improvement of regular and extended vacations, extension and improvement of existing incentive plans, scheduling "in keeping with the dignity and family life to which our members are entitled," and continuing efforts to update seniority systems.

The convention noted that while 60 percent of the union's membership once worked in basic steel, today only 40 percent are now so employed. A majority of USWA members now work in aluminum, can, nonferrous metals, foundry, fabricating and related industries. To meet this shift and to bring about greater involvement of members, the union established these procedural changes:

- The Intl. Wage Policy Committee will continue to have authority to initiate and formulate wage policy for the USWA.
- The Intl. Executive Board will establish industry conferences in basic steel, nonferrous metals, aluminum and can-making. The conferences will be composed of local union representatives and officers designated by the USWA president, with the responsibility of implementing national USWA wage policy and the authority to ratify or reject contracts and, in the event of a strike, to approve the contract settlement terminating the strike.
- Industry conferences will have the authority to recommend strikes subject to the approval of the membership involved—a right, the resolution said, "fundamental to a democratic union."
- The rules for obtaining strike approval will be formulated by the USWA executive board, which will set the date for a strike, if authorized.

NEARLY 3,600 DELEGATES to the Atlantic City convention of the Steelworkers reshaped union policies and set new goals in bargaining and organizing. The convention was the 13th since the USWA's founding 30 years ago.

Per Capita Payment Raised:

Sheet Metal Union Sets Up Strike Fund

San Francisco—Delegates to the Sheet Metal Workers convention voted to put more muscle into the union's bargaining and organizing punch by raising minimum dues and per capita payments to the international.

The per capita was raised 50 cents a month—to $3—and minimum dues were set at $5 a month, a $1 increase.

Part of the per capita increase will be used to set up a strike fund, which Pres. Edward F. Carlough told the delegates "should have been established 20 years ago."

Much of it will be invested in a stepped-up organizing program, Carlough said. He told the delegates, "we are organizing all over the country and making great strides." In the four years since the previous convention, the union has organized 550 shops.

"Organizing activity must continue to expand if an organization expects to remain competitive in this day and age," a convention resolution stressed.

The increased revenue will also strengthen the union's accident and death benefit fund.

Carlough and Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner were re-elected without opposition, as were 11 vice presidents: A. H. Cronin, James E. Brooks, Laurent Lemoine, Frank A. Bonadio, George Tapling, Edward Ryan, Floyd W. Reed, A. Q. Mooneyhan, Harry J. Gavin, Roy Stringer and J. W. O'Brien.

Delegates gave an ovation to California's Gov. Edmund G. Brown, who charged that the campaign of his Republican opponent, Ronald Reagan, is being financed "by the same people who in 1958 tried to bring a 'right-to-work' law into California."

He told the convention that throughout his administration the labor movement in California has played a leading role in fighting for laws to benefit "all the people."

The convention mandated an intensive political action campaign—and a collection brought in $9,155 in contributions from the 840 delegates.

Strong support was voted for the goals of a 35-hour workweek and double time for overtime work.

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers congratulated the union on its organizing and bargaining victories over "stubborn, anti-union companies."

Michael Fox, president of the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept., reported on shopcraft negotiations—including the Sheet Metal Workers—getting under way and warned the railroads against again crying "poverty."

Latest financial reports, Fox said, show that railroads "are in the best financial position in their history."

'Full Weight of AFL-CIO' Backs Last-Ditch Drive for GE Contract

Then, in the unity conference, they unanimously adopted a report listing counter-proposals on eight points.

It also authorized formation of "a special action committee" composed of Meany as chairman and the presidents of the 11 international unions "to evaluate any responsible and responsive offer made by GE in the next four days, and to make appropriate recommendations."

"We want a settlement, not a strike," said the report drafted by the 11-union steering committee and read to the conference by Pres. Paul Russell M. Stephens of the Technical Engineers. "But we want to make it clear to GE that the offer now before us is not acceptable, and that we do not accept the Boulware philosophy that it cannot be improved.

"It must be improved—by midnight Oct. 2."

Lemuel Boulware is the former GE vice president credited with developing a "take it or leave it" bargaining approach that the National Labor Relations Board has ruled unlawful.

The report set forth the following revised goals, "with the sole aim of reaching an agreement and to demonstrate our reasonableness":

- Adequate protection against the rising cost of living which since 1960 has risen 10.3 percent, "eroding practically all the wage increases" of the last six years.
- A 4 percent yearly wage increase with a minimum of 7 cents an hour—acceptable only if agreement is reached on cost-of-living protection.
- A fund of 1 cent an hour as a start toward reducing geographic wage differentials, particularly for southern and rural employes.
- Nine holidays fully paid by GE now.
- A modified union shop under which only future employes would be required to join the union as a condition of employment.
- An improved and broadened arbitration clause to reduce strikes over grievances.
- A minimum of two years' recall rights after layoff, with rights equal to length of service above two years.
- A letter of understanding to the effect that there shall be no contracting-out of work, where it has been performed traditionally in a plant or office, without prior consultation with the union involved.

The committee said many local unions have contract issues of importance to them. It urged the corporations to "deal swiftly" to meet the equities of the employes in local negotiations. They include:

Protecting the earnings of incentive workers against company raids, more adequate consideration for long-service employes in upgrading, better provisions for the selection and training of skilled workers, and measures to enable salaried employes to reach their top job rate more quickly.

GE has made two contract offers since the unions submitted their proposal in July. Westinghouse, with an Oct. 16 contract expiration date, made its first offer Sept. 26. Both were rejected as inadequate, though they were called an improvement over company bargaining stances in previous years.

Agreement Sought

Machinists Pres. P. L. Siemiller, who presided at the unity meeting, reported that "every talent at our command is being used to settle this dispute honorably without interrupting the work."

"We are part way through," Siemiller said at the meeting four days before the GE deadline. "We have until midnight Oct. 2. Let's get on with it."

Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, which bargains for a majority of GE's union workers, said "1966 is the year we begin to make the changes" that will make the 11-union objectives "worthwhile."

Chairman John Callahan of the IUE-GE Conference Board reported that delegates from all IUE-GE locals had voted unanimously, at a meeting with record attendance, to turn down the firm's last offer.

Delegates from Syracuse and Pittsfield told how their locals had voted strongly for strike authorization if a suitable agreement is not reached—by a 4-1 margin in Syracuse, 2-1 at Pittsfield.

In both locals, GE management gave workers time off to vote and paid for their transportation to the voting places, Callahan said.

The unity meeting was the latest in a series that began when Meany chaired a March meeting that pledged coordinated bargaining and solidarity to the finish.

The March session was followed by 17 grass-roots conferences to keep members informed. The joint committee produced its own newspaper and established a teletype network to keep 17 regional outlets in full touch with developments.

The IUE added representatives of the other unions to its own bargaining committee and, when GE negotiators walked out of the first meeting, filed an unfair labor practice complaint wth the NLRB. The board won a federal court injunction to prevent GE from attempting to dictate the personnel of the IUE committee. A company challenge to the ruling brought a reversal on procedural grounds by the 2nd U. S. Circuit Court of Appeals, but that ruling was stayed by Supreme Court Justice John M. Harlan. Meanwhile negotiations continued, though GE and Westinghouse reserved their right to legal protest.

The unions in the AFL-CIO coalition are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, the Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters, Steelworkers and IUE.

Teamsters Stall Election At 2d DiGiorgio Ranch

Wine and 11 Cellars Wine, after the firm signed a Teamsters contract covering its field operations while the field workers were out on strike.

- The National Labor Relations Board scheduled an Oct. 27 election among inside workers at the Pirelli-Minetti winery after they all joined the Distillery Workers in support of the striking field hands and in protest against the Teamsters' activities.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher charged that the latest developments were new evidence of the continuing link between major non-union growers and the Teamsters Union, which was expelled from the federation in 1957 on findings of corrupt domination.

Kircher recalled that DiGiorgio had openly solicited votes and support for the Teamsters among its workers before the Delano election.

The Farm Workers beat this combination soundly in Delano, he declared, "and they will beat it again should the Arvin election be held. It is the anticipation of such a defeat that has caused the Teamsters to back away from an election procedure."

Tracing the dispute at the Perelli-Minetti winery, Kircher said all of the field workers at the 1,500-acre grape ranch near Delano had joined the AFL-CIO Farm Workers and struck when the company refused to meet with the union.

The fields remained empty for two days, he said, until the Teamsters drove strikebreakers through the picket lines "in Teamster buses with Teamster representatives acting as armed guards." Shortly thereafter the company signed a "back-door" agreement with the Teamsters and the Farm Workers called the nationwide boycott, he reported.

A spokesman for the Distillery Workers had high praise for the organizational work of the Farm Workers among the winery's inside employes. He said the union had been trying to organize these workers unsuccessfully for many years.

Kircher noted that the Teamsters had been invited to take part in the NLRB conferences setting up the Perelli-Minetti vote, but had failed to show up.

TWU Achieves Airline Pact On Strike Eve

New York—The Transport Workers and American Airlines have reached a tentative agreement covering 12,000 workers at the nation's second largest airline, subject to ratification by the membership.

The agreement was reached hours before a strike deadline and after the union members had overwhelmingly rejected a company offer and voted a Sept. 28 walkout. The talks were extended for an additional 12 hours during which agreement was reached.

Details of the agreement were not disclosed pending a membership vote on the terms. The TWU represents mechanics, maintenance and ground service personnel as well as store and communication employes in 48 cities served by American Airlines.

Last July the President named an emergency board under the Railway Labor Act to help the parties reach a settlement after they had deadlocked. The board declined to recommend settlement terms, declaring that the issues could be resolved without a strike.

The airline offer rejected by the union was reported to call for three 5 percent wage increases over a three year period as well as some fringe benefit improvements.

CONVENTION

The Flight Engineers have moved their convention, originally scheduled for Nov. 15-17 in Washington, to the Mark Hopkins Hotel, San Francisco, on Nov. 15 and 16.

Glass Bottle Parley Spurs Political Effort

More than 300 delegates to an eastern area educational conference of the Glass Bottle Blowers have placed heavy emphasis on the need for bipartisan political action in this year's elections.

Representing 86 local unions from 10 states ranging from Florida to the northern border, the conferees devoted one of four workshops to political education and legislation. Joseph Rourke, assistant director of COPE, served as a discussion leader.

Reviewing labor's role in foreign affairs, GBB Pres. Lee W. Minton also told the delegates that "we cannot falter in our stand against communism, because the choice is simply one of having freedom or having government-controlled industry and unions."

He also said that creation of labor courts or other forms of compulsory settlement of labor disputes would mean an end to true collective bargaining and convert unions into simple political instruments.

A similar conference for GBBA locals in the central region will open Oct. 10 in St. Louis.

GUEST BADGE for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers convention is pinned on Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz by IBEW Sec. Joseph D. Keenan.

Oregon Labor Backs Duncan's Senate Bid

North Bend, Ore.—The Oregon AFL-CIO, at its 11th annual convention here, backed the senatorial bid of Democratic Congressman Robert Duncan, one of the House liberals who voted for repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Organized labor's support gave added thrust to the accelerating campaign of the 45-year-old two-term congressman who threatens to derail the promising political career of Gov. Mark Hatfield, the Republican candidate for the Senate seat being relinquished by Democrat Maurine Neuberger.

Convention delegates endorsed for governor the Democratic candidate, Robert Straub, present state treasurer. They backed incumbent Democratic Rep. Al Ullman and two Democratic congressional nominees, Charles Porter, a former congressman, and Malcolm Cross, nephew of Gov. Hatfield's campaign public relations director. Porter seeks the seat being vacated by Duncan and Cross opposes GOP Rep. Wendell Wyatt, who flunked all 13 of COPE's key votes in the 89th Congress.

The convention, by a 12-vote margin, refused to endorse Democratic Rep. Edith Green because of her vote against repeal of Section 14(b).

The 477 delegates voted to prohibit persons 65 or older from being nominated for office in the state labor federation. At the same time they conferred president-emeritus status upon J. D. McDonald, 71, upon his leaving office next year.

Others Qualify

The age limit will have no immediate effect on the other two key elective offices. George Brown, political education and legislative director, won't turn 65 until after the 1967 convention and Edward J. Whelan, who holds the top executive post of secretary-treasurer, is 40.

Whelan, completing his first year in office, reported that the state AFL-CIO gained 20,000 members in the past 12 months. Present strength of affiliates is 120,000.

McDonald, in his convention address, called for reform in the congressional and state legislative rules to end "minority rule by the reactionaries." Noting how national and state legislative committees can bottle up liberal legislation, he contrasted this to the democratic procedures under which the state labor convention operates.

Delegates went on record in support of:

- A state minimum wage law of $1.25 an hour "with subsequent increases to be in conformity with federal legislation."
- A legislative interim committee study of the electric utility, gas and telephone industries with the goal of obtaining service at "the lowest possible cost."
- Improvements in the state workmen's compensation law.
- Full collective bargaining status for public employes, including teachers.
- The Johnson Administration's Viet Nam policies.
- The efforts of maritime unions to preserve and strengthen the U.S. merchant marine.
- Legislation demanding disclosure of true interest in installment contracts.
- Giving 18-year-olds the right to vote.
- A study to determine why auto insurance rates are higher in Oregon than in other western states.

At 75th Anniversary Convention:

IBEW Strengthens Pensions, Sets Study of Disputes Plan

St. Louis—The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers closed out its 75th anniversary convention here with intense attention to the union's internal affairs, including approval of a stronger IBEW pension plan for members and provision for a study of the union's unique industrial relations council system for settling disputes involving construction locals.

Delegates to the convention, after two days of thorough and sometimes heated debate, approved the new IBEW pension plan, raising and expanding benefits but also raising contributions from $1.60 or $3.20 monthly to $10.

The plan established in 1927, Sec. Joseph D. Keenan explained, was inadequately financed and faced an imminent danger of a steady decline in its reserves to meet obligations.

An actuarially sound revision of the plan, authorized by the last IBEW convention, provided a system of disability pensions, a vesting system and a doubling of benefits in return for the increased contribution.

The plan was apparently approved by a standing vote when it was presented to the delegates but the issue was reopened the next day for a rollcall vote by only those delegates representing members participating in the pension system. The rollcall resulted in a count of 178,216 for the new plan, 101,094 against, and it was approved a second time.

Study Ordered

The convention voted to establish a study committee, to report by Sept. 1, 1967, to propose improvements in operations of the industrial relations council.

The council functions to check the outbreak of disputes between employers and construction locals that might result in strikes and is credited by its proponents with having given electrical construction a reputation as a "strikeless" industry.

A number of construction locals filed resolutions complaining that there was an element of compulsory arbitration in the requirement that locals use the machinery of the industrial relations council. Critics said that existence of the council was used as a "crutch," a substitute for responsible local bargaining.

The delegates approved the study commission proposal, offered by the resolutions committee as a substitute for more drastic solutions, by a standing vote of 1,334 to 824. The study unit was directed to give "particular attention" to the issue of retroactivity of pay increases to the date of contract periods after demands for adjustments had been served.

The study was also directed to deal with such issues as the length of time any person could serve in the industrial relations council, the methods of hearing cases, and provision for records of each decision.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany praised the IBEW's "imaginative and effective" register-and-vote program in a letter to the convention. He urged the union to "press that campaign with greater energy than ever before" in the "vitally important" election this November.

Meany also hailed the cooperative effort of the IBEW and 10 other unions in the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining with General Electric and Westinghouse.

"This multi-union cooperative effort holds great promise, not only for the workers involved, but for the labor movement as a whole," Meany declared. He praised the IBEW's "unstinting participation" in the inter-union program.

Speakers in the closing sessions included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, COPE Deputy Dir. Joseph Rourke, two industrialists, and Louis Sherman, the union's general counsel.

Schnitzler told the delegates that the better lives that have been achieved for IBEW members and their families over the years are the "diamonds" of the union's 75th anniversary.

The union and the American labor movement, he stressed, have continually fought for measures benefiting the entire nation.

He cited the achievement of medicare which has brought "a new sense of security to 17 million elderly Americans, of whom only a few are active, dues paying members."

It was the labor movement, Schnitzler said, that "kept medicare alive" when it seemed doomed to defeat and "helped rally the senior citizens groups and the many other organizations dedicated to its enactment. We kept pushing forward and we won."

He pointed out to editorial writers who can't seem to "find a good word for the labor movement" that "not one single additional dues payer will come to the labor movement as a result of medicare. This is simply a matter of acting in the public interest."

Rourke, presenting IBEW Pres. Gordon Freeman with a plaque acknowledging the union's fulfillment of its COPE quota in voluntary contributions for political education, emphasized a similar theme.

"I don't know why people are so touchy about COPE and about politics," he said.

"Politics is good workmen's compensation laws, good unemployment compensation laws. Political decisions decide the interest rate on your mortgage, decide what kind of police and fire protection you are going to have, decide almost everything that affects your daily lives," he told the 2,500 delegates.

Sherman, calling for an undiminished campaign for repeal of Section 14(b), under which 19 states have enacted so-called "right-to-work" laws, advised the delegates to emphasize the theme that these laws simply allow the continued existence of "free riders"—members of the bargaining unit for whom unions negotiate benefits but who refuse to help pay the cost of representation.

Thomas G. Ayers, president of Commonwealth Edison Co. in Chicago, spoke of tremendous potential progress in service and jobs in the electrical industry and the values of free collective bargaining.

History of Failure

"What the public doesn't seem to realize is that government-dominated bargaining has a history of failure," Ayers said, citing a "long period of strife" in the railroad industry which he attributed to the fact that "there has been no real private bargaining by the railroads for decades."

"The surest road to industrial peace is a bargain that satisfies both parties," he said, and the wisest outside arbitrator may "order the melon cut at the wrong angle."

Board Chairman Charles F. Adams of the Raytheon Co. emphasized that a "sense of balance" is necessary in bargaining and that nothing could be further from the truth" than the false assumption that "business and labor are irreconcilable."

On many issues the two groups have the same view, he continued, giving at an example "the current drive to limit the issuance of tax-exempt municipal bonds to build industrial plants. Our reasons may be somewhat different but our conclusions would be the same."

Montana Labor Expands State Legislative Effort

Missoula, Mont.—Delegates to the ninth constitutional convention of the Montana AFL-CIO voted to direct the state body to organize a program of "more effective lobbying" for labor and social legislation before the Montana Legislature.

The resolution, adopted unanimously, asked that the program include a "Union Labor Day" during the legislative session at which union members and supporters would gather "to demonstrate the true significance of labor's interest and strength" to members of the legislature and the public.

Sen. Lee Metcalf and Rep. Arnold Olsen, both Democrats, were endorsed for re-election, John Melcher, Democratic candidate for Congress from the 2d District, also was endorsed.

The convention also boosted the per capita payments of affiliates from 16 to 17 cents per month with the added 1 cent earmarked to finance the state body's educational program. The constitution was amended, because of a change in the primary election date, to set the state convention from June to August.

Revision of the state workmen's compensation law to broaden the definitions of "injured" and "injury" was urged, with extension of benefits from the present maximum of 500 weeks to the entire period of disability.

A companion resolution protested that disqualifications under unemployment compensation are "unfair" and the weekly benefits and duration are "grossly inadequate," and called for their improvement.

Other resolutions:

- Supported the COPE dollar drive and urged "continued efforts" by all unions to make sure all members register and vote.
- Supported the strike of the printing trades unions at the Kingsport, Tenn., Press.
- Asked that medicare benefits be made available to all persons retired because of illness or injury, regardles of age.

Speakers included Metcalf, Dir. James J. Leary of AFL-CIO Region XXI; Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of central bodies; Margaret Thornburgh, director of the western region of COPE's Women's Activities Division; Pres. Darrell Dorman of the Idaho AFL-CIO and Pres. Leonard Kenfield of the Montana Farmers Union.

Emerson Elected to Musicians Board

New York—Executive Sec. J. Martin Emerson of Washington Musicians Local 161 has been elected to the AFM international executive board to fill the vacancy created by the death of the late Pres. Howard P. (Hud) Greene of the Detroit local.

Emerson, born in Washington, started his career as a classical trombonist and later played with well-known dance bands, including those of the late Tommy Dorsey and Gene Krupa. He was elected to the Local 161 executive board in 1943, named executive secretary in 1950.

Baldanzi Hits Bid to Erase Textile Tariffs

Gatlinburg, Tenn.—The recent proposal to terminate all international textile agreements, made by Rep. Thomas B. Curtis (R-Mo.), would cost the jobs of thousands of American textile workers, Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers told 250 delegates from 75 locals at the union's annual southern conference.

Curtis is one of four government advisers in the Kennedy round of negotiations on the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade going on in Geneva. Baldanzi urged the Johnson Administration to repudiate his views as contrary to U.S. policy.

"The UTWA would agree to the abolition of all restrictive tariffs if a worldwide system of equitable standards were established" Baldanzi said. "But under present conditions the only way to protect the jobs of American textile workers against unfair foreign competition is through the establishment of quotas by category."

Per Capita Payments Hiked:

Carpenters Expand Membership Drive

Kansas City—The 85th anniversary convention of the Carpenters here voted two separate increases in per capita payments to the international union—the first largely to finance increased organization activities and apprenticeship programs, the second to finance higher pensions for retired members.

The first increase of 25 cents a month from the previous level of $1.80 was approved the morning of the convention's final day. The second, a 60-cent increase earmarked for beneficiaries of the Carpenters pension plan, was voted in the afternoon after a committee recommended rejection of a proposed increase from $15 to $30 a month for lack of a funding plan.

Total per capita was raised to $2.65 a month, with $1.20 earmarked for pensions.

The 25-cent jump in payments to the general fund came after the convention's committee on organization recommended that local unions and district councils be instructed to set up immediate organizing campaigns in their areas.

Failing action in the field by a local or district council, the committee report approved by the convention said, Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson was authorized to set up a new local or locals to "do the job."

The president was also authorized to set up an investigation of organizing failures at the local level and to direct means to operate and finance organization work in any area.

Apprentice Plan Adopted

The convention approved a plan for an expanded and updated apprentice training program, including establishment of an international apprenticeship contest in 1968 and the continuing publication of modernized apprenticeship study materials by the union's general office under the direction of Vice Pres. Finlay C. Allan.

Action by the delegates in these fields followed Hutcheson's keynote speech the opening day warning that existing apprentice operations provided barely enough new journeymen to make up for deaths among union members in any given year and the blunt comment that too many locals were refusing to admit fully-qualified journeymen working at journeymen's wages.

Delegates also approved a report from the convention's political education committee praising the formation of the Carpenters Legislative Improvement Committee (CLIC) to seek voluntary contributions from members for political and legislative activities.

The report recommended that delegates urge the establishment of CLIC committees in each local union.

Hutcheson in closing remarks pointed out that Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen had been responsible, through a filibuster, for keeping repeal of Section 14(b) from reaching the Senate floor.

He accused Chairman Adam Clayton Powell (D-N.Y.) of the House Labor Committee of having "personally prevented" the situs picketing bill from reaching the floor for action despite the fact his committee had approved the measure.

"There is only one way," he remarked, that passage of these bills will ever be accomplished —by the election of "those individuals whose philosophies embrace those ideals and aspirations to which the trade union movement is dedicated."

"I dislike the term 'friend of labor'," he continued. "We would be well satisfied if any candidate merely guided himself by the concept of the greatest good for the greatest number."

Freshmen's Role Cited

Rep. Richard Bolling (D), representing the nearby 4th Congressional District, warned delegates that the next Congress would have many more legislative failures unless approximately 40 freshman members, chosen in 1964, were re-elected on Nov. 8.

"They have been the margin between conservatism and progressivism" in the 89th Congress, he said.

"Every piece of good legislation passed"—including medicare, school aid and the anti-poverty program— "would have been killed or modified" without their votes, Bolling stressed.

"Everyone in this room is going to regret our failure to make every effort" in their behalf if they are defeated this year, he said.

The convention voted to establish a pension system for paid officers and leaders of local unions by requiring locals to pay one-tenth of their salaries for pension purposes.

It also passed a strong resolution protesting the spreading process of electronic espionage that may become an intrusion into private affairs and voted to set the Carpenters' legislative program in harmony with the programs of the AFL-CIO and the federation's Building and Construction Trades Dept.

The delegates voted that as long as Hutcheson remained president he would be paid $10,000 a year more than the salary set for the office by the executive board.

ENTHUSIASTIC DELEGATES to the Carpenters convention at Kansas City parade with placards and stop for a handshake with Pres. Maurice A. Hutcheson who, with other top officers, was re-elected unanimously.

Editors Form Steelworkers Press Group

Atlantic City—Local and regional publications of the Steelworkers have formed the United Steelworkers Press Association to encourage the establishment of more such papers and improve those that exist.

The association will become an industrial affiliate of the Intl. Labor Press Association, AFL-CIO.

More than 50 editors attended a two-day conference that adopted formal bylaws and a code of ethics.

Speakers included USWA Pres. I. W. Abel; Dai Davies, assistant general secretary of the British steel union; Robert Maynard, city editor of the York (Pa.) Gazette & Daily, and Kenneth Fiester, ILPA secretary-treasurer.

Officers of the new association are James Gedling, Lorain (O.) Labor Leader, president; Bruce Balloch, Union Views, Reading, Pa., secretary-treasurer; and Clarence Matlovich, Clareton, Pa.; William Scoggins, East Chicago, Ind.; Bill DeVane, Tampa, Fla.; Ted Lopez, Pueblo, Colo. and Ray Poirier, Sudbury, Ont., regional vice presidents.

Tennessee Official Dies; Headed Jackson Labor

Jackson, Tenn.—State Commissioner of Labor W. H. (Billy) Parham, secretary-treasurer of Motion Picture Projectionists Local 639 here since 1937 and former president of the Jackson Trades & Labor Council, died here after a heart attack.

Supreme Court Urged to Uphold Union's Right to Reject Grievance

The AFL-CIO has filed with the Supreme Court a brief supporting the right of union officers to refuse to take a worker's grievance to arbitration when they feel it has no merit.

The brief presents arguments why the high court should reverse a $10,300 damage verdict voted by a Jackson County Circuit Court jury in Kansas City, Mo., and later upheld by the Missouri Supreme Court, against the unaffiliated United Brotherhood of Packinghouse Workers, representing Swift & Co. workers at several plants.

Though the brotherhood is not a part of the federation, the AFL-CIO has a "profound interest" in the answers given by the court to the questions involved, since more than 90 percent of all U.S. union agreements provide a grievance and arbitration procedure similar to the one involved, the brief noted. It was filed by federation General Counsel J. Albert Woll, Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris and two members of Woll's law firm, Robert C. Mayer and Laurence Gold.

The case involves Ben Owens, who died after bringing suit against the brotherhood for failing to take his grievance to arbitration. Owens' estate kept the suit alive and will collect any damages resulting from the jury's award—$7,000 for actual damages plus $3,300 for punitive damages.

A statement filed with the court recites these facts:

Strong but Sick

Owens was a strong man who used to work long hours in a Swift "cooler" trimming and manhandling beef carcasses. But he was also a sick man with a congenital heart condition and high blood pressure, for which he had been treated for many years.

He took sick leave in 1959 and went to a hospital.

Several months later, his doctor certified that he was able to return to work, but the company doctor told him he was still too sick to work and should go back to bed.

Owens wouldn't take the company doctor's advice. He filed a grievance under the union contract and meanwhile got other jobs requiring heavy work. The union processed his case through four grievance steps but decided not to take it to arbitration when a heart specialist selected by Owens examined him "thoroughly" and reported he was too sick to work.

Owens died in December 1964, aged 52. His suit charged the union had "arbitrarily, capriciously and without just or reasonable cause" refused to take the case to arbitration.

The jury agreed with Owens' charges and, though the trial judge set aside the verdict on the ground that Owens should have taken his claim to the National Labor Relations Board, the state Supreme Court reinstated the verdict.

The AFL-CIO brief cited several reasons why the high court should reverse the Missouri court. It argued that the NLRB has exclusive primary jurisdiction, the lower courts used an erroneous standard of liability and awarded improper relief, federal law takes precedence over state law in such cases, a union may refuse to arbitrate a grievance provided it acts in good faith, and federal law does not sanction the award of punitive damages for breach of the duty of fair representation.

Iowa Delegates Step Up Political Action Efforts

Waterloo, Ia.—Intensified efforts in support of endorsed candidates and labor's legislative program were pledged by delegates to the Iowa State AFL-CIO's annual convention.

Warning against complacency, the convention declared that Iowa labor has an unparalleled opportunity to improve its position by a sustained campaign to register all members and get them to vote for friendly candidates in November.

An endorsement conference, held between convention sessions, voted to support Gov. Harold E. Hughes (D) and six incumbent Democratic congressmen for re-election. It endorsed Pat Touchea, Waterloo, in preference to Rep. H. R. Gross (R) and Prof. E. B. Smith over Sen. Jack R. Miller (R).

On the state level, the prospects are good for adding five or six more Senate seats in urban areas and maintaining the present favorable balance for those areas in the House, state COPE Chairman J. B. Mincks reported.

Labor was partially successful in the last session of the state legislature, but some legislators are not acting in accord with party platform pledges, said Mincks, who is executive vice president of the state central body.

The convention called for repeal of the state's so-called right-to-work law and urged restrictions on the use of court injunctions against picketing; formation of a state labor relations board, collective bargaining for public employes, and a law requiring payment of prevailing wages.

Delegates reported that the state's mobile registration law has made it easier to register voters, and pledged to take full advantage of it before registration closes Oct. 29. Under the law, deputy registration commissioners, including many union members, may go into the field to register voters.

The convention changed voting procedures to make the state executive council more representative; gave salary raises to the officers and set up a standing committee on education to study a college scholarship program in cooperation with the labor-management center at the State University of Iowa.

Under the pay raise resolution, Pres. Hugh D. Clark will get a salary boost in October from $11,000 a year to $12,000. Sec.-Treas. Harry L. Branscomb and Mincks will go from $10,000 to $11,000.

Unionists Renamed To Advisory Panel

Albert S. Epstein, associate research director of the Machinists, and Howard Young, actuarial consultant to the Auto Workers, have been reappointed by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to the Advisory Council on employe welfare and pension benefit plans.

The council, composed of 13 members, was set up in the Welfare & Pension Plans Disclosure Act and meets periodically with the secretary of labor to advise him on carrying out his duties under the act. Other members, whose terms have not expired, are AFL-CIO Assistant Social Security Dir. Richard E. Shoemaker and Dir. Wilbur Daniels of the Ladies' Garment Workers Master Agreement Dept.

Taking It on the Chin

THE GOVERNMENT has come up with some new and highly significant figures that the average factory worker is taking it on the chin financially.

A worker with three dependents has been taking home more after deductions for income and social security taxes but his paycheck is buying less. The villain is higher prices, especially for food and medical care and services generally.

In August 1965 this worker had a take-home paycheck of $95.87. A year later, in August 1966, the paycheck rose to $98.46, a gain of $2.59.

But in the same period the real purchasing power of that paycheck declined 63 cents!

During that same period, also, profits and dividend payments skyrocketed to new highs, even after adjustment for real earning power.

During this same period, also, unit labor costs have remained practically unchanged, proving conclusively that the rising cost of living does not stem from higher wages or labor costs.

This situation demands quick and specific correction. It calls for, first of all, an increase in wages and fringe benefits that will give the worker a fair share of the tremendous earnings of the companies he works for. It calls for establishing a formula that will not see wage gains wiped out by price increases that have little if any relationship to higher wage costs.

The essentials of the nation's economy call for a strong and constant purchasing power, and the great bulk of American purchasing power is in the hands of people who work for wages and salaries. A stable, expanding economy demands an end to the drainage of the worker's purchasing power and recognition of his right to a fair share of the wealth he helps produce.

COPE's Home Stretch

THE 1966 ELECTION campaign is in the home stretch, in the final five weeks. The primaries are over, the candidates selected and the issues are coming into focus.

Across the nation COPE committees have made or are in the process of making endorsements in the senatorial, gubernatorial, and congressional contests, and in many states and cities local COPE groups are backing candidates for the state legislatures, city councils and other local offices.

Those candidates endorsed by COPE have been selected because of their liberal and progressive records and views. They represent the best hope for progress at the national, state and local levels.

Because they represent liberal viewpoints they need the all-out support of trade unionists to fight off the attacks of their generally conservative opponents. That means working in the neighborhoods, the precincts and the wards to inform all trade union members and voters generally of the issues involved and of the critical need to get out and vote on election day.

It means, also, voluntary contributions to help finance the campaigns of COPE-endorsed candidates. A few extra dollars can make the difference—a little more radio time, television spots, mailings. Now, in the final five weeks, is the time to make sure that the best possible job is being done.

It Doesn't Measure Up

Scores 'Black Power' Drive:

Civil Rights, Labor Coalition Vital to Racial Peace—Randolph

The following is excerpted from an address by AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph to the 13th constitutional convention of the Steelworkers in Atlantic City.

WE HAVE in the country at this time growing tension between the black people and white people.

There is what is known as the growing white backlash and there is also a growing black backlash. What will this amount to? If it continues there will be a confrontation of blacks and whites in America, not from the point of intellectual dialogue but from the point of view of a struggle, one to secure its full citizenship rights, and others to deny him the right to get these rights.

I am greatly concerned about this condition. I looked upon the faces of white citizens on the television when Negroes were marching in Chicago for the right of open occupancy in housing, and the faces were ugly with rage and resentment. This was an unhappy thing.

And then, of course, Negroes were throwing bottles and bricks, Molotov cocktails, turning over automobiles, throwing rocks into stores, looting the stores, engaging in lawlessness and so forth. I deplore lawlessness of any kind. I deplore riots of any kind. Throwing Molotov cocktails is not the answer to the problem of the Negro. The answer is deeper than that.

And consequently, civil rights leaders are greatly concerned about this trend. I want to see the civil rights leaders take great care against overheating the ghettos that have the racial and social chemistry full of ingredients of explosive potentialities. This could escalate into a race war which could become catastrophic to the Negro and to America.

Therefore, I plead with you as workers to help us resolve this problem. You know what it is to be deprived of your rights. In the middle of the 19th century the workers did not have the right to form a union of their own. There was what is known as the law of conspiracy, and if three or more workers were found together, they were penalized. Nevertheless, you fought against that, and in the latter part of the 19th century the great strikes of America took place—the railroad strike of 1894 under Eugene Victor Debs.

Railroad strikes resulted in tearing up the rails and burning down the terminals because the workers thought they had rights that were being deprived them. And, of course, you recall the Haymarket riot in Chicago in 1886; the Homestead massacre around the 90's; the Ludlow massacre. In other words, there have been battlefields all over this nation where the workers have been fighting for their rights.

Therefore the Negro workers have a right to come to you, to call upon you to help in winning their fundamental rights that are God-given and not man made.

We have developed a program, and I believe that the time has come when the street marches and demonstrations have about run their course. I believe that the strategy now in order is to shift from the streets to the conference room for the purpose of discussion of the problems in the interests of finding an answer.

WE KNOW that the public has lost some of its sympathy for the cause of civil rights because of demonstrations and disorders in the street.

You have heard a lot about black power. Well, the civil rights organizations are not committed to black power. That is a slogan and you cannot solve basic social and economic problems with slogans. It is based upon the assumption of salvation through racial isolation, which is absolutely unsound.

However, it has been created by oppression of Negroes in this country. It didn't just come out of the air. It came out of frustration, a sense of despair and hopelessness. Negroes are grabbing at every straw they think might help in the bringing out of emancipation. Instead of separation we need cooperation. That is why we have proposed a freedom budget, which is based upon the alliance between labor and the civil rights movement. This alliance will go farther and build what is known as a coalition.

In other words, we are attempting to transform the civil rights revolution into a social revolution which is concerned not only about the Negro, but about the poor whites as well.

We realize that there are 35 million people, according to the Dept. of Labor, on the poverty line in this country. Twenty percent of them are black and about 75 percent are white. Therefore, the black working poor and the white working poor must unite in order that we might be able to create full employment under the leadership of organized labor. There is no remedy for the problem that confronts the civil rights revolution without full employment. Full employment is the basis of fair employment.

Clash of Old and New Marks Japan's Post-War Adjustment

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EDT.)

TOKYO—Did you ever have a truck driver bow to you for conceding him the right of way? Well, I did. Traffic is murderous in Japan, literally. Pedestrians are not supposed to be run down at intersections but you never know. When the driver of a huge van turned a corner in Tokyo's teeming Ginza into my path, I didn't take a chance. I waved him thru. As he passed, he rose above the steering wheel and bowed.

Morgan

The collisions in Japan are not limited to the streets. The old in this tradition-trained country is constantly clashing head-on with the new. Japan's defeat in World War II could have been a disaster to her people whose ceremonial politess, partly to save face, hid even from themselves a host of secrets ranging from the cruelty and aggressive ambitions of some to the modest hopes and vague puzzled discontent of the majority. But defeat was not a disaster. Thanks in large part to an unhumiliating allied occupation and a viable peace treaty, it became a kind of release.

Japan on the surface has become westernized and more liberal in its outlook in the process. But great confusion has been generated, too. What happens to a Japanese father, reared in ancester worship and reverence for parental authority, when he is confronted with a beatnick son running wild in rock 'n roll joints, seeming to shake the city more profoundly than the great Tokyo earthquake?

What happens to a Japanese mother, trained to docile compliance with a male's wishes and accustomed only to one of the world's most modest female garments—the kimono—when she is confronted with a bobby-soxed daughter insisting on living by her own set of values which includes equality with teen-agers of the opposite sex.

The Japanese government has been concerned with the psychological and other problems involved in the post-war adjustment of 90 million Japanese. Like any self-respecting Western government, it ordered a study made. Conducted by a special council working with the Ministry of Education, a final report was submitted entitled "The Image of an Ideal Japanese." An interim report submitted nearly two years ago generated much criticism on the ground the government was trying to force the population into a common mold, branded a conservative human image. The final report is milder and seems to be more mildly received.

The study candidly conceded that though Japan started anew as a democratic nation after the end of World War II, democracy has not yet taken firm root in the minds of the Japanese people.

Then it probed family responsibilities. The home should be a place of rest, fostering love among its members, educating its young, and making them, as they mature, available for service to the community or the state.

As for a citizen's community responsibilities, the study said, in effect, that a citizen shouldn't waste time envying somebody else's position but get on with the work at hand. As such, there is no such thing as a dignified job and a lowly job, it stressed. The important thing is not what the individual's job is, but how much heart he puts into his job. (American employers and employes, organized or unorganized, take note.) Also, it went on, he should contribute to social welfare, and he must be creative.

I FIND ALL THIS fascinating and even inspiring. I only wish the city fathers of Tokyo would be creative enough to do something about street numbers. Addresses, as such, simply don't exist in Tokyo. Last evening, it took my ABC colleague Lou Cioffi and his charming Japanese wife nearly an hour to find one of the oldest and most famous tempura restaurants in the city where they had been going regularly for more than 12 years.

Tokyo with its labyrinth of streets and neighborhoods is like that.

This morning I asked a hotel clerk to scribble a note which would explain to a taxi driver how to get to the ABC office. "Our directions," he said, "are a little different than in the United States." Then he spent seven minutes on the phone with ABC getting himself briefed on its location. Finally he drew, quite expertly, a detailed map with the ABC office indicated in red ink and instructions carefully written in Japanese how to get there. My taxi driver couldn't read the map. He wouldn't take a tip when we did get there by unknown means. Tips are beneath the dignity of taxi drivers in Japan.

I don't really know what the image of an ideal Japanese should be. I salute the government for trying to find it but I would be alarmed if it settled for a stereotype. In fact, on second thought, let the Tokyo city fathers carry on as usual. If 11 million residents of this city can find their way home every evening without knowing actually by street and number where they live, there is something ideal about it all in this age of mechanized regimentation and tidiness, and I for one will go along with it.

Halting of Business Tax Credit Seen Easing Mortgage Funds

ADMINISTRATION proposals to halt special corporate tax breaks, if approved by Congress, will help pull the home-building industry out of a depression, organized labor's chief economist has predicted.

Fast write-offs on new industrial buildings and the 7 percent tax credit subsidy on new equipment "are siphoning money out of the housing market," said Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

"Extremely high interest rates" on mortgages have added pressure, and home-building has now been pushed into a depression, Goldfinger said during the weekly network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

Prime interest rates to banks were raised by one-third since last December by Federal Reserve Board action and triggered similar boosts on home mortgages.

Goldfinger said that approval of the President's proposals would head off the need for "any further tax actions," such as a levy on excess profits, "at the present time."

He noted that the AFL-CIO had opposed both loopholes when they were first proposed and that "present conditions indicate" they never should have been approved by Congress.

"THEY PUT too much money into the hands of business and provided the fuel—and are providing the fuel now—for this super-boom," he said. "We would have a much more sustainable and much more balanced condition in the economy between business on the one hand, and the other sectors of the economy, such as the consuming public, if these laws had never been enacted."

Goldfinger predicted that the curbs will win full congressional approval "without too much difficulty."

Questioning him on the AFL-CIO-produced public service program, aired weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System, were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine, and Hobart Rowen, financial editor of the Washington Post and nationally syndicated economic columnist.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

ST. LOUIS—Here in the Midwest, where many of the states shaped their constitutions after the Civil War on what is called the Ohio pattern, the inadequacy of state institutions to meet crushing problems arising from population growth and the urbanizing of our culture becomes highly visible.

Most of the states—Missouri and neighboring Illinois are examples—have attempted to muddle through with legislative sessions only in odd-numbered years.

The sessions are limited in length, also, apparently on the theory that if the legislators aren't allowed to hang around the state capitols for more than a few months they won't have time to do any more than a minimum of harm to the taxpayers.

But state government is big business now, whether the taxpayers know it or not. Between 1948 and 1962, state and municipal employment rose three and a half times as rapidly as federal government employment.

AN ARTICLE in the National Civic Review by Harold Katz, a Democratic member of the Illinois General Assembly, contains some startling statistics.

The 1965 Illinois Legislature appropriated more money than Congress did in 1917 and nearly 10 times as much as the state legislature itself in 1943. Illinois spending has reached a level higher than that for all of the then 48 states in 1938.

Katz, chairman of a bipartisan commission named to survey the state's legislative system, has no complaint about the increased volume of work and appropriations, because the public demand for services has come in what he terms "those areas of activities which traditionally come within the state ambit—education, mental health, roads, social welfare and recreation."

What is appalling is his account of the handicaps under which the most conscientious legislator must attempt to make competent judgments about a budget that has reached $4.6 billion a biennium.

"We have no one to assist us in reading bills, preparing testimony, answering mail, checking facts and building an expertise about state problems," he wrote.

The legislative committees have no professional staffs—not even the appropriations committees. Two or three dozen bills may be heard by a committee within an hour or two, and members may never have seen the bills before entering the committee room. Members have no offices in which to work, no filing cabinets, so they "file" correspondence flat on the floor in their hat-and-coat lockers. Katz used more than his entire $50 postage and stationery allowance in answering more than 2,000 letters on a gun-control bill alone.

He quoted Republican State Sen. Harris Fawell, who helped push through creation of the commission to survey the legislative machinery: "You feel like you're in a jet war armed with a slingshot."

AN ANNUAL legislative session is one obvious answer to the problem of archaic state assemblies. But something more is required—committee staffing, staffing for members, the professional aids needed for a deliberative body handling and spending a great deal of the people's money.

Misrepresentation will disappear under the full impact of the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" decisions. But more money for the legislative process itself must be provided.

"The public has a right to expect from legislators dedication to the job and devotion to the public interest," Katz wrote. "Legislators, on the other hand, have a right to expect that the public will furnish them with the tools that enable them to do the job."

The federal government sets up programs not because it is hostile to so-called "states' rights" but because the states have not been functioning effectively. They will never function effectively until their constitutions have been modernized and their machinery of government has been updated.

CURBING SPECIAL corporate tax breaks and rolling back prime interest rates will help break the depression in the nation's home-building industry, AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (center) told Hobart Rowen (left) of the Washington Post and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine on Labor News Conference. The interview is a weekly AFL-CIO public service production on the Mutual radio network.

Prepaid Group Practice Plans Key to Cutting Medical Costs

By Sidney Margolius

LEAPING MEDICAL costs on top of steady rises the past seven years are draining an ever-increasing portion of family income.

The jumping bills also are threatening to push unions and employers into further negotiations over the need for improved medical insurance and to cause potential friction over the climbing costs of health insurance. Families with no unions to intercede for them have an especially serious problem.

The combined effect of rising hospital charges and the recent hop in fees charged older patients by doctors also could compel a further increase in social security taxes to maintain the medicare program.

Medical costs have been rising almost twice as fast as all other items this year even though the overall cost of living itself has been jumping at an unusual pace. While the total consumer price index has gone up about 3 percent since a year ago, the medical part has risen almost 5 percent. The rise in medical costs has been especially sharp the past six months—about 3.4 percent.

Since the 1957-59 period, medical costs in general have gone up about 28 percent, compared to approximately 13.5 percent for the overall index.

Both doctor and hospital fees have been rising, but the hospital increases are especially alarming. Hospital charges have gone up on the average 165 percent since 1957-59, and 7 percent this year alone. Doctor fees have gone up approximately 29 percent since 1957-59, with this year's rise of almost 6 percent particularly ominous.

Nor is there any relief in sight. Even though average hospital expenses during the past year jumped $3 a day nationally, to $44.50 including all charges, the American Hospital Association expects more hikes.

Hospital charges have reached especially lofty levels in some areas such as the Pacific Coast, where they now average $56 a day.

While hospital wages are notoriously low, surveys have found that in other ways hospitals and doctors sometimes cause unnecessary expenses through overstays, inappropriate admissions, duplication of facilities by local hospitals, and other wasteful practices.

The average family is powerless to cope by itself with the medical-cost increases. You face the alternatives of cutting down on other necessities or skimping on medical and dental care.

THERE IS A WAY to hold down medical costs while providing adequate care. But it is available only to some families and only in some cities. This is through prepaid group practice plans, operating now in some areas. By providing preventive care, these plans have been able to reduce the number of hospitalizations required by their members in comparison to the rest of the population.

The group plans also cut costs of doctor care because a number of doctors can share the latest equipment, and services of specialists and technical staff, which individual doctors often cannot afford.

But a big obstacle in expanding the group plans, so they will be available in more areas and to more families, is money to build facilities.

Group-practice facilities will get a big boost and be available to more families if the House finally enacts the bill, already passed by the Senate, which would provide federal mortgage guarantees. This would enable group plans to borrow construction money at relatively moderate rates.

Rising medical costs now have made passage of this bill urgent—to help protect family health as well as keep down costs.

The Knots in the Apron String Often Come to Light Rather Late

By Jane Goodsell

IT WAS FIVE DAYS before Katy was to leave for college, and she was ready, set and poised for flight like an astronaut about to take off for outer space. And considering the planning, coordination and money that had gone into getting her ready, it was difficult to realize that she was merely heading for the East Coast and not the moon.

For months we had been filling out forms, answering questionnaires, studying handbooks, writing checks and making out lists. Katy had her eyes tested, her teeth filled, her chest x-rayed, her childhood illnesses recorded and her tennis racket restrung. She had exchanged letters with her prospective roommate and she had obediently measured her dimensions for a regulation gym outfit and studied the freshman handbook until she almost knew it by heart.

Her typewriter, hair dryer, books, blankets and skis were already en route to her dormitory, and all that remained was to pack her clothes (including her first black dress) and send her off. She was done to a turn and ready to go. Or so we complacently thought. Then we discovered that she was as innocent as a baby about two basic facts of life: (1) coping with laundry; and (2) handling money.

Her naivete in the laundry sphere came to light when she asked me if her white wool sweater could go into the washing machine along with the towels.

"Good heavens!" I said. "If you put that sweater through the washing machine, it wouldn't fit anybody but a Barbie doll!"

"Oh, really?" she said. "Well, in that case, I suppose that flannel nightgowns have to be dry-cleaned, too."

I WAS STUNNED at the depths of her ignorance. It was all my fault, of course. I had never initiated her into the rites of washing, and it wasn't the sort of information she was likely to pick up from her friends. But except for rinsing out her stockings now and then, she'd never done a lick of laundry in her life.

So, in the few remaining days before her departure, she is taking lessons in Laundry. So far we have covered Laundry vs. Dry Cleaning, White vs. Colored Wash, the Relative Merits of the Dryer and the Clothesline, and Machine Settings for Cottons and Synthetic Fabrics. We still have to tackle Hand Washables.

Meanwhile, her father (who realized belatedly that he won't be around to dole out funds as she needs them) has been giving her a cram course in Handling a Checking Account: Filling Out the Deposit Slip, Writing the Check, Entering the Stub, Carrying Identification, Subtracting the Service Charge and Keeping Track of the Balance. Having emphasized the horrible repercussions of Overdrawing the Account, he has decided to skip Balancing the Checkbook for the time being.

Katy's last few days at home have been about as relaxed as basic training at boot camp. But she is philosophic about her travail. As she puts it, "Western Civ ought to be a breeze compared to what I've been going through at home the past few days."

Scrappy Elders Fight Digest's Distortions

THE NATIONAL Council of Senior Citizens has exposed a new attack by Reader's Digest as a series of distortions and misrepresentations.

The attack came in the Digest's September issue with an article by Kenneth O. Gilmore entitled "Let's Stop Exploiting People Over 65!" The article belabors the council for its support of social security, medicare, repeal of Section 14(b), the minimum wage, etc. It wears sack-cloth and ashes because of the "cruel hoax" it claims is being played on the older citizen by the Great Society's alleged promotion of inflation.

The outburst was promptly nailed in the Senior Citizen News, official publication of the council.

"Because the election campaigns are about to warm up and because of its hysterical opposition to social welfare plans," the News says, "it is not surprising that the Reader's Digest has finally launched an attack on the National Council. . . .

"If Senior Citizen News spent an entire page correcting all the phony conclusions drawn from this article, we would merely be reprinting facts with which members of the National Council are already familiar. But—though we will certainly send this material to the Reader's Digest—it is a foregone conclusion that the truth will never be printed.

"In a way, we feel honored about being singled out for attack by this notorious magazine. Clearly those who guide and direct its conservative philosophies fear the National Council of Senior Citizens is beginning to unite a powerful senior citizens movement—capable of developing the support for progressive social welfare legislation which will bring a better life for older Americans."

The News ridicules the Digest's claim that senior citizens are "on a political treadmill that keeps them panting in pursuit of federal handouts so long as they deliver votes" and notes that the Digest failed to mention the reasoning beyond the Council's opposition to so-called "right-to-work" laws.

"We found that the elderly poor have a much more difficult struggle for existence in the 19 states which have so-called 'right-to-work' laws," the News says. "The rollcall of these states includes the most backward states in America.

"Average payments of old age assistance, aid to the blind, aid to the permanently disabled are much lower in the 'right-to-work' states than in the free bargaining states. Thus the elderly have very pertinent reasons for repealing 14(b) of Taft-Hartley—but Reader's Digest doesn't want those elderly who are not members of the National Council to know what these reasons are."

THE NEWS also analyzes past evidences of the Digest's assumption of omniscience and its refusal to correct either its inaccuracies or its twisting of facts, and its determination to print only the side of an issue that serves its own purposes.

"We've promised our membership nothing but blood, sweat and tears," the News article concludes, "if they are prepared to work to achieve a better life for all older Americans. Medicare and a first small increase in social security have been enacted—but there is still a long road to travel.

"We'll progress along that road with the help of both Republican and Democratic lawmakers. We would have been in bad shape on medicare but for the continuous support given us by outstanding Republicans. . . .

"Members of the National Council's affiliated clubs—registered Republicans and registered Democrats—believe that building a better life for the elderly should be a nonpartisan effort."

Union Programs Help Meet Rising Need for Scholarships

AFL-CIO affiliates, increasingly aware of the growing need for higher education, have announced additional awards of college scholarships, several of which initiated new programs.

Among them was the Operative Potters, which named the first winners of three scholarships honoring Pres. Edwin L. Wheatley. Awarded on a regional basis to the children of members, each is worth $500 a year for four years of study.

Chosen were Margaret Creameans, daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Creameans of Local 33, Beaver Falls, Pa., who plans to attend Carnegie Institute of Technology; Sheila Ludwig, daughter of V. Howard Ludwig of Local 9, East Liverpool, O., who will study at Ohio State University; and Christopher Kanatsky, son of William R. Kanatsky of Local 218, Torrance, Calif., who plans to pursue studies for the Catholic priesthood at St. John's Seminary College, Camarillo, Calif.

The Lithographers & Photoengravers also initiated a scholarship program created by delegates to the 1965 convention. One award to the son or daughter of a member, worth $500 for each of the four college years subject only to "reasonable requirements of performance," will be presented during each of the first four years of the program, LPIU Pres. Kenneth J. Brown said.

The premier winner was Antoinette G. Kirsch, whose father, Clifford A. Kirsch, has been a member of St. Louis Local 10P for the past 20 years. Miss Kirsch will attend St. Louis University.

8 URW Awards

The Rubber Workers have awarded Joseph W. Childs Memorial scholarships to eight students who will enter college in the fall of 1967. The awards honor the memory of the union's late vice president, who died in 1960, and are spread among the seven URW districts. Six of them are worth $500 each, while the seventh was split between two co-winners.

The full scholarships went to Thomas Shevlin, son of Anthony Shevlin of Buffalo, N.Y., Local 188; Ann Marie Colangelo, daughter of Emilio W. Colangelo of Naugatuck, Conn., Local 45; Charles E. Bell, son of Max L. Bell of Los Angeles Local 100; David G. Dinning, son of George A. Dinning of Toronto, Ont., Local 232; Tori Batzel, whose father, Theodore Batzel, belongs to Pottstown, Pa., Local 336, and Ronald E. Koester, son of L. E. Koester of Waco, Tex., Local 312.

The $250 awards were won by Linda Myers, daughter of Jesse V. Myers of Mishawaka, Ind., Local 65, and Margaret Anne Watts, daughter of Berton J. Watts of Eau Claire, Wis., Local 19.

Four-year scholarships worth $500 a year were presented to the children of seven members of unions affiliated with the Clothing Workers Joint Board during a day-long ACWA leadership conference in New York. The program is financed by contributions from the Joint Board and employers in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut.

The four basic awards were presented to Irving Eisenberg, son of Mr. and Mrs. Max Eisenberg, Far Rockaway, N.Y.; Susan Ethelyn Johnson, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Preston Johnson, New Haven, Conn.; Lawrence Lickert, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lynton B. Lickert, Danbury, Conn., and Jan David Marcus, son of Mr. and Mrs. Solomon Marcus, Brooklyn.

A grant honoring Helen Hall, director of the Henry Street Settlement, was won by Loretta Eloise Cherry, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Verne Cherry, Stamford, Conn.; one honoring ACWA Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum by Phillipe Mercado, son of Mrs. Gloria Mercado, Hempstead, L.I.; and one honoring AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and long-time civil rights leader, by Suzane Popick, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Popick, Bronx, N.Y.

The winners of 17 $500 scholarships under a program administered by the California AFL-CIO and financed in part by affiliates were named on the basis of competitive examinations. The recipients and the colleges at which they will study are:

Martin Vanderlaan, 17, Los Gatos, third generation union member who will attend the University of California at Santa Barbara. He is a member of Retail Clerks Local 428, his father was a member of Operating Engineers Local 3, his mother of Office Employes Local 3, and his late grandfather belonged to the Carpenters for 40 years.

Joshua Smith, Berkeley, who spent the summer teaching in a school for the children of migrant farm workers in Yuba City and will attend Harvard University; Frederick L. Nebeker, Riverside, University of California at Riverside; Alan D. Smith, Bonita, Claremont Men's College; H. Thomas James, Stanford, Harvard.

Also, Karen K. Roper, Porterville, University of Santa Clara; Toni Klimberg, Sunnyvale, University of California at Santa Cruz; Robert W. Harding, Riverside, University of California at Davis; Velma Lopez, Madera, Fresno State College; Ronald Piper, Moraga, Pomona College; Catherine Gorchels, Palos Verde Estates, Carlton College; Scott M. Simpson, Rolling Hills, Yale University.

Also, John E. Clay, Redlands, University of California at Riverside; Myra Caroline Rutherdale, Santa Rosa, Santa Rosa Junior College; Claire Broome, San Anselmo, Radcliffe College; Melissa Boussy, Mill Valley, University of California at Davis; and James Nanninga, Santa Maria, University of California at Santa Barbara.

Essay Winner

David W. Bagley of Vienna, Va., won a $500 scholarship awarded by the Virginia AFL-CIO in a statewide essay contest on the history of the labor movement in which there were 391 entrants from public, private and parochial high schools.

The Washington AFL-CIO named the winners of two scholarships honoring Evan M. Weston, retired president of the state body, which are worth $500 each.

The winners were Susan Joyce Tibbles, daughter of Wyman L. Tibbles of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local I-591, Anacortes, and Jeanne Frances Dwyer, whose father is G. P. Dwyer, Sr., a member of State, County & Municipal Employes Local 621, Walla Walla.

Ten children of members of the Clothing Workers in the Philadelphia area were presented with Charles Weinstein Foundation Scholarships given by friends of the late president of the Philadelphia Joint Board, the board itself, and Philadelphia employers.

The scholarships were awarded Henry Black, Richard Desiderio, Lynn Dubin, Ruth Kushner, Elaine Palena and Elaine Perez, all of Philadelphia; Tomaserica Carr, Alloway, N. J.; Robert Lantieri, Upper Darby, Pa.; Susan Marta, Upper Darby, and Vincent A. Sarino, Clifton Heights, Pa.

Twenty of the 29 winners of scholarships ranging in value from $250 to $750 awarded by Retail Clerks Local 324, Buena Park, Calif., are members of the local and the remainder are sons, daughters or husbands of members, Sec.-Treas. Arthur Z. Berland announced.

Graduate Study

Two of the awards were for graduate study—Paul M. Dickie, Whittier, $750, and Ernesto Graeser, Long Beach, $500.

Undergraduate awards of $750 each went to Moira Taylor, Garden Grove, and Linda Utako Iwasaka, Los Angeles.

Winners of $500 undergraduate scholarships were Steven D. Wymer, Fullerton; Bruce P. Baird, Norwalk; Jan B. Stephens, Lynwood, and Robert H. Cutting, Jr., Brea.

Awards of $250 each for undergraduate study went to Roger C. Meyer, Gregory W. Payne and Franklin M. Seiple, Long Beach; Richard B. Bellows, Bill Sardam and Gregory W. Toolan, Santa Ana; Dennis E. Gelvin and Jim DeGuelle, Huntington Beach; John L. Carvalho, Roger Brown and Jerry Wada, Garden Grove.

Also Bernard R. Gans and Garry Shore, Downey; Donald K. Holiman, La Habra; Paul R. Brentson, Anaheim; Timothy L. Hunt, South Laguna; John Jackson, La Mirada; Louis S. Marjon, Fullerton; Robert L. Murphy, Carlsbad; Joe Paquette, Pico Rivera, and Michael R. Pitts, Whittier.

Optical Workers Local 408 of New York, a unit of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, has awarded its annual Mrs. Peter F. Callery Scholarships to the children of two members.

Chosen for the honor were Howard Modell, son of Irving Modell, who will attend Brooklyn College, and Judith Poltz, daughter of Mrs. Julia Poltz, who will go to the State University at Stony Brook.

Jersey Local 300 of the Pulp-Sulphite Workers presented scholarships to two children of members and grants to three. Scholarship winners were Elaine Dyle, daughter of Mrs. Anna Dyle, Kearney, and Bernadette Keahey, daughter of Mrs. Roxie Harrington, Newark. The grants went to Gloria Johnson, daughter of Nathaniel Johnson, Newark; Harold A. Klinesmith, whose father is Harold W. Klinesmith, Hoboken, and Kathleen Wyka, daughter of Michael Wyka, Garfield, N.J.

The $1,000 Ted Jackson Scholarship awarded annually by the Carpenters' Ontario Provincial Council to the child of a member of an affiliated local was presented to Cheryl Robichaud, who will attend Queen's University, Kingston, Ont. Her father, Phil Robichaud, is president of Toronto Local 27, the union's largest in Canada.

TIME STUDY CLASS at Ohio State University, top, gave members of the Glass & Ceramic Workers on-the-job training at a machine shop where students clocked a lathe operator, as management and other union time-study men do. Bottom, class gets an analysis of a time and motion-study report from Bertram Gottlieb, right, on leave from the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research for a year of classroom teaching at the University of Iowa, and OSU Prof. Charles Overby. The union sent 69 shop workers and five union staff members to one-week seminars in job evaluation and time study at OSU's labor and research center.

Connecticut Labor Asks Broad School Aid Plan

Hartford, Conn.—A broad program of state aid to education, ranging from pre-school day camps to the college level, was proposed by the Connecticut AFL-CIO at its biennial legislative, political and educational convention.

The delegates also endorsed for re-election six Democratic candidates for Congress; Gov. John T. Dempsey (D) and Sec. of State Ella T. Grasso (D).

The resolution on legislation to liberalize state aid to education called for:

- State-supported day camps for pre-school children of low-income families, with emphasis on assistance to families headed by a mother.
- Double state aid to cities for programs already in operation which are designed to help disadvantaged children.
- "Substantially increased" assistance to higher education, especially for community colleges.
- Assurance of at least two years of college education for all qualified young people through $750 per year grants in aid good at public or private colleges.
- Endorsement of a systematic program to develop manpower skills by on-the-job-training, to be financed by an incentive tax on payrolls.

The convention also adopted unanimously a strong equal job opportunity resolution which urged that "we open our unions where they are still closed to everyone regardless of race or creed."

"We must break down the artificial barriers to equal opportunity in the labor unions," the resolution declared.

Other resolutions proposed a state anti-water pollution campaign, improvements in workman's and unemployment compensation legislation, collective bargaining rights for employes of non-profit institutions including hospitals, establishment of an independent Maritime Administration and elimination of federal tax exemptions on state and local bonds used to finance construction of manufacturing plants.

Six Republican candidates and two independent aspirants for Congress spoke, but the six-man Democratic delegation stayed in Washington at the delegates' request to vote on pending legislation, which included the since-passed new minimum wage law.

Endorsed in conformance with a recommendation by the Connecticut COPE were Representatives Emilio Q. Daddario, William L. St. Onge, Robert N. Giaimo, Donald J. Irwin, John S. Monagan and Bernard F. Grabowski.

2 Catskill Resorts Branded Unfair

Albany, N.Y.—The New York State AFL-CIO has put two of the Catskill Mountains' best-known resorts on the unfair list—Grossinger's, three times found guilty of unfair labor practices by the NLRB, and Laurel's, in Monticello, where similar charges are pending.

Abbott to Assist Hawaii U. Project

Akron, O.—Education Dir. William L. Abbott has taken a year's leave of absence from the Rubber Workers to help the University of Hawaii establish its first labor education program.

Abbott has been on the URW education staff since 1952 and has been director since December 1961. From 1949 to 1952 he was education and legislative director for the former Wisconsin CIO, and was in charge of its state community services and public relations. He is a native of Milwaukee and a member of the Teachers.

MASS SCREENING for chronic diseases in a mobile unit of the Washington, D.C., Dept. of Public Health followed a hearing on that subject by the Senate Subcommittee on the Health of the Elderly. First in line were subcommittee members led by Sen. Maurine B. Neuberger (D-Ore.), followed by members of the National Council of Senior Citizens (above). From left are Floyd Elliott, Kissimmee, Fla., William J. Eagle, Phoenixville, Pa., and William G. Doyle, Somerset, Ky., top officers of the National Association of Retired & Veteran Railway Employes; Mrs. Sarah Butler of Washington Local 82, Building Service Employes, and William Jordan, president of the NCSC's Washington area council.

2 Freshmen Battle for Survival In Colorado Congressional Races

Denver—The Johnson landslide over Barry Goldwater in 1964 pulled in two freshman Democratic Colorado congressmen—Rep. Frank E. Evans in the southeastern 2nd District and Rep. Roy M. McVicker in the 3rd, which is primarily the Denver suburbs. Here, as in more than 40 other districts across the land, the newcomers face the simple question of whether they can survive.

Rep. Byron G. Rogers of Denver and Rep. Wayne Aspinall, chairman of the House Interior Committee, are Democrats considered certain of re-election in Colorado's other two districts.

Evans is challenged by Republican David W. Enoch, who beat former Rep. J. Edgar Chenoweth in the GOP primary. Former GOP Rep. Donald G. Brotzman, defeated by McVicker in 1964 with 50.6 percent of the votes, is trying to rise again.

Colorado is a key state in the mountains because it is the most populous and because, according to one observer, the Republican Party is so sharply divided between its ordinary moderate, decent "Iowa-type" conservatives and its "pushing right wing."

Control of the state legislature after the Nov. 8 elections may prove to be as important as the nationally-heralded events, this observer adds. The state House of Representatives is now Democratic, the Senate Republican. The situation could be reversed, he says, so closely divided is the electorate.

Republican Gov. John A. Love, seeking re-election, would be rated a clear winner except for the fact that, like other governors, he has had tax and revenue problems and faces, in addition, a danger from his own party's right wing.

Love declared himself for Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania in 1964 after Scranton belatedly announced as a presidential candidate. A right-wing thirst for vengeance might prove more menacing than the charges of the Democratic nominee, Lt. Gov. Robert L. Knous, that Love has exhibited a "negative philosophy" in office, some local citizens believe.

Sen. Gordon Allott, twice elected before, must be considered a classic example of the Mountain States Republican. He is, on the record, a negativist who has made no contribution to the great social movement of our times—medicare, education, even such specially western themes as parks and recreation.

He is, however, personally aloof from the right wing spouters (although he votes the way they would like him to vote). The Democratic Senate nominee, State Sen. Roy R. Romer, would vote differently, but Colorado's citizens must give him the chance before he can do so.

The future of the freshman Democratic members of the House is, of course, important in the face of the possibility that, after a mid-term election, the GOP could re-establish a House coalition.

Both Evans and McVicker have benefited greatly from the concentrated attention they have given the interests of their constituents, the chores they have performed, the trips back home they have taken.

The Evans district includes both economically-damaged Pueblo, normally Democratic, and smugly-conservative and Republican Colorado Springs. But the dominant industry in Colorado Springs is now the Air Force Academy, and Evans was given a seat on the House Armed Services Committee by astute Democratic leaders.

McVicker in the suburban Denver areas would normally be regarded as a potential casualty, but it is not necessarily so. The self termed independent voters, looking at the infection in the Colorado GOP by rightists, have the clear balance of power.

GOP Tries Comeback:

Liberals vs. Rightists Is Pattern in Rockies

ly hard fought and extremely close in their results.

Six weeks before the election, political observers reported an unusual silence among voters, almost as if the candidates in their statewide caravans and tours had made little impact, and there seemed to be an unusually high proportion of citizens—at least among so-called independent voters—who said they hadn't made up their minds.

Voters will talk about issues if they are asked—the Vietnamese war, which Republican campaigners are trying to exploit quite bluntly as "Johnson's war," and rising living costs. There is some disaffection and disenchantment with the Administration reported, particularly on the university campuses.

There is little solid evidence, however, that if people feel strongly about these issues they have made any direct relation of their emotions to the candidates for governor, for the Senate and House, for the state legislatures.

As September neared its turn into October and an autumn chill began to creep into the mountain air, most of the contests seemed still in flux, perhaps to swing on issues of personality and presence.

The brothers Kennedy — both Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (N.Y.) and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.) —are extremely popular speakers among Democratic candidates and Democratic audiences. Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey are expected some time in October.

Edward Kennedy had begun a Colorado speaking tour and was scheduled to go North to Wyoming when he was forced to cancel his engagement because of a death in the family. There was a Democratic street rally in Cheyenne, Wyo., Sept. 26, the first of the campaign. It drew some 500 to 750 people to hear all the party's statewide candidates, and one party observer commented:

"If Teddy had been able to come, we'd have had five times that many."

It has its elements of irony, this popularity of the two senatorial Kennedys with western voters, because the late Pres. John F. Kennedy wasn't able to carry any of the five upper mountain states in 1960. Indeed, from the Plains States westward he wasn't able to carry any state except Nevada.

This is the magnificent land of the high Rockies, a land of incredible distances, of very few towns and few people, of scenery unsurpassed and unsurpassable.

It is also a land that in some areas is in a certain amount of trouble economically.

There is an out-migration larger than the in-migration from many rural areas and small towns, and much of the out-migration is among skilled workers—craftsmen driven elsewhere for jobs. The population increase is slow and marginal, dependent on the birth rate.

The economic generalization should not be pushed too hard, because Denver is prosperous and booming and Colorado wheat farmers—but not Montana wheat farmers as yet—feel safe in betting that prices will rise, so they are storing their crops temporarily at the lower government support levels.

Pockets of Poverty

But even Colorado and Utah share an acute water shortage, and there are pockets of poverty and run-down business enterprises all through the area. The Mountain States are not a land of big industry; a new steel mill employing 700 workers is a welcome addition to Wyoming's economy.

Victory for the Republicans this year would mean that conservative elements had tightened their grip on the party machinery—and conservatives, in the Mountain States, mean a significant proportion of outright John Birch Society members or sympathizers and other rightists.

An informed source estimates activist right-wing strength at 25 percent of the Republicans in Colorado, and it is high in Montana and Idaho as well.

The Democrats, to strengthen their relative position in the Mountain States, need to re-elect Metcalf in Montana above all, and to hold on to the House seats they won in 1964—two in Colorado, one in Wyoming, one in Utah—and to break the Republican stranglehold on the governorships.

They need to win control of the newly reapportioned legislatures as well, to protect themselves from the rather lately perceived danger of gerrymanders by the creation of sub-districts within districts that might negate the effectiveness of the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" decisions.

They need to win in Wyoming, specifically, to get rid of the state's "right-to-work" law.

Wyoming 'Work' Law Major Issue In Contests for Senate, State House

Cheyenne, Wyo.—Rep. Teno Roncalio, a freshman Democrat, is making a hard run against Republican Gov. Clifford P. Hansen for the Senate seat being vacated by GOP incumbent Sen. Milward L. Simpson.

The Democratic nominee for governor is Ernest Wilkerson, a Casper attorney, with Stan Hathaway as his Republican opponent, and in both these races the state's "right-to-work" law is a major issue.

Hansen signed the bill into law as governor and Hathaway would not be expected to sign a repealer. Wilkerson is pledged to fight for repeal, and Roncalio's record in the House allows him to challenge Hansen from a strong liberal position.

Almost a relic of the past, the aging former Rep. William Henry Harrison 3rd is trying for a political comeback by running for Wyoming's only House seat. His Democratic opponent is 26-year-old State Rep. Al Christian, victor in a multi-candidate party primary.

Republican candidates have been disinclined to talk about the "work" law in the campaign, preferring to emphasize alleged overspending by the federal government, what they call a sound state economy, and seeking to exploit any voter disaffection with Administration policies.

The anti-union shop law is nevertheless a key issue. The National Right to Work Committee knows it, and labor believes liberal candidates must win the governorship and state legislature this year to make repeal obtainable.

In this capital, it seems almost a mockery for a candidate to talk about the soundness of the state's economy. Cheyenne is almost a depression city, with scores of storefront windows sadly plastered with "for sale" and "for rent" signs. The state's rate of business growth last year was a lagging 1 percent.

A major Democratic asset is Sen. Gale McGee, elected in 1958 in what was considered a startling surprise, re-elected in 1964 after fiercely charging control of the Republican machinery and much news dissemination had been taken over by right-wing elements.

McGee is campaigning hard for the ticket and his success in winning two elections gives encouragement to his party's candidates this year.

The voting pattern in Wyoming, as in so many states, is split. The northern areas ordinarily turn out Republican majorities; the Democrats, to win, think they must pull in a substantial margin in what are still called the "Union Pacific towns," the belt of communities running from East to West along the famous railroad.

Hansen, running for the Senate, is recognized as a formidable campaigner, with a capacity for tough in-fighting. Roncalio, on the other hand, is boundlessly energetic and he, too, has the advantage of having won a statewide race.

Between Wilkerson and the Republican candidate for governor, Hathaway, an interesting tax issue has arisen. The oil companies pump crude petroleum from their wells directly into pipelines headed for Kansas City for refining. Wilkerson wants to put an incentive tax on their production unless they refine in Wyoming, and it may win some votes.

Health Plan Foundation Adds Unionists to Board

Montreal, Que. — Two union representatives are among six new directors elected to the board of the National Foundation of Health, Welfare & Pension Plans at its meeting here.

Named to the board were Ralph E. Bowes, business representative of the Milwaukee Carpenters District Council, and Mack Roberts, business manager of Plumbers Local 211 in Houston, Tex.

2 Unionists Join Faculty at Iowa

Iowa City — The University of Iowa has announced the appointment of two union staff officials to the faculty of its Center for Labor & Management.

Bertram Gottlieb is taking a leave of absence as industrial engineer in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research to serve as visiting professor at Iowa for the 1966-67 academic year. Edgar R. Czarnecki, assistant research and education director for the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, will join the university's staff as assistant professor and program director of labor education.

Hospital Strike Won at Oak Ridge

Oak Ridge, Tenn.—An agreement raising wages and liberalizing vacations and holidays has ended a 51-day strike by Building Service Employes Local 150T at the 254-bed Oak Ridge Hospital.

The settlement in addition sets up a grievance procedure culminating in arbitration before a three-man board and provides a bonus of five days' pay for two years of perfect attendance.

Key Race in Rockies:

Goldwater Backer Challenges Metcalf

Helena, Mont.—The political race of the year in the Rocky Mountain states involves incumbent Democratic Sen. Lee Metcalf, seeking a second term, and his Republican opponent, Montana's Gov. Tim Babcock.

Metcalf is a rarity in the Senate, a liberal who cannot be catalogued by pat phraseologies, who enjoys the universal respect of his colleagues, liberal and conservative, for independence of mind and personal force of character.

His challenger, Babcock, is quite candidly a Goldwater Republican—or was in 1964—who pledged himself two years ago to serve out a full term if elected, but changed his mind in mid-stream to try for the Senate.

The race, until now, has been curiously quiescent, with the GOP trying to make an issue of a Metcalf vote against a $500 million military appropriation bill item that the Johnson Administration itself opposed as unnecessary and therefore inflationary in its effects.

The real issue is federal spending, including spending for power projects, including multipurpose federal dams. Metcalf may be the last inheritor of the Senate progressive tradition familiar from the days of the La Follettes and George Norris a generation ago—in favor of public power yardsticks.

He is the only senator who fills the pages of the Congressional Record with documented reports of the profits of the private utilities.

It would be unrealistic to expect that the northwestern utilities would not want to get him out of there.

The beautiful empire of Montana, with its towns cupped deep inside rings of overhanging mountains, is a fat and prosperous land this year. Its wheat farmers produce fabulous crops, 60 to 70 bushels an acre—and the prices are tolerable even to the wheat farmers.

Two thousand miles from the nation's capital, Republican right wingers seek to exploit fear of the federal government. But Montana, like other mountain states, was built on federal land grants to railroads, federal homesteading laws, land grant colleges, agricultural programs.

The copper producers of Butte are advertising for workers. The state's biggest city, Billings, has enough jobs for its skilled building craftsmen to keep them from migrating to the burgeoning Pacific Coast.

There is no sign of a change in Montana voting patterns, which are as baffling, at least, as New York's, to indicate any great upsets in prospect.

A state which can elect Metcalf to the Senate in 1960 while voting against the late John F. Kennedy for president, which voted for Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964 and also re-elected the Goldwaterite Tim Babcock as governor, is clearly a state in which voters exhibit highly individualistic tendencies.

The odds are nevertheless heavy that the western congressional district will re-elect Rep. Arnold Olsen (D) and the eastern district will re-elect Rep. James F. Battin (R) to the House.

Metcalf won by something more than 4,000 votes in 1960. He is an extremely effective legislator, founder and first chairman of the progressive Democratic Study Group when he served in the House, a senator whose influence can be expected to widen in a second term.

The registration figures are spotty. In Billings they are up; in Great Falls and Butte, the industrial cities, the voter turnout is still uncertain. But despite the cliff-hanging election tradition of the mountain states the general opinion is that Metcalf will win again by a good deal more than 4,000 votes.

NEW WAGE-HOUR BILL, gradually raising the minimum wage to $1.60 an hour and extending coverage to more than 8 million additional workers, is signed by Pres. Johnson. Standing, from left: Sen. Jennings Randolph (D-W.Va.), Rep. John H. Dent (D-Pa.), Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.). Yarborough and Dent were floor managers for the bill.

LBJ on Wage Law:

Protection for Needy, Exploited

The new minimum wage—$64 a week—will not support a very big family. But it will bring workers and their families a little bit above the poverty line, $3,000 a year. It will help them carry on. It will help them to not worry about three meals a day. It will enable them to help themselves develop skills so that they can someday earn more.

Until today, minimum wage laws benefited some 30 million workers. Now, as a result of the leadership of this Congress, members of both parties, we raise that number by almost 30 percent—to 38 million workers. This new law benefits 8 million more workers—workers that are not here this morning—workers that you rarely see—workers that you seldom acknowledge—the char women, the people who make your beds, the mother who leaves her children at 5 o'clock in the morning to catch the streetcar to come in to have the coffee for the bus driver as he is on his way to work, that works in the cafes—the hotel and motel employes—the laundry workers that clean our shirts and take the spots out of our ties—the workers in the apparel trades.

And I am very pleased to say it includes farm workers for the first time, several hundred thousand of them—and that is just a starter.

It will help under-income areas—Appalachia, and some areas in my own South. It will help minority groups who are helpless in the face of prejudice that exists.

It will not force employers to cut down and fire employes—as critics of minimum wage laws will tell you. Whoever makes such charges is uninformed.

They always predict it is going to close the businesses, that it is going to close down employment, that employment is going to drop—but the record doesn't show that.

Our first bill in 1938, when the minimum wage was passed, employment rose. Again, in 1949, again in '50, again in '55, '56, '61, '63, '64, and '65 employment rose, rose, rose.

The straight fact is that a fair minimum wage doesn't hurt business in any way.

Decent employers want to treat their employes decently. Unfortunately, there are always a few exceptions, a few who see opportunities in exploiting the poor and the defenseless and who force well-meaning employers to compete with them in their unholy dealings.

This new minimum wage law, with its increased minimum, with its expanded coverage, will prevent much of this exploitation of the defenseless, the workers who are in serious need.

If a businessman can't do well with this minimum wage in our booming economy that we have today, perhaps he might not be just a good businessman.

I want to particularly thank Mr. Meany and the allied members of his organization for their counsel, for their encouragement and for their help.

Our new minimum wage law, in my judgment, will bring a larger piece of this country's prosperity and a greater share of personal dignity to millions of our workers, their wives and their children. And for me, frankly, that is what being President is all about. (Excerpted from President's remarks at bill signing, Sept. 23, 1966).

Segregationists Chosen In Southern Primaries

Rabid segregationists won two southern primaries, ousting a liberal 24-year congressional veteran in Louisiana and upsetting the political comeback of a highly-regarded former governor of Georgia.

Georgia Democrats picked Lester Maddox over Ellis Arnall in the gubernatorial primary. Maddox is most widely known as the Atlanta restaurant owner who defied the 1964 Civil Rights Act by threatening Negro customers with a pistol and selling axe handles to his customers. Arnall is a moderate liberal who won a national reputation during his 1943-47 term as governor. He had led a six-man field in the first primary.

Maddox will face a Goldwater Republican, Rep. Howard H. Callaway, in the general election.

The defeat of Rep. James H. Morrison of Baton Rouge in a runoff Louisiana primary rates as the equivalent of a one-vote loss for the Administration in the next Congress. Morrison had charged that the Ku Klux Klan was behind the "white backlash" which handed the nomination to John R. Rarick, an outspoken segregationist who branded Morrison as the "black power" candidate.

Morrison, a staunch supporter of federal employes, had been in line for the chairmanship of the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee in the next Congress.

Mahoney Confirmed

Another "backlash" candidate, George P. Mahoney, was confirmed as the winner of the close three-way contest for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination in Maryland. Rep. Carlton R. Sickles, labor-backed liberal, decided that Mahoney's 1,600 vote margin was too much to overturn in a recount and conceded the election. But Sickles said he has not made up his mind whether to vote for Mahoney. Maryland's two senators also withheld their endorsement.

Viet Nam, not race conflict, was the issue in a Democratic runoff congressional primary in New York City.

Incumbent Rep. Leonard Farbstein, who supported the President, narrowly defeated a so-called "reform" candidate, City Councilman Theodore S. Weiss, whose principal theme was opposition to U.S. involvement in Viet Nam. The vote was 17,080 to 16,151. The first primary was a virtual dead-heat, with a court-ordered runoff because of a number of invalid ballots.

Frank Borda Appointed To Labor Dept. Post

Frank Borda, executive assistant to the manpower administrator, has been appointed deputy assistant secretary of labor for manpower,

A graduate of the University of Maine and the University of Colorado law school, he was legislative counsel to the Maine AFL-CIO before joining the Labor Dept.'s legal staff in 1963.

Meany on Wage Law:

Most Potent Anti-Poverty Weapon

The best Fair Labor Standards bill in history has now become law. Beginning next Feb. 1, millions of America's working poor will know a better life and millions more will have, for the first time, the full protection of the government of the United States against today's sweatshop employers.

Pres. Johnson has dne more than just sign into law the most potent anti-poverty weapon yet fashioned. His leadership and his grasp of the problems of those paid substandard wages in this land of affluence helped make this legislation possible.

The prime beneficiaries are, of course, the people themselves, including the agricultural workers who were for too long America's forgotten people. But there will be other beneficiaries as well, for every businessman whose livelihood depends upon consumer purchasing power will have new or better customers because of today's action.

There will be some, of course, who will criticize this bill and predict dire consequences because of it. These are the same people who have fought every single improvement in the minimum wage law and in fact, every single improvement of any kind for the people of America. Their predictions will be as false this time as they have been every other time.

The AFL-CIO congratulates Pres. Johnson on this great legislative victory. It will take its place among the many other signal legislative victories his Administration has scored, ranging from education for our youth to Medicare for our elderly. All told, they make the box score of the 89th Congress something to be proud of, something to be protected, and something to be expanded upon.

Ottawa Conference:

ILO Parley Shapes Manpower Program

Ottawa, Ont.—The 8th Conference of American States Members of the Intl. Labor Organization at its closing session here unanimously adopted a program for worldwide utilization of human resources known as the Ottawa Plan.

At the same time the delegates approved a proposed program for social security reform urging the ILO to intensify its activities in this area in the Americas and to coordinate the steps being taken by other international organizations.

Representatives of 19 nations participated in the meeting, the first held in Canada. United States' workers were represented by Rudy Faupl, a member of the ILO Governing Body and an international representative of the Machinists. His advisers were Dir. Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security and Morris Paladino, assistant to the administrator of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The human resources plan was approved in the form of two resolutions. The first laid down general principles and suggested measures for a long-term manpower planning and development program. The second called for the launching of an urgent, practical program to apply these principles, with emphasis in Latin America and the Caribbean nations and with the ILO acting as a coordinator.

Faupl in a speech maintained that only trade unions—"free of domination by employers and free of control by the state"—can exercise a "meaningful and effective role in social and economic development."

He voiced sharp criticism of Cuba, where, he said, "the trade union's job is to enslave workers in the speedup and define their obligations, since they have no rights." Orestes Ibanez Isaac, external relations secretary for the Cuban Sugar Workers Union, responded with such a bitter personal attack on Faupl that some delegates pounded their desks in protest and cried for order.

Canadian Labor Minister J. R. Nicholson, conference chairman, ordered Ibanez to leave the subject but the Cuban continued in the same vein until George P. Delaney, international labor relations adviser in the State Dept., angrily charged to Nicholson's table behind the podium, and demanded that Ibanez's tirade be halted.

When Ibanez finally finished, Seidman denounced his "unbridled personal attack" on Faupl and urged the delegates to ignore it. Other delegates also defended Faupl.

A total of 151 delegates and technical advisers representing governments, workers and employers participated in the conference. Also present were 90 observers from other ILO member states.

House Action Nears On Poverty, Tax Bills

Senate refused by a 43-25 vote to eliminate language which in effect permits a doctor to order segregated accommodations for a patient in a hospital if he claims it is for medical reasons.

Overall, however, the appropriations bill survived its heaviest attack—a budget cutting recommittal motion by Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen (R-Ill.). It was beaten, 40-24.

The appropriations bill included a "bare-bones" $7.5 million for the National Teacher Corps, a project strongly urged by Pres. Johnson to send teams of specially-trained teachers to schools in poverty areas requesting their services. The House had refused any money for the program. The Senate appropriation, only one-fourth of the amount sought by the President, would finance only the 1,250 volunteers who have already been trained for the program. The final decision will be up to a House-Senate conference committee.

After completing action on the poverty bill, the House was scheduled to take up the bill to suspend temporarily two tax "windfalls" for business which were granted at a time when the economy was in the doldrums.

One is the 7 percent tax credit allowed for investment in new machinery and equipment; the other is the privilege of a fast depreciation schedule for new plants which increases the "take-home profits" of corporations.

Despite considerable business and Republican opposition, the House is expected to approve the tax bill which comes to the floor under a no-amendment rule. Its path was eased by "sweeteners" added by the Ways & Means Committee.

Businesses would still be able to claim the tax credit on the first $150,000 of new investment, thus eliminating any impact on small firms or farmers. Expansion projects already under way would not be affected. And some forms of "fast" depreciation would be continued.

The suspension of the tax credit and curtailment of depreciation would be for a 16-month period, retroactive to Sept. 9.

Cities Bill Next

A harder fight was anticipated on the breakthrough demonstration cities bill, next major item on the House calendar, and the chief new Great Society program proposed by the President this year.

It proposes a comprehensive transformation of entire slum neighborhoods through a combination of existing federal programs and new grants. Low-income housing would be coupled with better schools, hospitals, recreation facilities and public transportation.

One fear of supporters is that opponents will seek to capitalize on "backlash" sentiment to try to tack on amendments aimed at slowing down school desegregation.

The Senate voted 64-2 approval for a new cabinet-level Dept. of Transportation. One of the chief issues to be resolved in a House-Senate conference is the status of the Federal Maritime Administration. The House-passed bill excluded the Maritime Administration from the new department, in line with the AFL-CIO position for an independent agency. The Senate included it in the department, although giving it slightly more autonomy than other segments of the department.

Two major aid to education bills have been sent to the floor by the Senate Labor Committee. One is a $6.2 billion, two-year expansion of the elementary and secondary school aid program. The other is a $4.4 billion, three-year college aid bill. Both measures are above the Administration's budget requests. The House passed a smaller college aid bill, but has not yet acted on the school measure.

Low-Rent Units Sponsored by Central Body

Pasco, Wash. — The Benton-Franklin Counties AFL-CIO is sponsoring construction of 104 low-rent housing units estimated to cost $1.3 million and has applied for federal mortgage financing.

Delegates from the council's 31 local unions formed a non-profit corporation to construct and manage the Vista Terrace projects. An architect has been hired to prepare preliminary working drawings and specifications for one and two-story shingle and stucco buildings in a new residential section of Pasco, a Columbia River community which includes employes of the Hanford Atomic Energy plant.

Housing and Urban Development Sec. Robert C. Weaver announced recently in Washington, D.C., that $30,000 in FHA funds have been earmarked for rent supplementation at Vista Terrace.

Central Labor Council Pres. Lawrence R. King heads the new corporation. It plans to build two types of housing—one of 52 units for low-income families which may need rent supplementation, and another of 52 units for low or moderate-income families or individuals 62 or older or handicapped, with priority given to those displaced by urban renewal or highway programs.

King said the rent paid by tenants will include all utilities except telephone service. The two projects will complement each other in appearance, and will adjoin a park area to be built by the city of Pasco. Tenants who are found eligible for rent supplements must pay 25 percent of their income for rent, with the balance supplemented by federal funds.

Illinois Labor Spurred To Build Douglas Vote

Chicago—Illinois labor rallied behind the re-election campaign of Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D) as the Illinois State AFL-CIO convention opened here.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller sounded the theme as he called on the nearly 3,000 delegates to work actively to keep in office "the greatest friend the trade union movement has in the Senate."

Biemiller contrasted the record of Douglas with that of the Republican senator from Illinois—Everett McKinley Dirksen.

Douglas, he said, has been a "tough, effective" fighter for good legislation and against special interests.

Biemiller ran down the long list of legislative battles in which Douglas has been involved—for medicare, for better schools, to raise the minimum wage and expand coverage, for consumer laws including his own truth-in-lending bill.

It was Dirksen, he reminded the delegates, who sought to restore minority control of the state legislatures through his proposed constitutional amendment.

"If Dirksen had been able to put across his amendment," Biemiller declared, "we would be permanently behind the eight-ball in every state of this nation. The working people, the city people would never get fair representation in their state legislatures."

It was Douglas, he stressed, "who led the fight against the Dirksen amendment."

Biemiller spoke also of the courage of Douglas in standing "by the side of Pres. Johnson in America's fight against Communist aggression." He talked of his opposition to strike-breaking legislation, his leadership for civil rights and for repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Its "not enough" for local union leaders merely to vote for Douglas, Biemiller urged. "I ask you to go out and talk to your friends and neighbors about Paul Douglas. Tell them he's got a hard fight on his hands. Tell them how Paul Douglas has worked for them. . . . Get them registered. . . . All of America needs him."

Right Where It Hurts

Davis Resumes AFL-CIO Post On Civil Rights

Walter G. Davis, deputy executive director of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on leave from the AFL-CIO, has returned to his post of assistant director of the federation's Dept. of Civil Rights.

Davis, while with the job bias agency, assisted international unions in establishing liaison with the commission to deal with trade union problems under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. He had the major responsibility for the development of a field program for the agency.

Since joining the EEOC, Davis has activated six regional and four area offices in major cities throughout the country. They include Austin, Atlanta, New York, Cleveland, Chicago, Kansas City, New Orleans, Albuquerque, Los Angeles, and San Francisco.

He headed the recruitment and training programs for the entire professional field staff.

Davis joined the AFL-CIO civil rights staff in 1961 after serving as executive vice president of the Transport Service Employes.

GE Balks at Better Offer As Unions Heed LBJ Plea

Stalled Bills Get Moving In Congress

By David L. Perlman

The Senate voted a massive expansion of federal aid to schools, the House moved towards passage of a similar bill, and both the House and Senate approved a step-up in the anti-poverty program as Congress moved into the final weeks of the session.

Rejecting all attempts to cut the amount, the Senate authorized a two-year, $6.4 billion program to help elementary and high schools provide a better education, particularly in poverty neighborhoods. The vote was 54-16.

For this year, the bill would authorize $2.7 billion in new money, about $1 billion more than the President's budget request had sought.

The House had before it a two-year, $5.7 billion companion bill and indications were that it would be passed without any money cuts. Republican efforts to cut the amount down to the budget levels were beaten in preliminary votes.

Both houses also approved a one-year, $1.75 billion extension of the poverty program, although with differing instructions as to how the money should be spent. The total matches the Administration budget estimate and is $250 million more than was spent on last year's poverty program.

A long-stalled, labor-backed minimum wage bill for the District of Columbia was cleared for the President's signature. (Story this page.)

Rail Pensions Voted

Supplemental pensions for long-service railroad workers appeared assured as the House wrote into the Railroad Retirement Act a union-management agreement providing extra benefits of $45 to $70 a month for workers with at least 25 years of service who retired since July 1. Management will pay the full cost.

The House also passed a badly-gutted version of the Senate's truth-in-packaging bill. It emerged from the House Commerce Committee as essentially a clarity in labeling bill, stripped of a key Senate provision enabling the government to regulate the number of different weights and sizes in which a product may be packaged.

The bill was brought up in the House under the no-amendment suspension of the rules procedure, requiring a two-thirds vote. With all of the packaging industry's ob-

Contract Extended 2 Weeks

By Eugene A. Kelly

Pres. Johnson's urgent plea for continued production at General Electric in the interest of national defense drew agreement from 11 AFL-CIO unions to extend their contracts two weeks, but brought no change in GE's "take it or leave it" policy.

The multi-union negotiating committee, representing 115,000 GE workers, agreed to postpone a scheduled strike at the President's request while a top-level cabinet committee sought an agreement.

But the path to an early settlement took an uphill turn as the company's chief negotiator declared management would agree only to "rearrange" its proposals, not to improve them.

A spokesman for the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers warned that achievement of an agreement during the extension period would require an improvement over the company's last offer.

That offer had been rejected by vote of the IUE-GE conference board and by the coalition of 10 other unions which have coordinated their bargaining with IUE.

When union negotiators acceded to Johnson's request to call off the Oct. 2 strike deadline in the interests of national defense production, Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Labor Sec. Willard Wirtz and Commerce Sec. John T. Connor held a "briefing" meeting with AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, IUE Pres. Paul

Cleaned-Up Reagan, Brown in Tight Race

By Williard Shelton

Los Angeles — The political race of the year is in California, where Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown is seeking a third term against the movie actor, television spokesman for industry and freshly-scrubbed Goldwater conservative nominated by the Republicans, Ronald Reagan.

The contest is hard-fought, it is close, and less than five weeks before the Nov. 8 election Reagan apparently held a narrowing edge based partly on the momentum he picked up when he overwhelmed former San Francisco Mayor George Christopher for the GOP nomination.

Both Democrats and Republicans agree that Reagan started with a substantial lead over Brown as of last June. The Democrats think Brown has substantially closed the gap.

As always, Los Angeles County with 40 percent of the vote holds the key to the election. Northern California is Democratic and liberial, but it is outvoted by conservative Republican Orange County and San Diego. Experienced analysts think Brown must get 54 percent of the Los Angeles County vote to win.

Democratic registration is a higher proportion of the total this year in Los Angeles than it was in 1962, when the governor beat Nixon.

"Brown can win this time, too, if he gets the money for the necessary television time," one veteran Democratic leader said, "no matter what the polls showed about Reagan's so-called lead last June."

A Republican spokesman said the real Reagan margin had never been more than 5 percent of the total estimated vote.

The Reagan campaign has a major characteristic: It is designed, under the expert coaching of the

12,000 Win Major Gains On Airline

New York—American Airlines mechanics and other ground personnel voted by a 5-1 margin in a referendum of 12,000 Transport Workers Union members to ratify a contract agreed to shortly before a Sept. 28 strike deadline.

The settlement calls for three wage increases of 5 percent each, payable within 18 months; three weeks' vacation after five years, four after 15; Good Friday as a ninth paid holiday; a 50 percent company contribution to employe pension costs; improved grievance machinery and other gains.

In a separate dispute between TWU and Pan American World Airways, Pres. Johnson named a fact-finding board to meet with the parties and make recommendations for settlement. The union represents nearly 15,000 mechanics, ground crewmen, flight stewardesses, port stewards and pursers on the airlines. Its contract expired June 30.

The President named David Stowe as board chairman and two others as members—Charles M. Rehmus and Jerre S. Williams. Stowe is a member of the Missile Sites Labor Commission and was an assistant to Pres. Truman from 1947 to 1949. Rehmus is co-director of the School of Labor & Industrial Relations of the University of Michigan. Williams is a professor of law at the University of Texas.

No-Loophole Version Of Tax Bill Pressed

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to approve a "no loophole" version of the House-passed tax bill to cool off the "profit inflation" that has been overheating the economy.

Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger, joined by Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller, urged the Senate Finance Committee to stick to the original Administration bill which provides:

- A temporary suspension of the 7 percent tax credit businesses receive on spending for new equipment.
- A temporary suspension of the "fast depreciation" formula which enables companies to take a bigger tax deduction on the cost of new plants—at the rate of 4 percent a year instead of 2 percent.

Both tax "windfalls" had been enacted at a time when the economy was sluggish and unemployment high.

Labor questioned the need for these business incentives when they were enacted, Goldfinger noted, and conditions today make a "powerful argument" for suspending them.

The capital goods boom is in its third year, he pointed out, and "is

D. C. Wage Floor Set By Congress

Congress gave final approval to a minimum wage law for the District of Columbia, a measure sought by the AFL-CIO for many years.

It will help some 70,000 persons in jobs not covered by federal law plus thousands more who are newly covered under federal law, but at a lower wage rate.

The D. C. wage floor will begin at $1.25 next Feb. 1, move up a year later to $1.40, and reach the $1.60 level on Feb. 1, 1969. The timetable for hotel and restaurant workers will be six months later.

Minimum wages for women and children are now set by industry wage boards under a 1918 law, but

PEACETIME PROSPERITY and wartime security of the nation are threatened unless the federal government adopts a realistic merchant marine policy, Pres. Joseph N. Curran (speaking) told the opening session of the National Maritime Union's 14th convention in New York.

At NMU Convention:

U.S. Ship Policy Hit As Threat to Nation

New York—America's prosperity in peacetime and her security during war are gravely threatened unless the federal government adopts a policy on its merchant marine consistent with the nation's welfare, Pres. Joseph N. Curran of the National Maritime Union declared in his keynote speech at the opening of the union's triennial convention.

Curran drew a parallel between American shipping in World War II and the Viet Nam conflict, asserting that the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 "has been further sabotaged by budget-happy, short-sighted, ignorant heads of federal agencies and lobbyists for powerful corporations and foreign governments."

He charged that foreign shipping interests in the Viet Nam war "have made themselves millions of bloody dollars" at the expense of the American people and of American maritime workers.

As the American merchant marine shrinks, maritime workers bear the brunt of this deterioration, Curran held. He accused the federal government of "taking advantage of our patriotism as they did in World War II, when we gave up many things which we wouldn't otherwise have given up in order that the war could be safely prosecuted." He said merchant seamen are delivering materials in Viet Nam without asking questions.

"We must show the White House, our senators and all others that we cannot allow our industry to become victimized," he observed.

Defense Dept. Blamed

In a comprehensive printed report to some 425 delegates, Curran placed part of the blame for the status of the merchant marine at the door of the Defense Dept., declaring:

"For the past 10 years we have accepted a stupid and dangerous 'effective control' policy by which ships under foreign flags manned by foreign seamen are calculated by our Defense Dept. as part of our essential vessel capacity available for national defense, simply because owners have signed a paper saying they will be 'available when called upon'."

The NMU president charged that the federal government, under advice of the Defense Dept., "has let our shipbuilding capacity wither away like our ships."

"The government seems to have forgotten lessons of World Wars I and II, of Korea and Suez and a dozen other crises that have revealed our nation's desperate need for a strong merchant marine," he said.

Documenting his claims, Curran reported that a total of 158 ships amounting to nearly 1.25 million gross tons have been transferred to foreign flags in the past three years.

"Thus, without legislation, without debate, our maritime laws are being scrapped," he said.

Expanding on the rise of the Soviet merchant marine, Curran observed that the United States, "which is sparing no expense to challenge the Soviets in space and in the air, has not shown any intention of competing with them in the maritime field."

'Wake Up and Do Something'

"It is up to our own country to wake up and do something about advancing our own interests and objectives in the world and recognize the threat which Soviet maritime dominance poses to both," he said.

He cited several examples of costly losses in time and money brought on by the U.S. using foreign flag vessels to transport military cargo to Viet Nam during the past years.

"If our country doesn't wake up soon and get rid of the ridiculous notion that we can rely on foreign flag ships manned by foreign nationals in an emergency situation, we may find ourselves as a nation incapable of responding in any emergency," he warned.

Curran reported that his union's drive to make the public more conscious of the connection between foreign flags and "floating firetraps" has proved successful.

He cited the case of the Yarmouth Castle, which sank in November 1965, off Nassau, with a loss of 88 lives, and the the Viking Princess, gutted by fire a few months later, as examples of lessons which proved meaningful.

"The real fight to establish a U.S. flag merchant marine is not in pitting one U.S. flag company or category of operator against other U.S. flag operators, but in strengthening all U.S. flag companies versus foreign," the NMU leader explained.

He expressed confidence that the negotiation of new NMU contracts next year would not be held to the 3.2 percent wage increase guidelines set forth by the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

At the same time, he served notice that "the way things are shrinking in our industry we've got to worry about jobs before we worry about wages, hours and conditions."

Musicians Win New Opera Pacts, Philadelphia Deadlock Continues

Striking Musicians emerged with major gains from two walkouts in New York, but remained deadlocked in their quest for a new contract with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Settlements in New York ended a short strike by Local 802 against the New York City Center Opera Co. and a walkout that had barely started against the Metropolitan Opera Co.

The two-year City Opera contract calls for base wages of $203 a week for the first year and $210 the second, with pay guaranteed for 26 weeks the first year and 30 weeks the second for seven or less performances.

The per diem was raised from $6 to $13 a day for seven days the first year and to $16 the second; rehearsals will be paid for at the rate of $6 an hour, with a minimum of two hours' per call prior to 7 p.m.; players who double will receive $6 per performance for the first additional instrument and $3 for each instrument thereafter. A vacation fund of 4 percent of pay is set up, and health insurance covers both the players and their families.

The Metropolitan Opera settlement was announced from the stage by Met. Gen. Mgr. Rudolph Bing just before the last act of the glittering opening of the company's new home in the $45.7 million Lincoln Center.

The orchestra members, who had worked two years without a contract and won full retroactivity in the settlement, had voted to walk out but had delayed action to permit the opening to go on. They had declined to rehearse for performances scheduled for the first few days after the premiere.

$35 Raises Now

The agreement immediately raises base pay from $190 to $225 a week and sets a minimum salary of $260 a week for a 41-week-season—plus four weeks of paid vacation—in the final year of a five-year contract. The guaranteed minimum wage, with the addition of income from recordings, radio and television appearances and other sources, will be $355 in the last contract year. The number of performances required of the orchestra members each week also was reduced.

The huge Lincoln Center was constructed without a single work stoppage by the union building trades workers who helped in its construction. As a gesture of appreciation, the Met invited some 2,000 tradesmen and their wives to attend a dress rehearsal of the opening opera, the American composer Samuel Barber's "Anthony and Cleopatra."

In the Philadelphia dispute, Local 77 unanimously voted to walk out after turning down a management offer of a five-year contract. The union is seeking a two-year agreement with wages of $265 a week the first year and $270 the second, and $3,000 per member per year for recordings in place of the present $2,500.

Members had a guaranteed annual minimum wage of $12,400 under the old agreement with a rate of $200 a week for the past three years. Local 77 spokemen said the Philadelphia Orchestra Association's offer of $215 a week the first year increasing to $232.50 after the fifth year was unacceptable.

The strikers, who usually play in the Academy of Music, scheduled a concert for Convention Hall on Oct. 14 with Leopold Stokowski as conductor. Stokowski led the orchestra from 1929 to 1941. A new Citizens Sponsors Committee for the musicians of the Philadelphia Orchestra is the sponsor. Receipts will go into the strike fund.

Sec.-Treas. A. A. Tomei of Local 77 said the strike could be settled overnight and the concert season opened if management would withdraw its steadfast refusal to make any agreement retroactive to the expiration of the old contract.

Labor Support Helps Refugee Unit Aid 'the World's Forgotten People'

The fate of refugees from war and persecution has stirred the conscience of Americans for generations. An article in the September issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist tells of the work of one organization, the Intl. Rescue Committee, on behalf of "the world's forgotten people."

The IRC was founded in 1933 and its first efforts were to assist anti-Nazi Germans escape Hitler's persecution. It provided funds, escape routes and resettlement assistance.

Today the rescue committee is deeply involved in Viet Nam—helping to care for the hundreds of thousands of persons who have been forced from their homes by war or who have fled from Communist North Viet Nam.

The author of the article, Harry Conn, traces the close relationship between American labor and the IRC from its origins to the present day.

During the early years, labor leaders such as David Dubinsky, William Green and Sidney Hillman played important roles in the rescue efforts. Today seven of the 45 members of the IRC board of directors come from the labor movement.

As IRC Pres. William J. Van Heuvel said at a dinner last year at which AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany received the group's freedom award:

"A mainstay of support in the 32 years of our existence has been the free trade union movement in America. No tyrant has ever been successful without crushing the leadership of organized labor. No democratic government can be successful without the free trade union movement as a bulwark. The IRC and the trade unions are, consequently, natural allies in helping the oppressed anywhere in the world."

From the postwar years through the present day, the IRC has helped resettle thousands of refugees from the Iron Curtain nations of eastern Europe. Last year alone it helped 11,000 European refugees.

It has been a major source of help for refugees from Castro Cuba—giving direct aid to 45,000 Cubans.

The IRC's Viet Nam operations began in 1954, when more than a million persons "voted with their feet" by fleeing North Viet Nam for the South.

Today it helps provide food, medical care and education to thousands of war orphans, sponsors training programs for teachers and rural health officers in South Viet Nam, and recruits from the United States and other countries medical teams and technicians to help serve the civilian population. As an interesting sidelight, many of these medical teams will be made up of refugees from Cuba.

Conn concludes his article by describing the Intl. Rescue Committee as "a humanitarian endeavor, essential in the effort to secure a free world where human life and the human spirit are held high."

Pay Chiseling in 2 States Exceeds $5.2 Million

New York—Employers in New York and New Jersey underpaid their workers by more than $5.2 million during the year ended June 30, 1966, the U.S. Labor Dept. reported.

Investigation into 6,871 wage-hour complaints disclosed that 30,843 workers were short-changed under the minimum wage, overtime and equal pay provisions of federal laws. In addition, 766 minors were illegally employed in violation of child labor provisions.

Contract Extended 2 Weeks:

GE Balks at Improving Offer As Unions Heed LBJ Appeal

Jennings, and GE Pres. Frederick Borch. Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service also sat in.

Meany forcefully told the government representatives that if GE workers are prevented from achieving justice by going on strike, "it's up to you to see they get justice in some other way."

Labor and management officials next met at the Pentagon with the secretaries of the Army, Navy and Air Force, who reported that any interruption of production for the three services would "seriously impair" the war effort in Viet Nam.

'Rearrangement' Offered

Chief GE Negotiator Philip Moore told newsmen after a separate company session with Simkin and other mediators that GE would consider rearranging its contract offer as long as that did not involve more money.

"We would welcome any suggestions for rearrangement of our offer but we made it clear there's no new money available," Moore said.

The IUE, in past negotiations, charged that GE's "take it or leave it" policy, now reiterated by Moore and other company representatives, violates its obligation to bargain in good faith, and the National Labor Relations Board so ruled in a case involving previous contract talks.

Labor's position was emphasized by Meany when he told a Washington meeting of the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining before the strike deadline that "your demands are conservative. You modified them, now it's up to the corporations to come back and bargain in good faith.

"Just rearranging the package is not going to be enough."

At a mediation session during the extension period Jennings pointed out one stumbling-block to a national settlement — GE's insistence in current agreements that unions may take unresolved grievances to arbitration in discipline cases only. He called such an attitude a "built-in guarantee" of strikes over other grievances.

"When we ask management how we can remedy such situations as a unilateral wage cut, they invariably answer 'strike,' " Jennings said, adding:

30 Forced Strikes

"The company admits that in the first three months of this year 1.4 million manhours of work were lost because of strikes. Between Jan. 7 and July 25, some 30 different plants were forced to strike — including some plants the government says are doing critical work."

Therefore any agreement that fails to include adequate arbitration machinery will "settle nothing if the need for continued production is the reason for Pres. Johnson's call for a two-week truce," Jennings declared.

Prior to the Oct. 2 deadline, the delegates from locals representing GE workers and 65,000 Westinghouse workers voted in separate meetings to reject the latest contract offers by the two companies. Then in a joint meeting they reaffirmed rejection and adopted an amended list of contract objectives focusing on eight major items.

When the IUE and other unions called off walkout plans at the national level, unsettled local issues led to short strikes by some 44,000 workers at scattered GE plants, but the strikes ended when union leaders agreed these issues must be settled before national agreements can be reached.

At the Washington meetings, Simkin asked the union representatives for a listing of all the local issues and heard labor negotiators repeat their recommendations that GE should "take the handcuffs" off plant managers so local settlements can be hammered out while national negotiations continue.

IUE's national agreement with GE had an Oct. 2 expiration date. Agreements of the other unions were scheduled to terminate almost daily during the following two weeks. The first Westinghouse expiration date is Oct. 16, but that firm was reported waiting to see what GE will do while negotiations proceed in Pittsburgh.

Union proposals for new contracts were first formulated at a March "unity" meeting chaired by Meany. All affiliated unions agreed to coordinate their efforts but separate proposals were presented to the companies as called for under their individual contracts.

Management 'Walkout'

When IUE added representatives of other unions to its bargaining committee, GE negotiators walked out of the first meeting but returned to bargain "under protest" while legal proceedings wound through the courts to the Supreme Court.

GE has made two contract offers since the unions submitted their proposals in July. Westinghouse made its first contract offer Sept. 26. Both were rejected as inadequate, though an improvement over company bargaining stances in previous years.

The unity conference, meeting to review reports by all participating unions before the Oct. 2 deadline, besides adopting the eight-point counter-proposal, authorized formation of a special committee consisting of Meany as chairman, and the presidents of the 11 unions involved, to make recommendations on any further contract offers.

"We want a settlement, not a strike," said the committee report. "But we want to make it clear to GE that the offer now before us is not acceptable, and that we do not accept the Boulware philosophy that it cannot be improved."

The eight major goals of the AFL-CIO committee were revised to aim at these objectives:

- Adequate protection against the rising cost of living.
- A 4 percent yearly wage increase with a minimum of 7 cents an hour—acceptable only if aggreement is reached on cost-of-living protection.
- A fund of 1 cent an hour as a start toward reducing geographic wage differentials.
- Nine holidays, fully paid now.
- A modified union shop.
- An improved and broadened arbitration clause to reduce strikes over grievances.
- At least two years' recall rights after a layoff.
- An understanding that there shall be no contracting-out of work, where traditionally performed, without advance consultation with the union involved.

The foremost issue is protection in the form of a living-cost escalator. The IUE said wage increases, previously negotiated since 1960, already have been wiped out and "unless we get adequate protection, anything we negotiate now can be wiped out in the next three years."

MSGR. GEORGE HIGGINS, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, warned against a tendency, in the name of "national emergency," to rule out completely the right to strike. He was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC national radio network, by Harry W. Flannery.

Right to Strike 'Basic,' Msgr. Higgins Declares

Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the Social Action Dept. of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, called the right to strike "a basic right" as he was interviewed on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC radio network.

Msgr. Higgins pointed out that the Vatican II Council, in its "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World," said:

"Even in present-day circumstances, the strike can still be a necessary, though ultimate means for the defense of the workers' own rights and the fulfillment of their just demands."

The social action director for the Catholic bishops of the United States reported that some members of the Vatican Council saw no reason to talk about the right to strike since "everyone accepts that as a right." He added:

"But I think the council was wise to re-emphasize this right in spite of the objections. We know, even in our own country, where labor is well-organized and where conditions are generally good, that the right to strike is frowned upon in many segments of American life and, in effect, is almost denied."

There is a tendency even in "certain generally progressive circles," he said, to assume that "almost every strike is an emergency strike and that, therefore, some kind of government intervention is called for to regulate its exercise."

"It seems to me that this is going much too far," he declared. "I wouldn't deny that we have had national emergencies which called for some kind of government intervention, but I personally did not see the airlines strike as that kind of emergency. I didn't see the newspaper strike in New York as that kind of an emergency.

Danger in Definition

"And I think we ought to be very careful in our definition of national emergency. Otherwise, in an interrelated society such as ours, in the name of or under the heading of 'national emergency' we could rule out the right to strike almost completely.

"Every time a group of citizens is inconvenienced, someone will say, 'Well, it's an emergency,' and therefore the government has to step in. If we go down that road very far, we are going to end with no right to strike."

The public attitude toward unions might be improved, Msgr. Higgins said, if the press reported on labor-management problems "in a somewhat more positive way so as to create a public opinion in favor of collective bargaining as the normal means of settling industrial disputes."

Painters Name Satre Secretary-Treasurer

O. T. Satre, top official of the Painters in Los Angeles, has been named secretary-treasurer of the union, filling the post left vacant by the death of William H. Rohrberg.

Satre has been general vice president in charge of the 4th District in California since 1961. He has served in executive capacities in local unions in the Los Angeles area since 1941.

To succeed Satre as vice president, Pres. S. Frank Raftery announced that Jack T. Cox, director of research and education, had been named to the post. Also a Californian, Cox headed the union's PAT (Political Action Together) program.

Robert C. Welch, who started out as an apprentice in West Virginia in 1943, will replace Cox. Welch had been serving as director of jurisdiction. Moving into that office is James Shay of Pittsburgh.

O. T. SATRE

Carl E. Griffin has been appointed director of apprenticeship and training, replacing Joseph F. Cervany, now a vice president. Guy Leber, a general representative, has been named special assistant to Raftery.

In other actions the union placed Dist. Council 16 in Northern California under trusteeship by the international union.

Raftery notified the council that the action was being taken for a number of reasons, many of which surround the murders of Dow Wilson, secretary of Local 4 in San Francisco and Lloyd Green, secretary of Local 1178 in Oakland.

Four men, none of them union members or officials, were arrested in connection with the Dow murder. One of the four has been convicted and the others are awaiting trial. On Sept. 26 Ben Rasnick, secretary of Dist. Council 16, was arrested on grand jury information and charged with murder and conspiracy to commit murder in connection with the slaying of Wilson. Rasnick is now in jail.

Charles H. Marsh, of Thousand Oaks, Calif., a general representative of the international union, was appointed special trustee by Raftery and moved in to take immediate control of all operations of Dist. Council 16.

Nebraska Labor Backs State Income Tax Plan

Fremont, Neb.—Delegates to the Nebraska AFL-CIO convention here voted to endorse a state income tax plan passed by the legislature and subject to voter ratification in the Nov. 8 election.

The endorsement marks a switch from a previous convention policy opposing an income tax.

State AFL-CIO Pres. Richard W. Nisley attributes the change in position to a greater understanding among union members and leaders of the revenue problems facing the state—and the alternatives to an income tax.

Nebraska currently is one of the few states which has neither a general sales tax nor an income tax, and which relies heavily on a property tax for its revenue. The State AFL-CIO executive board sponsored a three-day seminar on taxation this July.

The convention also approved a two-cent increase in per capita payments to the state federation—from 13 to 15 cents.

A vacancy on the State AFL-CIO executive board was filled with the election of Richard Lintner of Omaha, a member of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Terms of other federation officers have another year to run.

Union Mayor

Delegates received more than the routine convention welcome to Fremont. Mayor Win Renninger is a member of Local 216 of the Meat Cutters. In addition to greeting the opening session, he served as master of ceremonies at the convention banquet. The speaker for the occasion was Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies.

STAFF TRAINING seminar brings officers and international representatives of the Brick & Clay Workers to Washington, D.C., for the first such institute since the union was chartered in 1895. Shown speaking is Economist Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research. Union Pres. Paul Pelfrey is in front row, third from far right.

Job Safeguards Urged In Brick-Clay Contracts

Union negotiators should make every effort to get job security clauses in contracts when conditions are relatively good, as they are now, an AFL-CIO economist advised staff representatives of the Brick & Clay Workers at a three-day staff training conference in Washington, D.C.

Workers can be protected by contract clauses providing for advance notice of major changes, severance pay, transfer rights and job elimination only by attrition, said Rudolph Oswald of the federation's Dept. of Research.

He noted that new processes in the steel industry, for example, are sure to have an effect on workers in the tile and sewer pipe industry, because they make it possible for steel furnaces to produce three or four times as much steel with less tile.

The staff conference was the first since the Brick & Clay Workers were chartered by the former AFL more than 70 years ago. It was arranged by union Pres. Paul Pelfrey and Sec.-Treas. George Popovsky, both of Chicago, and Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education.

The conference concluded with a tour of Washington and a visit to Arlington Cemetery and the grave of the late Pres. John F. Kennedy. Over a three-day period, conferees heard these other speakers:

COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan on labor and the 1966 elections; Markley Roberts of the federation's Dept. of Legislation on labor's legislative program, progress and prospects; Rogin, Pelfrey and Popovsky on communication with members and the public; union Counsel Nathan Duff on the law and contract negotiations.

Other speakers included AFL-CIO Dir. of Organization William L. Kircher on keys to effective organizing; Assistant Disputes Dir. Gilbert Seldin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service on preparations for bargaining; and Stephen Harris, assistant collective bargaining director for the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., on pensions and welfare proposals in bargaining.

Minimum Wage Voted For District of Columbia

there has been no wage-hour protection for men. The Senate on several occasions passed minimum wage bills only to see them die in an unfriendly House District of Columbia Committee with the adjournment of each Congress.

Last year the House committee brought out a very modest bill which would have taken three years to reach a $1.25 wage floor. This January, the Senate approved a bill by Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.) to set a $1.25 wage floor, with automatic increases to match the federal Fair Labor Standards Act.

So great were the differences between the two measures that the bills languished until Congress boosted the federal minimum wage in steps to $1.60 and expanded coverage.

House-Senate conferees then got to work in earnest and the final version was close to the more generous Senate bill. The conference report was routinely accepted by both houses without a ripple of protest.

Domestics, other household employes and newspaper carriers, along with executives and professionals, are the major groups still excluded from coverage. Some overtime exclusions are allowed, but generally employes are guaranteed premium pay for more than 42 hours of work starting Feb. 1 and after 40 hours starting next Aug. 1.

The district commissioners are empowered to make regulations covering the portion of the minimum wage which can be offset by tips received by workers or board and lodging furnished by an employer.

The final version of the bill included a Senate provision allowing industry wage boards to set rates higher than the minimum.

The $1.40 and $1.60 rates take effect a year later than federal law provides for workers previously covered by the FLSA. However, newly-covered workers will fare better under the district law, since the federal legislation would start them at only a $1 an hour, with a 15-cent increase each year until the $1.60 level is reached in 1971. The federal wage floor applies, of course, whenever it is higher than the D. C. minimum for persons in jobs covered by the FLSA.

cil of Economic Advisers as averaging about 6.5 percent. He charged that this is "clearly inflationary, just as was the earlier agreement between the same union and the New York Transit Authority."

TWU said hourly rates of line mechanics would rise by 59 cents in an 18-month period under the AA agreement—20 cents retroactive to May 1; an additional 19 cents next May 1, and another 20 cents on Nov. 1, 1967. Lesser hikes are provided for other jobs.

The wage provisions cover the period from last May 1 to May 1, 1968, with provision for reopening the contract on wages 30 days prior to the latter date. Other terms remain in effect to Jan. 1, 1969.

The inability of American Airlines management and union members to agree on terms after the old contract terminated resulted in Presidential appointment of an emergency board which recommended that the parties settle their own differences by returning to the bargaining table. They agreed on new terms after a strike deadline had been extended 12 hours.

The union has been seeking wage improvements at major airlines based on rising company profits and worker productivity that it says permits increases beyond the CEA's 3.2 percent "guidelines" without adding to labor costs or contributing to price inflation.

Board Bars Split Of Skilled Workers

Detroit—A petition by the Intl. Society of Skilled Trades for the right to carve out a unit of skilled employes from a unit of production and maintenance workers has been rejected by the National Labor Relations Board's regional office here.

Regional Dir. Jerome H. Brooks ruled that while the petition was not barred by the current contract between the Auto Workers and the Associated Spring Corp., Plymouth, Mich., nevertheless a unit of all skilled workers in the plant is not appropriate and the ISST is not a traditional representative of any specific craft.

The ISST filed for a unit of 25 general maintenance employes doing toolroom, machine repair and maintenance work, or three separate units of the same workers. The company and the UAW opposed both kinds of units.

Report to Convention:

Unity Talks Pushed By Paper Unions

Cleveland, O.—The growing need for labor unity if paper workers are to get a fair share of the wealth they are producing was stressed by the presidents of two unions at the fourth constitutional convention of the Papermakers & Paperworkers.

"For more than two years," said UPP Pres. Paul L. Phillips, "I have argued that merger must be accomplished if the best interests of the workers in the paper industry are to be served. Today, I feel even more strongly about the necessity of the merger."

"We must unite in order to preserve our years of hard-fought gains and to achieve the future security we deserve," declared Pres.-Sec. Joseph Tonelli of the Pulp, Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers.

The two leaders pointed out to more than 1,000 UPP delegates that the unions could well take example from the corporations, which have been strengthening themselves by mergers that have produced greater concentrations of power.

"They pool all their purchasing power, their production and their bargaining strength," Phillips said, "to take advantage of—guess who? The suppliers of raw materials, the customers and, most important of all, their employes. That's you."

Phillips expressed the hope that the merger talks, which began after the Pulp-Sulphite convention last year authorized discussions, will continue and prove successful.

"I am convinced that disunity and division weaken and harm you in your negotiations," he told the delegates, who represented about 145,000 members.

"On the other hand, I am equally convinced and consider it even more important that the members of these unions should enjoy the rewards, benefits and successes which would accrue to them as one of the many dividends resulting from organic unity of these two great international unions."

Tonelli pledged himself "to expend all the energy and ability I may possess to consummate the merger."

Potential Gain

"Organic unity would contribute to the attainment of better working conditions and higher living standards for these workers," he said. "It would hasten organization of unorganized workers. It would contribute to strengthening and extending the fundamental freedoms of our democratic society.

"We have the opportunity to achieve greatness if we unite to fulfill our responsibilities. Together we can build a world of the future for generations yet unborn in which justice and equity will prevail."

Before the delegates for later action were recommendations from the executive board and Phillips for increases in the monthly per capita and the minimum local dues. Phillips explained a boost in the per capita is needed to meet a $500,000 deficit in the general fund built up in the past three years—$200,000 of it in 1966.

The UPP president said the deficit was caused by a rise in normal operating costs and the additional expense of beating back raiding attempts by the Teamsters.

He said the defense fund is "sound," with the balance higher than at the time of the last convention in 1963 despite the payment of nearly $2 million in strike benefits, but that it should be increased to $5 million.

Citing a recent Soviet announcement of plans to build 34 large pulp and paper mills, Phillips noted that they are expected to equal Canadian production by late 1969—about the time of the next convention—and warned:

"Should the Soviets decide to dump paper on the world market, even though the quality should be inferior, this could easily affect your jobs."

Such dumping would add to the problems created by over-expansion of production capacity in the United States and Canada, he said.

Phillips reported that more than 2,000 American companies have built new plants abroad in the past five years, including many paper and converting facilities in which "wages are low and profits are high." To meet the problems created by such unfair competition, he said, the union will continue to work with the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions through the AFL-CIO and the Canadian Labor Congress.

Free World Unity

"Unions in the free world must become more closely associated with each other for the welfare of all," he declared.

Phillips said that paper workers are receiving "the highest wages with the finest conditions and fringe benefits" the industry has ever known, but that the employers are doing even better. UPP members must overcome confusion created by the companies and "disunity" groups, he continued, if the workers are to get a fair share of the profits.

"To the everlasting credit of union members, particularly in Canada, this bad judgment by employers could not be offset by low-wage contract settlements," he added.

Organized labor was praised by Assistant Sec. of Labor Esther Peterson, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, for support of improvements to the minimum wage law and the truth-in-packaging bill.

The packaging bill headed for a Senate-House conference committee is an improvement over no bill at all, she said, but "tighter controls" are necessary.

"Fair packaging legislation is important," she emphasized, "because labor can lose over the retail counter what it has gained at the bargaining table."

Mrs. Peterson, the first woman to make a major address at a UPP convention, also cited the need for truth-in-lending legislation.

"It's not the use of credit that's bad," she said, "it's the abuse of credit that's bad. Credit should be competitive. People should be able to shop for credit by knowing what credit costs them."

Equity Pact Covers Resident Theaters

New York—Actors' Equity and the League of Resident Theatres reached agreement here on the union's first contract covering employment of Equity members in the league's 26 U.S. theaters.

The three-year pact sets salary ranges of $90 to $135 a week initially, $95 to $150 by 1969, for actors in four different categories based on gross box office receipts. Also it provides improved sick benefits, accrued vacation benefits, and salary payment from the first day of rehearsal.

Oregon Senate Race Tough, Tense Battle

Portland, Ore.—The Senate race between Democratic Rep. Robert D. Duncan and Republican Gov. Mark Hatfield in Oregon seems certain to remain a tough, tense battle until election day.

It began as a statewide referendum on Viet Nam, with Hatfield signing a criticizing petition demanding a fast pull-out of U.S. troops and Duncan bluntly challenging him. "Somebody had to speak up for the U.S. government," Duncan said in declaring his support of Pres. Johnson's conduct of the war.

Hatfield's campaign slogans still emphasize his "courage" in "standing alone" in voting in the Los Angeles governor's conference last July against a resolution backing Johnson's Vietnamese policy. But in Oregon he hastily de-escalated the issue after both Republican and Democratic opinion surveys showed he had picked a losing theme.

Both men are strong campaigners. Duncan has a consistently progressive able record in the House, Hatfield the advantage of two winning contests for governor.

In neighboring Idaho there is another Senate contest, with former Democratic Rep. Ralph R. Harding running against incumbent GOP Sen. Len B. Jordan.

Young Challenger

Jordan, appointed in 1962 to fill a vacancy, is a former governor and veteran officeholder. This may not prove an advantage this year. Harding is waging a hard campaign and at 37 he is 30 years younger than Jordan—a fact noticeable in their platform and television appearances.

Governorships are at stake in both states, both held by Republicans at present. In the northwestern states tied together by the mighty Columbia and Snake Rivers — Idaho, Oregon and Washington—13 House seats are up, with Democrats having a 9-4 edge based exclusively on four freshmen congressmen who knocked out veteran Republicans in Washington districts in the 1964 Johnson landslide.

The Oregon race for governor pits a formidable GOP candidate, Sec. of State Tom McCall, against Democratic State Treas. Robert W. Straub. McCall had years of exposure as a statewide radio and television newscaster. It may prove a more decisive influence than serious discussion of lagging state revenues and new taxes.

The Idaho contest for governor was thrown into confusion when the nationally known incumbent, Republican Robert E. Smylie, seeking a fourth term, was smashed in the GOP primary by State Sen. Donald W. Samuelson.

Smylie, aggressive and responsible, was a major figure in reorganizing Republican Party machinery last year by helping oust the Goldwater men installed for the 1964 campaign. The powerful right-wing elements in his state, quietly planning for vengeance, gave the conservative Samuelson an overwhelming majority that brutally blew Smylie out of public office.

The campaign was jumbled again in late September when the original Democratic nominee, Charles Herndon, was killed in an airplane accident and replaced by State Sen. Cecil Andrus, who voted for Smylie tax programs more often than Samuelson did.

A third major candidate is State Sen. Perry Swisher, liberal Republican, who filed as an independent, also on a record closer to Smylie and Andrus than to Samuelson. There are, in addition, two write-in candidates and a Democrat running as an independent on the single issue of legalized gambling.

Freshman Democratic congressmen elected in 1964 with Johnson may hold their districts or nearly all of them, apparently because of the intensive servicing they gave their constituents and the intelligence they brought to issues.

The Duncan - Hatfield contest nevertheless is the single most important race. Hatfield went into the Senate contest (he was ineligible for a third term as governor) a clear favorite to win the seat being vacated by the retirement of Mrs. Maurine Neuberger, a Democrat.

GOP Keynoter

Keynoter at the Republican National Convention in 1964, the Oregon governor did well enough in the envenomed atmosphere of the Goldwater drive to keep a foot in all GOP camps. His denunciation of Johnson in Viet Nam this year took him far beyond the cautious approach of national Republicans. Duncan, rated as an unusually conscientious legislator, gave up a safe congressional district to run for the Senate, winning overwhelmingly a Democratic primary in which his opponent echoed Hatfield's views.

Hatfield started out ahead. His campaign managers were shocked when Duncan hit him on Viet Nam and emerged as an apparent majority choice of the voters. The opinion surveys, for what they are worth, indicate that Hatfield may have pulled even again after trying to shed Viet Nam as an issue.

The majority of Oregon citizens, it has been noticed in other elections, register Democratic and vote Republican, conservative, mugwump or any other way they please.

They also want their political spokesmen to serve their interests, as do the citizens of other states. Duncan had to stay in Washington one weekend, despite the heat developing in his Senate campaign, to vote in the House on the anti-poverty bill, the bill to suspend the 7 percent business tax investment credit, a bill seeking to establish 12-mile sovereignty off our seacoasts to check Japanese commercial fishing operations in the Pacific.

Court Upholds Hoffa Guilt In Fraud Case

Chicago—The conviction of Teamsters Pres. James R. Hoffa on charges of conspiring to defraud one of the union's pension funds of $25 million through fraudulent loan applications has been upheld by the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here.

Hoffa was found guilty in July 1964 by a jury on one count of conspiracy and three counts of fraud in connection with the fund and sentenced to five years in jail and fined $10,000. He appealed to the circuit court, alleging 56 errors in the trial.

The Circuit Court by a 2 to 1 vote upheld the lower court on the conviction of Hoffa and six other defendants. At the trial the government charged that of $25 million in loans obtained from the pension fund by "false and misleading" statements, $1.7 million was siphoned off by the defendants for their own gain.

In another court action involving Hoffa, the U.S. Supreme Court has agreed to limited review of a five-year sentence and a $10,000 fine against the Teamster president on charges of jury tampering in a Tennessee case.

THE SAME PEOPLE who sought to foist a so-called "right-to-work" law on California in 1958 are now financing the campaign of the Republican gubernatorial candidate Ronald Reagan, Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (center), Democatic candidate for another term, told the Sheet Metal Workers convention in San Francisco. Pinning a visitor's badge on his lapel is Pres. Edward F. Carlough; at left is Sec.-Treas. David S. Turner.

California Contest for Governor Top Liberal-Conservative Fight

public relations firm of Spencer-Roberts, Inc., to revise, modify and cleanse the "rightest" image the candidate got in years of fighting for conservative Republicans in the state and the nation, specifically former Sen. Goldwater. Handsome but not too slick-looking, Reagan is the beneficiary of a new "Where He Stands" pamphlet in which his latest statements of principle are quoted.

The quotations, with one exception, are all from 1966, immediately before or shortly after his primary victory. The differences are principally in the tone of voice in which he phrased his point of view.

He is on public record as having argued in February 1962 that the medicare program was an example of "creeping socialism" and as recently as July 1966 calling it a "bill of goods." The new "Where He Stands" pamphlet quotes him as saying, in January of this year, that he had "always" supported the "principle" of medical care for impoverished people.

There is no "crisis" in education, he said in April 1965, that requires vast federal aid programs; he argued in April 1966 not about federal aid, according to the "Where He Stands" pamphlet, but merely that perhaps we were getting education "too far removed from parental influence."

The GOP candidate has shown in press conferences and in nationally televised news that he is deft and skilled at turning aside questions about his acceptance of support from, for example, members and spokesmen for the John Birch Society.

Reagan was heckled when he went down to the wholesale produce market at 5:30 a.m. here one morning to shake hands with the workers. Brown was heckled by a "new left" suburban woman at the coffee klatch who insisted that her conscience on Viet Nam made it impossible for her to support the Democratic candidate. It bothers Brown that somebody from the "new left" should imagine that he disagrees with Pres. Johnson on Viet Nam and that, if he did, it is a state issue.

A Republican spokesman says "right-wing control of the Republican Party was a 1964 issue and Brown is trying to use it in 1966."

The Democratic governor seems most persuasive to audiences when he talks about his own affirmative record, generally acknowledged by his 49 fellow governors to be unexcelled in the nation, and a good many observers think he should continue to accentuate the positive.

Political observers have noticed across the years that Brown wears well in campaigns. He wore well in beating Nixon four years ago, for example.

Still, California just two years ago elected a screen actor, Sen. George Murphy, against the late Pres. John F. Kennedy's press secretary, Pierre Salinger. It is a volatile state, with passion and extremes of division within its parties and between parties.

There could scarcely be a sharper contrast than the differences between the campaign styles of Brown and Reagan.

Reagan seems to be relaxed, he smiles a broad smile when he is asked at press conferences about his identification with mishmashed conservative causes, and frames his answers with practiced skill.

Brown is his familiar self—earnest, deeply interested in issues, at his best in small groups, an eight-year governor of the country's most heavily populated state, and he talks seriously about programs on civil rights, public schools, university and state college expansion, vast highway systems, developed under his administration.

Reagan talks about crime rates and racial riots, about alleged laziness among people on relief, about the alleged need for surcease from taxation.

"We're not exploiting the white backlash," a campaign spokesman says, "but it's there."

The Republican candidate nevertheless made a direct attack on the Rumford Act—California's open occupancy housing law—in a speech to the state real estate association, which has spearheaded an attack on the statute.

The solution to de facto segregation of minorities, Reagan said, lies "in the hearts and minds of all of us." The Rumford Act, he said, was a prime example of legislation "forced through" the state general assembly at the "express instruction" of the Brown administration, which he labeled the "all-powerful Big Brother in Sacramento."

A typical campaign trip for Pat Brown takes him to the now-building Casaic Reservoir—southern end of the state-federal water development system dedicated four years ago by the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

It will store water from the flooding Feather River in the North to supply the needs of the parched South.

A two-day trip takes him to a non-partisan speech to the Knights of Columbus in the small suburban community of Oxnard, a so-called coffee klatch at a private home, a set-piece speech at a Hughes Aircraft Co. aerospace operation, the farthest-out suburb of them all in the incredibly beautiful and isolated Simi Valley Community Center, and finally to a night meeting in Riverside.

Population Growth

Brown, 61 years old, with 20 years of public service behind him, cites figures about education and population. ("The 600,000 increase per year will destroy us unless we meet their needs for water and education; we must not install a tuition system in the state colleges because it would soak the suburbs of middle-income people with growing families.")

Reagan talks about getting welfare cases off the welfare rolls, about installing tuition charges for those "able to afford it" in state colleges and universities, about the burdens of taxation in general and real estate taxes on homes in particular.

He travels perhaps less extensively than Brown but diligently; a single day sends him to a California real estate meeting in San Francisco, to a county fair in Placerville, to an Elks Club spaghetti dinner in Chico, and all the way South to Los Angeles.

Rep. Weltner Quits, Can't Back Maddox

Atlanta—Rep. Charles L. Weltner, liberal two-term Georgian, gave up almost certain election to a third term, declaring "I cannot compromise with hate."

Weltner, with other candidates in the Democratic primary, signed a pledge to support the full party ticket. The upset winner of the gubernatorial nomination was an extreme segregationist, Lester G. Maddox, described by Weltner as "the one man in our state who exists as the very symbol of violence and oppression."

Weltner resigned as a candidate rather than violate either his pledge or his principles.

The Democratic executive committee for the Atlanta area has named County Commissioner Archie Lindsay, considered a moderate, as the party's nominee for Weltner's seat.

The Racist Smokescreen

THE NATIONAL LEADERSHIP of the Republican Party, seemingly desperate for an issue to rebuild the party's strength in the November elections, is trying to latch onto the white backlash issue.

The Republican Coordinating Committee, which includes the party's top leaders in Congress, the states and the national committee, issued a statement this week charging that high officials of the Johnson Administration "have condoned and encouraged disregard for law and order," and that the Administration "has accomplished nothing of substance to date to promote public safety."

The New York Times headlined the story on Page One: "GOP Will Press Racial Disorders as Election Issue." The story noted that the Republicans found the race issue of "increasing concern to Americans," and that they "moved to give the issue more prominence in the current political races."

The GOP move, tied reportedly to current polls showing the civil rights issue a major concern of 58 percent of persons queried, was too much for New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller. He immediately dissociated himself from the policy statement and said responsibility for rioting where it took place rested with the mayors of the cities involved. Rockefeller made it clear that he did not think either Pres. Johnson or Vice Pres. Humphrey was responsible for the incidents of the past summer.

THE GOP ATTEMPT to pick up votes via the white backlash route is a contemptible piece of political opportunism. That a major American political party would knowingly align itself with forces based on fear and hate is in itself repugnant.

The Coordinating Committee's position is pointed up also by the gallant fight waged by the handful of Republican liberals in the Senate against watering down administrative guidelines on integration in federal medicare and school aid programs.

These same liberals—and their Democratic liberal allies—have fought also for programs that would bring some measure of aid to the Negro ghettos via anti-poverty programs, increased and broadened minimum wage laws, school aid and a number of social welfare approaches.

THOSE WHO have milked the issue of racial conflict for votes in both the Democratic and Republican parties essentially lack any sense of decency or morality. But beyond this they stand guilty of throwing up a polluted smokescreen to cover their complete lack of program, or, in a number of cases, their extremist positions against progress in economic, political or social terms.

There are critical issues in the 1966 elections and one of them is to devise ways and means, legislatively and administratively, to reach the goal of equal rights for all.

There is the real issue of rebuilding the cities and the role of the federal government in this effort. There is the continuing war on poverty which affects three times as many whites as Negroes.

These are the issues to which the candidates should be addressing themselves at all levels in the North and the South. The blatant appeal to fear and hate and emotionalism may produce a few votes, but it will do so at the cost of seriously weakening the fabric of American society.

A Winning Combination

GOP Split Widens:

Goldwater Group Hits Liberals In Bid to Retain Party Control

THE SPLIT in the ranks of the Republican Party which produced the Goldwater debacle in 1964 is far from healed. If anything, it's growing worse as right-wing Republicans are clearly maneuvering to keep control of the party both now and for 1968.

Latest sign of the inner battle being waged between the extreme right wing and the moderate-to-liberal branch of the party is a violent attack on "the 'intellectual elite' of the liberal wing of the party" by the reactionary American Conservative Union, supported by its chairman, Rep. John M. Ashbrook, Ohio Republican.

Ashbrook, who is 98 percent pure on the basis of right-wing voting records, but was last reported 21 wrong to zero right by COPE, is an early supporter of former Sen. Barry Goldwater and was a founder of the National Draft Goldwater Committee in 1963.

The ACU-Ashbrook onslaught on the GOP liberals takes the form of a "study" of the Ripon Society by the ACU, the Ripon Society being a group of young Republican liberals in Cambridge, Mass.

The idea of the study is to prove that the moderate-liberal branch of the Republican party is not as strong as it is supposed to be, that the "little band of 'progressives' in the House is responsible for the margin of victory given to some of the worst legislation this country has ever had," and that "liberal" Republicans do not represent their party.

In the course of the study, the Ripon Society's "intellectual elite" is given a thorough going over, but more importantly such Republicans as Sen. Jacob K. Javits of New York, Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York City, Sen. Hugh Scott of Pennsylvania, Sen. Clifford P. Case of New Jersey, former Vice Pres. Richard Nixon and even former New York Gov. Thomas E. Dewey also are slapped.

They, rather than Goldwater and the conservatives, have been responsible for reducing the Republican Party to its current minority position and ought to be defeated in their efforts "to turn the Republican Party leftward."

"Many Republicans have gotten the false impression mainly through news stories that the position of the Ripon Society represents the thinking of the national leadership of the party," Ashbrook said. "They do not! Every signpost thus far in 1966 indicates to us that it is important, therefore, that all Republicans have the facts about this little group that seeks to reshape our party in a liberal image. They represent only themselves."

JAVITS, CASE, Scott, and Nixon are slapped down for trying to replace Republican conservative leaders such as Sen. Robert A. Taft and Rep. Joseph W. Martin in 1950. Javits is criticized for introducing tax legislation formulated by the Ripon Society. Both Nixon and Dewey are blamed for dragging their party down to worse defeats than the Goldwater one.

Basically the study is an attack on the so-called Eastern Establishment of the Republican Party which was strongly opposed to the Goldwater candidacy, lost control of the 1964 convention and is determined to get control of the party back in liberal hands before anything worse than the Goldwater fiasco happens in 1968.

Virtually every liberal Republican leader comes under attack in one form or another, including such claims as "Governors Rockefeller and Scranton are no longer powers in Republican politics," with the clear warning that the Goldwater right wing has every intention of keeping its hold on the party and staging a re-run of 1964. (PAI).

Morgan Says:

Virus of Racial Hatred Imperils Ideas, Ideals of Open Society

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m. EDT.)

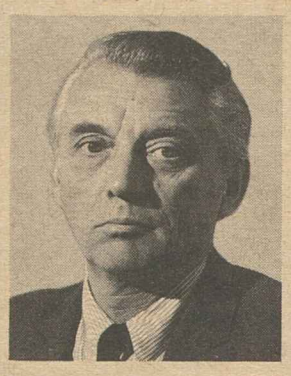
NOW IS THE TIME for all good men—and women—to come to the aid of their party, be it Democratic or Republican.

The United States of America is supposed, historically, to be a nation of decent, moderate and reasonable citizens. But today important parts of the country seem to be gripped in madness. The virus of racial hatred has infected large segments of the population, black and white, with a kind of hydrophobia, a sickness in which the victims are seized by the insane belief that nothing is more important in life than the death of the ideas and ideals of the open society.



Morgan

What a spectacle for this proud republic, materially the strongest and richest society in the history of civilization, to present to the rest of the world!

Regard the wild waverings of the patient's fever chart:

The words and pictures from San Francisco make it look more like a riot-center in segregationist South Africa than one of America's most beautiful cities.

A hand-picked cluster of wealthy and influential New Yorkers entertains a European ambassador at a private dinner in Westchester County and confides that "we have a secure suburban white enclave here and we are going to keep it white."

Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, in quiet, unofficial soundings around the country, are informed there is almost no support in any white community for a policy of open housing.

The latest Gallup Poll reports that white resistance to improving the Negro's lot has reached the highest pitch in four and a half years.

As if clued in in advance on such findings, a Baltimore paving contractor named George P. Mahoney invents a slogan saying "your home is your castle—protect it" and wins the Democratic nomination for the governorship of Maryland.

A man whose coat of arms could well be crossed ax handles rampant on a field of demagoguery, Lester G. Maddox, becomes the Democratic nominee for governor of Georgia. A rabid segregationist, Maddox defied the law by closing his Atlanta restaurant rather than accept Negro patronage. As a symbol of his defiance he passed out ax handles to white customers.

In sum these and similar convulsions are grouped under the heading of "white backlash" against Negro violence in the streets, fatuously reckless demands for "black power" and such utter idiocies as the riotous boycott of a new $5 million school in Harlem by Negroes who demand that its teaching staff be all black.

One of the most sobering analyses of this cumulative madness comes from Dr. Thomas Pettigrew, an associate professor of social psychology at Harvard. What we are witnessing, he declares, is a mobilization of the white man's hatred of the Negro "that was always there."

THE BACKLASH is a complete misnomer, says Pettigrew, because to have a backlash you have to have a frontlash of real sympathy for the Negro movement first and "you can't tell me there was ever a 'frontlash' anywhere, from backwoods Georgia to Cicero, Ill." In other words, the nation is witnessing the ritual of its white population tearing off the veil of hypocrisy and admitting for the first time that it hates, fears and rejects in public 21 million American citizens because they are black.

This is a ghastly spectacle. Is it true? It may be overdrawn and oversimplified but it cannot be carelessly brushed aside. And if it is not to become the full truth with all its shattering consequences, then we'd better pick some realities out of the situation, carefully but fast. For a ruthless demagogue, playing on mass emotions, it is not too long a step from the state house in Atlanta, Annapolis, or Montgomery to Washington, D.C.

Will moderate Democrats in Maryland and Georgia have the courage to decry and denounce the candidacies of a Mahoney or a Maddox? Will moderate Republicans in those states resist the temptation to outdo these racist appeals to mobthink? Can responsible Negro leaders and the great mass of the decent, anonymous but not invisible black population summon the patience and discipline necessary to restrain and counterbalance the wild and almost trance-like violence of a minority of Negro extremists? Can elected officials learn to look beyond their noses?

"In the name of God and human decency," cried San Francisco Mayor Jack Shelley to the White House, "I plead for immediate emergency funds (for Negro jobs) to assuage this situation."

In the name of God where was Shelley when the statistics were passed out months ago showing that Negro unemployment in California and elsewhere was virtually triple the national rate?

This country is in a crisis, the more difficult because it is so absurd. In Atlanta on the very day Lester Maddox caught fire politically, Author Lillian Smith, a native Southerner, died. A brave and eloquent spokesman for civil rights, she once wrote that this movement "has got my soul to ache. And it hurts," she said, "God, how it hurts." America needs to nurse America's aching soul—if she can find it.

Strife or Legislation:

Farm Workers' Future Linked To Coverage Under Labor Law

FARM WORKERS have proved they want and can build unions, but without legal safeguards, the process is slow, expensive and disruptive, the AFL-CIO's chief organizer has declared.

William L. Kircher, director of the federation's Dept. of Organization, said the AFL-CIO victory on the big DiGiorgio grape farm in California has shown "the whole farm labor community that collective bargaining can be accomplished." Without the protection of law that other workers have, he said, "it is going to take a lot more time; it is going to take a lot more money; and it is going to cause a lot more bitterness."

He called for expansion of the National Labor Relations Act to include farm workers, warning "there are no two ways about it—without legislation, strikes and boycotts, and struggles and strife become necessary, inextricable parts of developing a union." Kircher's statements came during the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

He said that the growth potential of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, recently chartered by the AFL-CIO, can "reasonably be set as high as 750,000 to 1 million" members. But the growth, he said, hinges on the "extent to which the federal government and Congress see fit to extend the Labor Relations Act to farm workers and give them some kind of protection and some kind of machinery to organize themselves."

KIRCHER DENIED claims that unionization of farm workers will increase food prices. He said economic experts agree that farm labor is such a small part of food costs that meeting "their economic problems with improved wages and realistic conditions and benefits would have a very small effect on the price of vegetables and fruit."

"But even if it did, the more important question that we have to ask ourselves is if we want the farm worker to subsidize the vegetables and the fruit that go on our tables by working at poverty levels—at substandard wages—and under conditions that we should all be ashamed of," he asserted.

Reporters questioning Kircher were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

PORTLAND, ORE.—A clear-cut trend—a sudden gravitation of the people toward one party or the other—may develop in the western states in the final weeks of the election campaign, but no such tidal movement was observable five weeks before the voting.

There was no assurance, in these states at least, that the elections would be governed by the once-automatic rule that the party out of power wins in the midterm balloting.

In state after state, congressional district after district, each contest seemed to be an individual contest, involving personality, public acceptability and local issues.

There is some disaffection among the voters about the Administration in Washington—about living costs, crime rates, urban difficulties—but no clear evidence that this disaffection will be carried over, necessarily, to Democratic candidates for governor, for the Senate, for the House.

Thus in the same state the picture may show a probable victory for a Democratic candidate for governor, a possible victory for a Republican candidate for the Senate, a probable victory for a Republican candidate in some selected congressional district, a probable Democratic victory in another.

A GOOD MANY Republicans have been trying to exploit the war in Viet Nam as an issue, but the effort has been diffused and it simply hasn't worked. Some GOP candidates have argued for a tougher, more aggressive line of action; others, like Gov. Mark Hatfield of Oregon, took the approach that the war was ethically or intellectually wrong and were compelled to pull back when they discovered they were stuck on the unpopular side of an issue.

There is, in many states, what local observers consider a "silence" if not an apathy on the part of voters to politics in general and their local contests in particular.

But this is a familiar phenomenon in the so-called off-year elections in the middle of a presidential term (fewer than 40 percent of the registered voters actually cast ballots in the midterm years, and, besides, it might be deceptive this time.)

"Silence" among voters is not necessarily "apathy"; it may reflect a consensus among citizens that they don't much care to have their minds and their private political opinions prodded and exposed and that they prefer to show how they are going to vote by marking their ballots on election day.

THIS IS NOT an election, clearly, like that of 1964, when great numbers of political activists were so dedicated to the defeat of Sen. Goldwater for the Presidency that they volunteered by the tens of thousands for precinct work, registration and similar chores.

That is simply another way of saying, however, that we are seeing the normal kind of campaign for a midterm election. Since the Presidency is not at stake, there is no centralizing theme.

And since, generally speaking, people tend to vote most heavily when they are angry about something (against a candidate or party rather than affirmatively for the opposite candidate and party), the conclusion perhaps must be that they aren't really as disaffected and disenchanted with the Johnson Administration as the undertones of grumble and growl would suggest.

Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey was cheered by students at Oregon State University and students in Bellingham, Wash. Rep. Robert B. Duncan, running against Hatfield, had a triumph at Oregon's Reed College, a hotbed of student complaints about Viet Nam, when he bluntly spoke his mind in defense of Pres. Johnson's policies.

There is, in short, no sign in the mountain states and the Northwest that all the Democrats elected in the Johnson landslide of 1964 are going to be thrown out and all the Republicans voted back in.

The campaigns in these states suggest the people are aware that they are making up their minds about a new election—1966 rather than 1964—and feel entirely capable of making up their minds.

BUILDING THE UNIONS that farm workers have proved they want will be a slow and disruptive process unless their right to unionize is protected by law, AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher (center) told Reporters Sam Sharkey (left) of the Newhouse Newspapers and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News on Labor News Conference, weekly public affairs interview on the Mutual radio network.

There's a Higher Cost of Living Hiding in 'Handy Credit Cards'

By Sidney Margolius

IN AMERICA even the poor have credit cards, or at least the almost-poor, now that even discount stores, department stores and neighborhood stores offer them. Apparently the finance industry feels there is no reason why moderate-income families should be exempt from paying extra fees for charge accounts.

But some astute working families are getting uneasy about how much they do have to pay in hidden fees for credit cards which allow you to charge in various stores in your area.

"Forget about cash when you shop," one big Eastern bank advertises. "Our credit card gives you charge privileges at thousands of stores."

But there are a couple of catches. One is that after a number of days of "free" credit—usually 10 to 30 days depending on the plan—you have to pay a "carrying charge," generally 1.25 or 1.5 percent a month. This is really the equivalent of a true annual interest rate of 15 or 18 percent a year. In comparison, the same banks pay you only 4-5 percent on the savings you deposit with them.

The other catch is that not only you but the store pays a fee. One observant reader who lives in California and has watched the spread of credit cards there warns that the stores pay 2 percent to the bank sponsoring the credit cards.

"Then the stores raise their prices on all products by the 2 percent, and most of our people pay this extra charge whether they pay by check or cash or use the credit card," he points out.

This is true. If there is no such thing as a free lunch, there certainly is no such thing as free credit. The cash customer must help pay the cost. This is a business expense added to the price of the goods you buy.

He, for one, is not taking this situation lying down. He reports that when he buys in stores offering credit-card charge accounts, he demands a 2 percent discount for paying by cash or check. Most of the stores will give it, he finds, "but you must demand it."

People who pay cash at charge-account stores certainly should be entitled to a discount. Whether the store will give it is another question. At one time many stores customarily gave a discount for cash.

There is another danger in the spreading use of credit cards among even moderate-income families. That is the risk of over-extending yourself, and also neglecting to comparison-shop because of the ease of charging through a credit card.

YOU NOW can even charge your medical bills on another credit plan, sponsored by the American Health Credit Plan, Inc. You get a checkbook of certificates. You fill these out and give them to the doctor, pharmacist, etc., instead of paying cash. Then you get a bill from the plan for all the services you have charged. If you pay within 30 days, there is no credit fee. If not, you pay that innocuous-sounding 1.5 percent a month.

If you do need credit for a medical service it would be less costly for all concerned to make your own arrangements with the doctor, dentist or druggist even if the doctor suggests it.

If you succumb to these various pressures to buy almost everything on credit, you will find you have added a permanent new living expense for the fees. Credit should be reserved for larger purchases, and only if the purchase cannot be postponed while you save up all or part of the cost.

Credit union loans are especially advantageous in this period of rising interest rates when banks and other lenders have increased their rates. The credit unions largely have held the line. Credit unions never charge more than 1 percent a month (12 percent a year). They usually include life insurance, and many charge less. Typical credit-union fees are approximately half those charged by the credit-card plans—a true rate of a little over 9 percent a year compared to 18 percent.

You also should read the small print in the agreement or contract you must sign for one of the new retail credit cards, to see what extra fees you may be liable for. Some plans state in the agreement that if any amount due and payable is referred for collection to an attorney, you agree to pay an attorney's fee of 20 percent.

Another low-cost way to borrow in this time of rising interest rates is on your life insurance, if it is the kind that has cash value. Most policies issued after 1939 state that you can borrow at 5 percent (4 percent on V.A. policies.) This is a true 5 percent per annum. Even though interest rates on loans generally have risen, the insurance companies can't increase the loan rate stated in your policy. That's a contract. This time it works in your favor.

Diplomatic Approach May Get That Recipe, or Maybe It Won't

By Jane Goodsell

NOW THAT it has been decided that a gentleman should offer a cigarillo to a lady, we needn't fret about that any longer and can press on to another urgent etiquette problem: Should a lady ask another lady for a recipe? This question is so fraught with ifs, buts and perhapses that it's not possible to give a hard and fast answer.

If the recipe belongs to your mother, your grandfather or your Aunt Minnie, you have every right to ask for it. Any member of a clan has a legitimate claim to the recipes of her kinfolk, and Aunt Minnie has no business pursing her lips and pretending she didn't hear when one of her blood relations requests her recipe for hot milk sponge cake.

If you go to your mother-in-law's for dinner, it is not only permissible to ask for her recipes but somewhat churlish not to. Whether you want them or you don't. Pineapple-upside-down ham loaf may not be your idea of haut cuisine, but asking for the recipe is a nice way to promote a congenial relationship.

And, incidentally, don't assume that having made the gesture, you can toss out the recipe. Chances are your husband thinks ham loaf is peachy keen.

I'M AFRAID there is no clearcut, definitive answer to the recipe problem, but there is a way (a slow, circuitous way) to skirt around it.

You gush. "This is the most delicious chicken I've ever tasted!" You insinuate. "What do you call it?" "Do I detect a touch of rosemary in the sauce?" "I'm sure it must be terribly difficult to make." You appeal to your hostess' sympathies. "I'd give anything to cook as imaginatively as you do. All my recipes are so dull."

Even if you can't deliver these lines like Julie Harris, your hostess will get the message. If she wants to, that is. If she doesn't pick up her cue and offer you the recipe, you must accept defeat gracefully and subside.

It isn't fair to force a lady to choose between losing her recipes to keep her friends and losing her friends by keeping her recipes.

A FORMER OFFICER of a Machinists lodge in Nashville, Tenn., George W. Sabo, was sworn in as deputy administrator of the U.S. Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training by the administrator, Hugh Murphy, a bricklayer by trade. A delegation of union well-wishers was led by IAM Vice Pres. Ross Matthews (right) while management was represented by Henry H. Brodeur (left), of the American Trucking Associations.

Buying Plans Unchanged:

Rising Prices Stir Consumer Worries

ANN ARBOR—American consumers have become much less optimistic since the first of this year. The latest survey conducted by the University of Michigan Survey Research Center in August reveals that widespread awareness of rising prices and high interest rates has caused many people to doubt whether prosperity will continue.

Consumer intentions to make major purchases, however, remain almost unchanged from a year ago.

With the economy in its sixth year of expansion, the proportion of families reporting income increases remained very high in August, the report states.

At the same time the survey revealed a decline in the proportion of people who feel they are better off financially than a year ago, and an increase in the proportion saying they are worse off, primarily because of inflation.

People's expectations about their personal financial situation a year from now have become less favorable.

The deterioration in people's notions about the business outlook is somewhat more pronounced than that with respect to their own finances, the report states. A majority continue to believe that times will be good during the next 12 months, but more people than earlier this year now foresee bad times.

A recession was thought "likely to happen again" by 32 percent of all families as against 20 percent a year ago. Yet relatively few people believed in August that one would come soon.

PRICE INCREASES, past and expected, are now the consumer's greatest worry. Nine out of 10 people expect prices to go up during the coming year, and more than one-third expect increases of more than 5 percent in 12 months. Nearly two-thirds of all consumers know about the increase in interest rates, and a majority of this group believes that tight money and higher interest rates have an adverse effect on business. The survey showed that these opinions have greatly contributed to the worsening in consumer sentiment.

Since late in 1965, a majority of consumers have believed that the war in Viet Nam has a favorable influence on domestic business. But a further increase in the cost of the war is viewed as having an adverse influence by a majority of those with an opinion.

"The proportion of families expressing an intention to buy a car or a large household appliance remained almost unchanged against a year ago, although an increasing proportion says that now is a bad time to buy these items," the report states. "They believe this because of high prices as well as tight money and high interest rates.

"On the other hand, there has been a considerable increase in the proportion of people believing that the prospect of rising prices is an argument for buying durables now. . . . Many consumers continue to enjoy income increases and think that there is no point in waiting, because later on the buyer will face still higher prices."

To Determine Impact:

Building Trades Set Prefabrication Study

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. has contracted for a comprehensive research program covering the impact of prefabrication on the construction industry and the course it is likely to take in the future.

The study, to be conducted by the Battelle Memorial Institute, was authorized by the departmental convention in December and is expected to take about nine months, BCTD Pres. C. J. Haggerty said.

It will seek answers to questions raised by the continuing growth and use of prefabrication within the industry and the resulting effect on members of the 18 international unions affiliated with the department. It will also attempt to point toward solutions to problems that have followed, Haggerty said.

Much work previously done on the job site is now being done in factories and has produced a number of new concepts, one of which, he pointed out, is whether a readjustment of skills requires new union training programs.

Basis for Survey

"A main basis for the survey," Haggerty said, "is that no one ever has had basic information concerning the entire scope of prefabrication. Without such facts, obviously, proper courses of action cannot be planned."

The objective of the study will be to identify the types and estimate the amount of construction work that may be shifted from job site to factory or changed otherwise in character because of prefabrication, Haggerty emphasized. It also will examine the effects of other technical innovations, not necessarily involving prefabrication, that might change the disposition of workers and skills at the job site.

Materials, products, techniques, equipment, design concepts or any combination of these elements will be examined where they have influenced, or may be expected to influence, the allocation of manpower in the "residential, non-residential and non-building segments of the construction industry through 1975," the department said.

Most of the study will be conducted in the United States but the situation in Europe will be scrutinized — particularly current prefabrication practices or expected trends which could be transferred to this country.

Field interviews with contractors, home builders, manufacturers, architects and trade association executives are expected to develop much of the data necessary for the survey, Haggerty said.

Information also will be sought in interviews with consultants and authorities in universities, technical societies and government agencies, he added.

The Battelle Memorial Institute, with headquarters in Columbus, O., is the largest privately-operated research organization in the world.

It has laboratories in Columbus, Geneva, Switzerland; Frankfurt, Germany, and Richland, Wash., and is staffed by more than 5,600 scientists, engineers, economists and supporting personnel with international experience in science, technology and economics.

Pilot Project Seeks to Upgrade Construction Skills of Laborers

Santa Rosa, Calif.—A job training program to upgrade the skills of construction laborers has been initiated by the Northern California District Council of Laborers and has proved so successful in its first few weeks that the international union is acting to make it a national project.

The pilot project, financed with a total grant of $721,758 under the Manpower Development & Training Act, is being carried out at the 400-acre Marine Cooks & Stewards Training School here.

It calls for nine six-week sessions during each of which some 60 union members will receive instruction in the more skilled work laborers do in the construction industry. They are nominated by the executive boards of the 21 locals in 46 Northern California counties and finally selected by the district council.

In outlining the program, Vice Pres. Terence J. O'Sullivan, who was instrumental in developing it, said the instruction would include, but not be limited to, pipe laying, drilling, use of explosives, equipment operation and care, concrete placement, and excavation and compaction principles.

Union spokesmen pointed out that construction laborers are called upon to perform a wide variety of tasks, and that the broader a man's range of skills, the better are his chances both for getting jobs and for keeping them longer. In some locals, it was said, jobless unskilled members may outnumber idle skilled workers by as much as 80-to-1 at the height of employment.

Welcomed by Employers

Employers under contract with the union have heartily endorsed the program, pointing out that the availability of laborers with a broad range of skills will cut down manpower turnover, make the workers more productive, avert delays on the job and lower construction costs.

Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi of the international union called the training the union's "most significant program in 20 years."

Based on the successful experience so far of the pilot project here, the Laborers are seeking additional federal grants to expand the training in other parts of the country.

The trainees, under the MDTA, receive a minimum of $46 a week while at the school, plus $5 a week for each dependent up to six. If the applicant is eligible for more than $46 in unemployment compensation benefits, he will receive the difference.

A $5 a day subsistence allowance also is provided, with the Marine Cooks & Stewards getting $4 of it for food costs.

Field instruction is given by six experienced construction laborers, each of whom supervises 10 trainees. The administration is in the hands of a liaison director, liaison administrator, training facility administrator, a safety instructor who doubles as a field clerk, and a tool and maintenance man.

The first class started training on Aug. 1. Gov. Edmund (Pat) Brown (D) officially opened the site at subsequent exercises attended by representatives of each Northern California local.

The project is in the nature of a bonus for the Marine Cooks & Stewards, whose own trainees are gaining experience by serving the Laborers' contingent.

Kerner Pledges Drive For Illinois Labor Goals

Chicago—Major legislative goals of the Illinois State AFL-CIO—collective bargaining for public employes, a state minimum wage law and freedom of residence—received a big boost from Gov. Otto Kerner as he urged election of a Democratic legislature on Nov. 8.

Addressing 2,500 delegates to the 9th annual Illinois State AFL-CIO convention, Kerner said gains for working people can come only after the voters tear apart the "iron curtain" to progress drawn around the State Senate by the Republican Party.

He reminded the delegates that all labor supported bills passed the House, where the Democrats hold the majority, but were killed in the GOP-controlled Senate. In a preview of his program for the 1967 General Assembly, Kerner urged:

- A state minimum wage to "end vicious economic injustice done to workers not protected by the federal law." He said he will ask for legislation to bring Illinois in line with the improvements in the Fair Labor Standards Act just signed by Pres. Johnson.
- A "freedom of residence" law to ban bias in the sale and rental of homes, with adequate provisions for enforcement. Kerner also called for measures to strengthen the Illinois Fair Employment Practices Commission.
- A program to wipe out areas of blight and misery in the slums and ghettoes of the state's urban areas.
- Legislative approval of recommendations to come from a special Labor-Management Commission on Collective Bargaining for Public Employes.

The governor urged the re-election of Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D) for the good of the nation as well as the working men and women of Illinois. Douglas was urged to run for re-election by the Illinois AFL-CIO last year and has been endorsed by state and local COPE units, railway unions and other labor groups.

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph D. Keenan warned against apathy in the coming weeks. Keenan stressed that labor's opponents are using a subtle approach this year instead of frontal attacks on progressive programs.

Resolutions Adopted

After adopting a series of resolutions on collective bargaining for public employes, the convention approved a statement making the issue a major area of concern in endorsing candidates in the future. A similar stand was taken on freedom of residence. These two items were included in the review of voting records that led to support for candidates in the November elections.

Delegates called for a state basic wage of at least $1.50 an hour, a ban on the importation of strikebreakers and an end to federal guidelines on wage increases.

Clarence Meter Named To NLRB Regional Post

Minneapolis, Minn. — Clarence A. Meter will be promoted from regional attorney to regional director of the National Labor Relations Board office here, succeeding C. Edward Knapp, retired. Meter has been an NLRB aide since 1942.

North Dakota Delegates Stress Legislative Aims

Jamestown, N.D.—The North Dakota AFL-CIO concluded a three-day convention here by endorsing state and federal candidates at a COPE conference and setting new goals for improved state legislation.

More than 150 delegates to the 9th annual convention voted to support Rep. Rolland Redlin (D) in the western district and State Rep. S. F. Hoffner (D) for the eastern district seat held by Rep. Mark Andrews (R).

The convention also backed Bronald Thompson, Democratic endorsee, for state public service commissioner and Earl Anderson, member of the Transportation-Communication Employes, for the newly created post of state labor commissioner.

A state legislative program drafted by committees and endorsed by delegates urged a prevailing wage rate for state contract work, bargaining rights for state employes, improvements in the workmen's compensation law, released time for voting, a state chauffeur's license law, and a statutory minimum wage incorporated in the present minimum wage board legislation.

Constitutional changes included dropping the words "Federation of Labor" from the central body's name, making it the North Dakota AFL-CIO; and adding a fifth vice presidential district to the state body.

The delegates authorized a labor education program featuring week-long institutes, called for the affiliation of all eligible labor organizations with the state federation, and retained Pres. Wallace J. Dockter and Sec.-Treas. Robert A. Donegan for new terms. Donegan recently was named to succeed Donald Hertz.

Pres. Ed Smith of the North Dakota Farmers Union, addressing the convention, said farmers and workers should improve their communications with each other "so farmers will know the real labor cost of a tractor and workers know the real farm cost of a loaf of bread."

'Work' Repeal Urged

State AFL-CIO Pres. Emeritus William W. Murrey urged a continuing drive for repeal of the state's "right to work" law, saying "we can live with it but we can live better without it." The law, he said, forces unions to provide costly services for non-members but prohibits them from negotiating union shop contracts.

Other speakers included Stuart Brock of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, Lieut. Gov. Charles Tighe, Pres. Clifford W. Shrader of the South Dakota AFL-CIO, Executive Dir. Marcella Beatty of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Carl Winn, Mrs. Margaret Thornburgh, western area director for the COPE Women's Activities Dept., and Jack E. McCoy, area COPE director.

Key House Vote on Anti-Poverty Bill

House Republicans sought to scrap the Administration's anti-poverty program and substitute a stripped-down version which they dubbed "Opportunity Crusade." The GOP plan would have carved up Sargent Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity and scattered the pieces of the program among old-line agencies. The House rejected this substitute, 203-162. Voting against the dismemberment of OEO were 198 Democrats and five Republicans. Voting for the GOP substitute were 115 Republicans and 47 Democrats.

On labor's scoreboard, a vote against the substitution was a right vote (R), while a vote for the subsitute was wrong (W). Other symbols: A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong. Numerals indicate districts; AL—at large.

Adjournment Hopes Buoyed:

Congress Moving On Pile-Up of Bills

jections having been met, it passed by a 300-8 vote.

Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W. Va.) of the House Commerce Committee defended it as the best that his sharply-divided committee could agree on, but acknowledged that if housewives had written the bill "I am sure it would be about 10 times as strong as it is."

Rep. Leonor K. Sullivan (D-Mo.), a supporter of effective consumer protection, told the House: "Naturally I will vote for it, but I can hardly say that it gives me any strong feeling of striking a blow for the consumer."

And Rep. Samuel L. Devine (R-O.), an opponent of the original truth-in-packaging bill, told the House that he, too, could support the committee bill because, he was "happy" to confirm, "it does practically nothing."

The next move is up to the Senate which can either firmly insist on its version in a conference committee or go along with the House measure.

The Senate decisively rejected—by two-to-one margins—repeated efforts by Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen to chop the school aid bill closer to the budget figure.

As the House moved toward final passage, Republicans prepared to make a final move to slash the money authorization, but a series of preliminary votes indicated the attempt would fail.

Much of the House debate centered on civil rights issues. Southerners drew support from a scattering of northern Democrats as well as Republicans in an attack on school desegregation guidelines. After a sharp debate, the House adopted an amendment which would bar withholding of funds from school districts which do not meet federal desegregation standards until after a full hearing on the complaint.

Both the House and Senate bills continue—in fact expand—the program of federal aid to "impacted" schools in communities where there are many servicemen or government workers. Johnson had sought to curtail the program.

The Senate bill would expand the formula for determining the number of children from poor families within a school district, which is used as the basis for federal grants. Under present law, the poverty level for school aid purposes is a family income under $2,000 a year. The Senate bill would raise that figure to $2,500 this year. Both the House and Senate bills contain the Administration proposal to raise the level for grants to $3,000 in the next fiscal year.

The "economy bloc" was more successful on the poverty bill.

Senate Republicans set themselves up as champions of Pres. Johnson's expressed desire to keep spending to the Administration's budget estimates and led a successful drive to whack the poverty bill down to size.

The House on Sept. 29 approved a $1.75 billion authorization for the poverty war, the amount sought by the President. The Senate Labor Committee, however brought to the floor a $2.5 billion measure. Sen. Joseph S. Clark (D-Pa.), floor manager of the bill, defended the added money as necessary to break up the cycle of poverty perpetuating poverty. It is more important, he suggested, than such projects as development of supersonic planes for the aviation industry.

Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield, who with Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen had met with Johnson at the White House the day before, proposed a compromise cut to $2.1 billion. But before that could come to a vote, Dirksen won 45-27 approval of a substitute amendment chopping the bill down to the House-passed level.

A Senate-House conference will work on the allocation of the money among such anti-poverty programs as Project Head Start, community action projects, the Job Corps and the Neighborhood Youth Corps.

The so-called civil rights "backlash" cropped up again in the Senate debate as the Senate voted 38-32 approval of an "anti-riot" amendment to the poverty bill. This would deny money or assistance to anyone who "incites, promotes, encourages or carries on a riot." A similar provision had been added to the House bill.

In other developments:

- The House approved a scaled-down version of a Senate bill to expand federal aid to localities for construction of sewage treatment plants—a major factor in combatting water pollution. The House voted $2.3 billion over a four-year period; the Senate-passed bill would have provided $6 billion over six years. The present spending level is $150 million a year.
- A four-year extension of the school milk program and the start of a new pilot program to provide in-school breakfasts for needy children was cleared for the President's signature.
- The Senate Finance Committee tacked a series of unrelated amendments to a House-passed measure dealing with taxation of foreigners, but their eventual fate remained uncertain. One amendment, by Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D-La.), would set up a government fund to pay the cost of presidential election campaigns by earmarking $1 from each individual's tax payment—if he agrees. Major parties would receive an equal amount to cover all presidential campaign expenses. Minor parties would be entitled to $1 for each vote above 1.5 million in the last presidential election. Another amendment, by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), would expand medicare to pay prescription drug costs of persons over 65.
- The Senate voted 52-22 approval of a $2.94 billion foreign aid appropriations bill—about $500 million below the amount sought by the Administration and $110 million less than the amount recommended by its Appropriation Committee. The House voted about $100 million more but House conferees accepted the Senate amount. The foreign aid total is the lowest since 1957.

Unionists' Papers To Be Preserved

Chicago—The Chicago Historical Society has been given the papers of two labor leaders—John Fitzpatrick, president of the former Chicago AFL from 1904 to 1946, and Victor Orlander, secretary-treasurer of the former Illinois AFL from 1914 to 1949.

The papers include about 50,000 items, chiefly dating from 1910 to 1935, and will be valuable, the society said "in documenting organized labor's many contributions towards improved working, living, social, educational and political conditions within the community and the nation."

Irwin Klass, editor of the Federation News, organ of the Chicago AFL-CIO, was instrumental in making the records available.

PROBLEMS CONFRONTING the Deep South were discussed at the 1966 Gulf Coast Labor School, sponsored by the Southern Labor School and held in Mobile, Ala. # No-Loophole Version Of Tax Bill Pressed siphoning money out of homebuilding, home buying, consumer and small business markets. Mortgage funds are drying up and available funds for small business loans are becoming scarce, even at high and rising interest rates."

Calling for a halt to the "gravy train" on which business and industry have been riding to the detriment of the overall economy, Goldfinger said removal of "these special tax subsidies" would result in postponement of some expansion plans "into the future, when they will be needed."

Exemptions Hit

He criticized the "sweeteners" added by the House to lessen opposition to the bill. On suspension of the investment tax credit, these include exemption of the first $15,000 of any capital goods expenditure—a revenue loss of some $350 million. And despite the good intention in exclusion of funds spent for water and air pollution control from the tax credit suspension, it sets a precedent for other exemptions, Goldfinger argued.

The House passed the bill, 221-118, on Sept. 30, with most Republicans opposing any raise in business taxes.

The AFL-CIO's chief economist also objected to the House "compromise" on the depreciation schedule—reducing the annual rate only to 3 percent instead of the 2 percent figure sought by the President. And changes in the "carry forward" provision for unused tax credits permanently widen an existing tax loophole, he warned. Its effect will be "simply siphoning some $200 million a year out of the public purse into the corporate profit pocket."

A slowdown of industry expansion may well result in some curtailment of overtime in some areas and postponement of some new construction, Goldfinger acknowledged. But he stressed that "in this area, as in every other area, we believe in putting the greater good of the greater number of people ahead of the private interests of the few."

The increased living costs, he said, have taken place despite "the remarkable stability of unit labor costs of manufactured goods." It is "widening profit margins" and "skyrocketing" volume of business profits which "are contributing now to a general psychology of price boosts," he declared.

The AFL-CIO view, Goldfinger said, is that the President's proposal to suspend the 7 percent tax credit and the accelerated depreciation formula will eliminate the "superheat from the only spot where the economy is now overheated."

Jobless Pay Upheld For Rail Firemen

San Francisco — U.S. District Judge W. T. Sweigert has reaffirmed a previous ruling upholding a Railroad Retirement Board award of both severance pay and unemployment insurance to 500 locomotive firemen who lost their jobs under a 1965 special emergency board

The court dismissed with prejudice a suit brought by the Western Pacific and Southern Pacific on behalf of 775 U.S. railroads.

Job Guarantee Major Goal in Oil Bargaining

Denver, Colo.—Guaranteed employment for every regular and permanent employe until he retires on an adequate pension has been set by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers as the major goal in coming negotiations.

The union is in the process of serving contract termination notices on nearly 400 employers, large and small, in its quest for job security and wage increases.

Most of the agreements expire Dec. 31. Sixty-day notices are required in most cases, but 90 days is required in a few.

In addition to the proposed job security clause, the union is seeking increases of 18 cents an hour on Jan. 1, 1967, and again on Jan. 1, 1968. Six cents of the first year's boost would be earmarked for hospitalization and medical insurance—in most cases to reduce the worker's contribution—and the remainder would be in wage increases.

The OCAW also seeks to eliminate basic inequities that developed out of negotiations in 1964 by adding to contracts optional retirement on pension at any time after age 62 with no actuarial reduction in the benefits payable at the normal retirement age of 65.

About 60,000 members of the union, most of them refinery workers, are covered by the agreements being terminated.

AALC Seminar Told:

Africa's Future Tied To Freedom, Growth

New York—The purely economic development of Africa is of no real worth to that continent's emerging nations and their people unless it is based on concern for human freedom and dignity, speakers agreed at a seminar co-sponsored by the African-American Labor Center and the Hunter College Dept. of Economics.

The session was supposed to concern itself with "Problems and Prospects of African Economic Development," but the participants consistently reverted to people.

Irving Brown, director of the labor center, which was founded two years ago by the AFL-CIO to help in African trade union development, stressed that advances must be measured in human terms.

The problem of Africa, he said, is not only to develop economically but also to create viable social and political structures that will contribute to the freedom and growth of each citizen. The development of democratic institutions is essential, he added, if economic growth is to be meaningful.

Trade unionists, political leaders and other men of action, Brown declared, must be optimists—despite the enormity of the problems that still exist—in order to tackle and solve the difficulties that face an independent Africa.

Theme Emphasized

The same general theme was emphasized by Dr. K. A. Busia, vice chairman of the Political Committee of Ghana's National Liberation Council and a long-time leader of the opposition to the former Nkrumah regime.

The goal of development, he said, must always be to help each individual to "be the best that he can be to give the best that he can give to the community." Unions must be permitted to develop freely because it is the man, not production, which is the final aim, he declared. Without freedom, he added, economic progress serves no human purpose and is valueless.

Paul Barton, chief for economic and social affairs in the United Nations office of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, discussed the increasing number of international bodies engaged in development activities in Africa and observed that while their work was of "substantial value," most African countries are unable to make full use of existing resources because their social systems are not designed for modern life.

The free world labor movement's most productive role in Africa, he maintained, lies in persuading the government and industries of their nations to take a more positive role in helping African development.

Judging progress in strictly economic terms disregards the fact that channels of development must be maintained that will permit Africans to progress as Africans, United Nations Under Sec. Gabriel d'Arboussier said.

Prof. Immanuel Wallerstein of Columbia University, calling himself a "cautious pessimist" regarding African economic growth, said the basic reasons for limited prospects were political fragility, the absence of national economies, and problems resulting from the rapid growth of cities and the concentration of partially-educated young people in them.

Other speakers included F. S. Arkhurst, ambassador of Ghana to the UN, and Charles Delgado, first secretary for economic affairs of the Senegalese mission to the UN. Prof. Nathan Reich of Hunter College was moderator.

PANEL DISCUSSION on social and political forces at work in Africa during a seminar on African economic growth held in New York was addressed by (L. to R.) Prof. Immanuel Wallerstein of Columbia University; F. S. Arkhurst, ambassador of Ghana to the United Nations, and Irving Brown, executive director of the AFL-CIO-sponsored African-American Labor Center. At right is Prof. Nathan Reich of Hunter College, the moderator.

Medical Care Planning Urged to Aid All Citizens

White Sulphur Springs, W.Va.—A system "that insures every American of fully-adequate, high-quality medical care at a price he can readily afford to pay" was urged by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler in a speech at the Federal Wholesale Druggists convention here.

He called medicare "one piece" in an expanding system of protections that also includes union-negotiated health and welfare plans, the "growing network" of pre-payment group practice plans, and the contributions of the voluntary agencies in community chests and united funds, for which union members are the largest single source of support.

"I cite this to emphasize that union members are willing to pay their share," Schnitzler said.

"They pay voluntarily to the private welfare agencies. They pay taxes that directly and indirectly support government health programs. They pay their share of social security taxes.

"And they also pay, in the true sense, for the insurance plans they negotiate with employers, for the cost of these plans is generally acknowledged to be part of wages which workers would otherwise receive in cash.

"Out of all these pieces—and undoubtedly some new ones—a complete, all-embracing medical care structure will be built. We in the AFL-CIO will not settle for anything less."

Schnitzler added that the cost of drugs should be covered by medicare and other health care programs because it often amounts to "a very substantial part of the total bill for a serious illness where no surgery is involved."

"But all these pieces, plus any new ones that may be proposed, do not add up to 'socialized medicine' by my definition," he declared.

Medics' Aid Sought

"They do not attack the freedom of medical practice, or freedom of choice by the patient, or the doctor-patient relationship.

"I hope against hope that the medical profession will join in helping to create the kind of medical structure this country needs. If they took this course, the ultimate could be reached more quickly, with less rancor, and with the assurance of fairness to all."

Schnitzler predicted that unions will take steps to seek increased benefits for their retired members now that medicare is on the statute books. The first moves, he said, will be to get employers to pay the $3 monthly charge for Part B of medicare, covering doctors' bills, and to negotiate coverage of the deductibles.

Unions Back Civil Service 'Privacy' Bill

Legislation to protect federal employes against bureaucratic invasion of their privacy and to curb the use of so-called lie detectors and psychological tests was strongly supported by the AFL-CIO Government Employes Council at a Senate hearing.

John A. McCart, director of the 32-union council, said the overall effect of a number of "well-intentioned" federal personnel policies adds up to "a serious intrusion by government into the personal and private lives of its citizen-employes."

McCart endorsed the "privacy" bill introduced by Chairman Sam J. Ervin (D-N.C.) of the Senate's Constitutional Rights subcommittee and co-sponsored by 34 other senators. He particularly backed proposed rigid controls on the use of polygraph tests by federal agencies and on the use of "humiliating" psychological questionnaires.

The federal government, McCart said, should follow the lead of the six states which have banned polygraph tests in employment.

Requiring employes to fill out questionnaires covering a subject range from sex to religion to literary tastes is an indignity that tramples on "the rights of individual federal workers," McCart declared.

Overzealous administration of well-intentioned policies dealing with voluntary charitable contributions, conflicts of interest and racial surveys of employment also have resulted in abuses, McCart charged.

Fulbright Grants Open to Unionists

Union members interested in doing research connected with either Ruskin College or the London School for Economics, both in England, are invited to apply for senior Fulbright fellowships.

The rules permit considerable flexibility as to the kind of project which can be submitted and for the time, which may be as short as three months or as long as nine months. Application papers may be had from Dr. Francis A. Young, Conference Board of Associated Research Councils, Committee on Intl. Exchange of Persons, 2101 Constitution Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C. 20418. The deadline for applying is Oct. 15.

AFT Council Endorses Candidates in Election

Chicago—The executive council of the American Federation of Teachers, breaking with precedent, voted here to endorse selected congressional candidates and called on teachers everywhere to join AFT members in working actively for their election in November.

Council members headed by AFT Pres. Charles Cogen announced support for Senators Paul Douglas (D-Ill.), Clifford Case (R-N.J.) and Lee Metcalf (D-Mont.); former Michigan Gov. G. Mennen Williams, Democratic nominee for the seat of the late Sen. Pat McNamara (D-Mich.), and a COPE-endorsed list of 59 freshman congressmen.

"The teachers and the schools," Cogen said, "have an especially important stake in this fall's elections. If we are to increase the American commitment to education and to the elimination of slums and other adverse educational influences, we must help elect congressmen and senators who are committed to increased federal aid to education and a wide range of social legislation."

He noted that "millions of American children are now effectively denied equality of educational opportunity because of oversized classes, a shortage of qualified teachers, lack of remedial and guidance services and hopeless living conditions."

Cogen said these problems cannot be solved solely through state and local action and "even greater federal assistance will be needed."

The present Congress, he said, has "passed more good education legislation and has done more to alleviate the evils of poverty than any Congress in our history." Yet many newer legislators, he pointed out, are "under strong attack by right-wing political forces" supporting candidates who oppose any extension of federal aid to education and the "war on poverty."

Although this is the first time the AFT has endorsed candidates for public office, Cogen said "the issues are so clear and their importance to American education so great that we cannot in good conscience sit this one out." He added:

"We urge teachers everywhere, whether union members or not, to join in this action."

The council voted to send a message of support to Harold Howe II, U.S. commissioner of education, for his "courageous defense of federal guidelines for school desegregation" and thank-you telegrams to Rep. William F. Ryan (D-N.Y.) and Ray J. Madden (D-Ind.) for their defense of Howe against what the AFT called a "shameful" verbal attack by Rep. L. Mendel Rivers (D-S.C.).

President Sets UNESCO Day, Urges Support

Pres. Johnson in a proclamation called on all Americans to observe the 20th anniversary of the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization (UNESCO) on Nov. 4 with "appropriate ceremonies and manifestations of support."

"Our government was active in the founding of UNESCO," he said. "It has continued to support the organization in its effort to create a climate in the world in which a just peace may prevail."

"UNESCO has a critical role to play in bringing the educational techniques of the developed world to the emerging nations of man's family. Its mission should embrace the simplest teaching, and the most sophisticated arts and sciences of which our species is capable."

Support for UNESCO is coordinated in this country by the U.S. National Commission for UNESCO, on which the AFL-CIO is represented by Henry Kirsch of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Glass & Ceramic Union Wins Vote in Alabama

Sheffield, Ala.—Workers at the previously unorganized plant of the King Stove Co. voted after a 45-day campaign to join the Glass & Ceramic Workers. The National Labor Relations Board tally was 127 for the union, 62 against.

UG&CW Dir. of Organizing Enoch R. Rust reported that 100 white and Negro employes made history locally by eating together at a pre-election dinner.

Government, Unions Assail GE for Stalling Bargaining

Key Votes Spur Drive To Adjourn

By David L. Perlman

A $4.4 billion, three-year expansion of federal aid to colleges and college students sailed through the Senate on a voice vote —the second big education bill passed in less than a week.

A Republican-led economy bloc, soundly trounced a few days earlier in its effort to slash the elementary and high school aid bill back to budget levels, was silent during the brief debate on the college aid measure. The Senate bill authorized $1.5 billion more than the college aid voted by the House last May, and its first-year spending authority was nearly double the President's budget figure.

Despite the big difference in amounts, House and Senate conferees do not anticipate major difficulties in reconciling the two measures.

In other major actions as Congress speeded towards an Oct. 22 adjournment target:

- A last-ditch effort to revive a home rule bill for the District of Columbia died in the Senate under the threat of a southern filibuster.
- The Senate Finance Committee cleared the President's anti-inflation tax bill, but added new loopholes to those already inserted by the House.
- The House moved towards passage of an Indiana Dunes bill, long sought by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.). It would salvage for recreational use a broad expanse of Lake Michigan sand dunes within

Restate Rights Goals:

Top Negro Leaders Denounce Rioting

A declaration of principle urging renewed support of the civil rights movement by the white majority of Americans has been issued by a group of Negro leaders.

Events have piled "confusion and uncertainty" on "underlying racial prejudices" in the majority and "intensified resistance to change" has developed "when the need for change is greatest," the declaration said.

"We are committed to the attainment of racial justice by the democratic process," the statement declared.

"We repudiate any strategies of violence, reprisal or vigilantism, and we condemn both rioting and the demagoguery that feeds it."

The statement was signed by A. Philip Randolph, vice president of the AFL-CIO and president of the Sleeping Car Porters; Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People; Whitney Young, executive director of the National Urban League; and Bayard Rustin, director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Other signatories included Mrs. Dorothy I. Height, president of the National Council of Negro Women; Amos Hall, president of the Council of Grand Masters of the Prince Hall Masons; and Pres. Hobson Reynolds of the Improved Benevolent & Protective Order of Elks.

The statement was issued, the signers said, because it is "imperative" that the principles of the civil rights movement be made "crystal clear to Americans of every origin and of every degree of commitment to justice."

Ninety years ago, they reminded both citizens and political leaders, "the democratic promise of emancipation" was allowed to "wither and die before a rampant reaction." Yet the "race problem" remains and "today we are paying for yesterday's default."

"We are determined that this history shall not repeat itself," they said, "we call upon all our countrymen, black and white, of all faiths

115,000 Set To Strike On Oct. 17

By Eugene A. Kelly

Unions representing 115,000 workers challenged General Electric to drop its refusal to bargain and its "contemptuous defiance" of Pres. Johnson's representatives in a final effort to reach contract agreement before an Oct. 17 strike deadline.

The nation's defense needs and the interest of all the communities with GE plants require an immediate settlement, leaders of a coalition of 11 AFL-CIO unions said after Commerce Sec. John T. Connor accused GE of not responding to the President's efforts to get an agreement.

Settlement could be "obtained within an hour" if the company would "drop its refusal to bargain and meet the unions half-way," the AFL-CIO committee said, adding: "We intend to continue our cooperation with the President's panel. But if that fails, the bargaining units we represent will be on strike" at 12:01 a.m. Oct. 17.

As the deadline approached, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany convened a special meeting Oct. 14 of the federation's National Committee on Collective Bargaining with GE and Westinghouse to work out plans for the full support of the entire labor movement "in the event that GE forces its workers to strike."

GE met face-to-face with the 11-union committee on Oct. 12 for the first time in nine days and offered a cost-of-living formula that the unions called merely another "rearrangement" of previous offers in a fourth demonstration of the GE technique labor has called "take-it-or-leave-it bargaining."

Jobless Rate Drops, 3.8% in September

By Robert B. Cooney

The nation's unemployment rate edged down to 3.8 percent in September but government job experts apparently were giving up hope of reaching 3.5 percent by year's end.

The Labor Dept.'s monthly report showed the September job situation continuing strong for qualified and experienced workers and with substantial job gains for adult women.

An outstanding development revealed by the September figures was that teenagers, who found summer jobs in record numbers, were responding to appeals to return to school and stay in school.

About 3 million youngsters withdrew from the labor force to go back to school last month, the Labor Dept. said. Teenage employment in September totaled 6.6 million, seasonally adjusted, almost identical with the May total, the report noted.

The drop in teenage jobholders between August and September was about 500,000 more than expected. This indicated the back-to-school and stay-in-school movement must have been successful, said Arthur M. Ross, commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

A major problem remained intractable, with the Labor Dept. re-

Average Factory Pay $23 Under Family Need

The average factory worker with dependents is making $23 a week less than his family needs for a "modest but adequate" standard of living, the AFL-CIO has pointed out.

Updating the U.S. Dept. of Labor's well-known "City Worker's Family Budget," the AFL-CIO found that a breadwinner for a family of four requires an income of $131 a week or $6,797 a year.

Since the average factory worker in June 1966 earned $2.71 an hour or 56 cents an hour less than the $3.27 an hour needed for an adequate standard of living, it is apparent that substantial wage increases are needed, the federation said.

The updated budget is described in an article, "The Income Needs of the City Worker's Family," appearing in the October issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist. It was prepared by Ralph D. Scott, a research assistant in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

In concluding that a worker with a wife and two children needs at

ing organization of farm workers. Besides Meany, the committee includes AFL-CIO Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge, I. W. Abel, Ralph Helstein, and Paul Phillips.

The committee heard a report from AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher on current organizing campaigns of farm workers in California and Texas.

In the key California drive, Kircher said, contract negotiations have begun with the DiGiorgio Corp., where the UFWOC won an overwhelming representation election victory over the Teamsters in late August. The UFWOC is now seeking another election for workers at the giant King Ranch of DiGiorgio in Arvin, Calif.

Contracts have been signed with Schenley, Christian Brothers and the Novitiate Winery, Kircher reported.

The chances for an election at King Ranch dimmed considerably when the Teamsters refused to accept election recommendations from Gov. Brown's special farm labor election expert, Ronald Haughton, Kircher said.

The DiGiorgio Corp., which has worked closely with the Teamsters, Kircher noted, and has advocated Teamster membership for its farm workers, has taken the position that it will accept such recommendations only if both unions accept them. Such a position gives the Teamsters the power of veto.

After the Teamsters' refusal to accept the first recommendations, Haughton issued new recommendations, withdrawing the eligibility rule against which the Teamsters complained in hopes that this would encourage them to take part in the election.

Kircher said word was received Oct. 11 from the Teamsters that they would not accept the recommendations.

"It is apparent that the Teamsters know they cannot win and do not want to experience the same humiliating defeat that occurred at the DiGiorgio ranch in Buena Vista where, with the full support of the company and the Delano newspaper, they were still more than 200 votes short of beating the AFL-CIO Farm Workers," Kircher said.

Minnesota AFL-CIO Picks New Officers

Rochester, Minn.—The election of two new top officers and sweeping organizational changes highlighted the annual convention of the Minnesota AFL-CIO.

The 800 convention delegates also voted their endorsement of the winning candidates in the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party primary election Sept. 13, which had produced the most serious split in the DFL party since its formation in 1944.

Elected president of the federation was David Roe, executive secretary of the Minneapolis Building Trades Council and president of the state Building Trades Council. He succeeds Robert A. Olsen of Duluth, a member of the Motion Picture Operators, who had served as president since the merger in 1956 and prior to that as president of the Minnesota Federation of Labor since 1938.

Olsen was named to the newly-created post of president emeritus, an unpaid advisory position.

The delegates elected Leonard Lashomb of the Packinghouse Workers as executive vice president. He previously had served as the federation's COPE director.

Lashomb succeeds Robert Hess of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, who resigned to become administrative assistant to Rep. Joseph E. Karth, DFL congressman from Minnesota's 4th District and a former international representative for OCAW.

Neil Sherburne, secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO for the past ten years, was re-elected without opposition.

Duties Changed

Major organizational changes voted by the convention include placing the federation president in charge of all state organizing activities, an area formerly the responsibility of the executive vice president. The duties of the latter post were combined with that of COPE director.

The delegates also voted salary increases for the officers—the first in ten years—raising the president to $13,500 a year and the executive vice president and the secretary-treasurer to $13,200. The old salaries were $12,000 each.

On the political front, the emphasis was on restoring unity to the Minnesota DFL Party to repair the split that occurred when Lt. Gov. A. M. "Sandy" Keith became a candidate for the party nomination against Gov. Karl F. Rolvaag, who is seeking a second four-year term.

Keith won the party endorsement at the DFL state convention, but Rolvaag, with strong union support in most parts of the state, won the primary election by a sweeping majority. Most of the DFL party-endorsed candidates went down to defeat with Keith in the primary.

Heeding pleas of "unity" voiced at the COPE session of the convention, the delegates voted to back the victorious DFL primary candidates for state as well as congressional offices.

Speakers urging healing of the party breach and all-out labor political action in the November election were headed by Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey, Keith and spokesmen for the DFL congressional delegation.

Dues, Per Capita Increased:

Papermakers Vote To Bolster Funds

Cleveland—Delegates to the Papermakers and Paperworkers convention voted to bolster their union's treasury to mount new organizing campaigns and make up an operating deficit attributed to the cost of resisting repeated raids by the Teamsters.

The convention approved a dues and per capita increase recommended by the union's executive board. Minimum local dues will go from $3 to $4 a month and monthly per capita payments to the International will be raised from $2 to $2.75.

Delegates reaffirmed the union's long-standing endorsement of a merger of all unions in the graphic arts and paper industry. A special unity committee has been discussing merger with the Pulp-Sulphite & Paper Mill Workers, whose president, Joseph Tonelli, was a speaker at the convention.

The unity committee reported a number of details still to be worked out, but both Tonelli and UPP Pres. Paul L. Phillips spoke optimistically to the convention about the prospects for a merger agreement.

Phillips, who has headed the 145,000-member union since it was founded nine years ago by the merger of former AFL and CIO affiliates, was unanimously elected to a fourth term as president.

Also returned to office were Exec. Vice Pres. Harry D. Sayre; Sec.-Treas. Al E. Brown; George H. O'Bea, vice president at large, and J. S. Lambert, Canadian vice president.

One Major Contest

In the only national-level contest, Sayre defeated Patrick W. Harte, New York State regional director and vice president, 975-293.

Eleven vice presidents and regional directors were re-elected at district caucuses and Kenneth Hendershot of Hamilton, O., was elected to succeed Herbert G. Schwenker, who is retiring.

Re-elected vice presidents were: Frederick J. Rochford, Mark Fisher, Nicholas C. Vrataric, Joseph T. Hyrczyk, Oscar Robertson, John Stratton, Arnold Brown, William Franks, James Buchanan, Raymond Klescewski and Harte.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher, addressing the delegates, referred to the Teamster raids on the UPP and the "strikebreaking" role of the Teamsters in the California farm workers strike.

There are more than 30 million unorganized workers in the nation, Kircher noted, including large groups locked in poverty. He added:

"It doesn't make much sense that a union that is supposed to be as wealthy and big as the Teamsters should be spending its resources, its money and its manpower playing cannibalism against a union that is already organized."

New Approach

He stressed the need for a new approach to organizing young workers who, he said, show little interest in the struggles and victories of the trade union movement in the past.

"We must relate the union to their hopes, fears, desires and aspirations," he said. "They are worried about living costs, how to pay their mortgage and the things they buy on credit. They are worried about how they are going to educate their children. We must relate the union to these problems."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan stressed the importance of a massive political effort by labor in next month's elections.

Schnitzler urged the delegates to go back home and work hard for labor's friends and Barkan warned that labor's enemies "will be out in force" in the congressional campaign. If they should succeed in their union-busting goals, he warned, "you can hold your next convention in a telephone booth."

In this campaign, Barkan emphasized, "we have to show our members the real issues from the phony issues."

In major resolutions, the 1,100 delegates called for improved social security, higher unemployment compensation based on federal standards, an expanded program to organize the unorganized, and increased political effort to accomplish labor's goals including repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Upholsterers' A.G. McDowell Dies in Crash

Philadelphia — Arthur G. McDowell, 57, a widely-known staff member of the Upholsterers, died following an automobile accident on the Pennsylvania turnpike. He was on his way to a union meeting.

McDowell was the union's director of civics, education, government affairs and international labor relations. During his 20 years on the union staff, he had previously served as director of organization and administrative assistant to UIU Pres. Sal B. Hoffmann. He was a founder and executive secretary-treasurer of the Council Against Communist Aggression.

During the 1930's, McDowell was a leader in the Socialist Party, serving as trade union secretary and national chairman of the Young Peoples' Socialist League. He resigned from the party in 1940 in protest to its opposition to war aid to Britain and France. From 1941 to 1945, he was a regional director in St. Louis for the Textile Workers Union of America.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Janet Adler McDowell, two sons, two daughters and a brother.

New NLRB Actions Urged to Curb Employer's Campaign of Violence

A New York-based company waged such a campaign of violence against union organizers at its seven southern plants that a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner recommended that the board order a series of unusual remedies to help balance the scales for the union.

Examiner Paul E. Weil ruled that the Marlene Industries Corp., which has plants in Tennessee, Alabama and South Carolina, violated the National Labor Relations Act by "instigating, encouraging, causing and permitting employes" and supervisors to smash organizing attempts by the Ladies' Garment Workers in 1965.

The unlawful actions, Weil said, included smashing the headlights of union organizers' cars, kicking and banging car bodies, destroying a car radio aerial, seizing union pamphlets, squirting ink on ILGWU handbill crews and trying to run a union car off the road after chasing it out of town.

Marlene Industries makes women's clothing in plants at Frisco City, Ala., Aynor and Loris, S.C., and Decatursville, Hartsville and Westmoreland, Tenn. Company-incited mobs attacked organizers in Hartsville and Decatursville, and women employes organized by a woman supervisor squirted ink from water-pistols on union men and women at two Marlene plants in Loris, the examiner reported.

He listed numerous other law violations in management's anti-union campaign—firing 17 employes who signed union cards or attended union meetings; changing working conditions discriminatorily; spying on and photographing union supporters; threatening plant closings to thwart the union; enforcing unlawful rules against union membership soliciting or handbilling.

The examiner recommended that Marlene Industries be ordered to rehire the discharged workers with full backpay for time lost, and to stop interfering with the access of employes to union organizers during non-working time on plant approaches or parking lots.

Because so many employes live in outlying areas and are "insulated" from ordinary contact with union sources by unlawful management tactics, the examiner directed also, subject to board approval, that:

- Marlene Industries grant the union "reasonable access for a reasonable time" to its bulletin boards.
- The company make available to the union on request, at a mutually agreeable time within three months, suitable facilities for a one-hour meeting on company time at which union representatives may speak to the assembled employes.
- Management at its own expense publish the NLRB's official notice in newspapers in each plant community—the newspapers to be selected by the NLRB regional director and the notices to be published at least once in each of three consecutive weeks.

The examiner also directed that the firm instruct its employes, including supervisors, that "physical assault or threats of physical violence directed at any labor organization will not be permitted on plant premises at any time."

GE Assailed on Bargaining Stall As 115,000 Get Set to Strike

In another development, many of the same unions in bargaining for 75,000 Westinghouse workers rejected an offer paralleling GE's and won membership authorization to strike Oct. 15 if mediation fails.

In the GE dispute, the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and representatives of other AFL-CIO unions on its bargaining committee responded to Johnson's request Oct. 1 to extend their strike deadline two weeks and keep negotiating in the interest of defense production. The stalemated talks then moved from New York to Washington when the President assigned three of his cabinet members—Defense Sec. Robert S. McNamara, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Connor—to keep labor and management bargaining.

GE 'Suggests' T-H

A few days before the two-week extension was due to expire, GE representatives proposed that talks recess for a few days, resume later in New York and that, if necessary, the government apply for Taft-Hartley injunctions restraining strikes at any plant producing defense materials.

Connor told newsmen the GE proposal was "not responsive" to the President's efforts and that the cabinet committee had rejected it. He said "quite frankly we are disappointed."

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings called GE's proposal a "brutal and arrogant move" constituting a "do it yourself Taft-Hartley" law, made by GE for GE. Disagreeing with Connor's opinion that the offer was a "slight improvement" over previous GE offers, the IUE president said the firm was merely playing a "numbers" game.

"It's the same old game of playing with a slide rule," he declared. "They've reshifted money around but still want the employes to bear the major cost of inflation."

The unions coordinated their bargaining efforts this year, and in the face of a court challenge by GE, sent representatives of all affected unions to negotiations with each organization. GE's challenge was thwarted by federal courts and now is before the Supreme Court.

The steering committee of the 11-union coalition issued this statement shortly before GE "rearranged" its living-cost proposal:

"GE has contemptuously defied the representatives of the President and has arrogated to itself the functions of government. It now proposes to administer Taft-Hartley injunctions.

"We believe that any such injunction not only is unwarranted because it would constitute forced labor on the company's terms but also because the failure to reach an agreement lies at the door of GE."

Citing a series of GE newspaper advertisements, the committee said that "despite its advertised claims, the company has not improved its original offer by so much as a penny." In fact, it said, GE's "new" offers have been lower than the first. Summing up, it declared the last company "modification" would cost each worker an average of $23 over the life of the contract as compared with the first GE offer.

The first offer—called by the unions the "best of the lot"—was presented to GE workers in secret ballot votes conducted at every plant, with GE paying workers for the time spent and providing bus service as well: "Yet the offer was rejected by margins ranging from 2-1 to as high as 10 to 1."

"The workers have already expressed their opinions, loud and clear," the statement said.

"We do not accept the notion that the settlement of the issues be delayed for another 60 to 90 days" by a T-H injunction as GE proposed.

Union Ads

The union committee countered the GE advertising campaign with ads of its own in leading newspapers the week before the deadline, warning: "It's up to you, GE. If we don't get a really fair offer . . . we're going on strike next Monday."

Noting that the two-week extension asked by Johnson is nearly up, the unions said "the differences between GE and us are few but they are vital to the well-being of our members."

One is protection against the rising cost of living.

It would be a "desperate gamble," the ad related, for members to agree to a contract fixing wages for three years or more "without some sort of protection against runaway inflation."

GE keeps saying no, the unions observed, in spite of the fact that its profits after taxes have risen 100 percent in the last six years, and in spite of the fact that employe productivity is continuing to rise at nearly 7 percent a year.

Other objectives outlined in an eight-point counter-proposal approved by the AFL-CIO national committee were for an improved system of arbitrating grievances to avoid "needless" strikes, safeguards against subcontracting of unit work; elimination of geographic differentials, a 4 percent yearly wage increase starting at 7 cents an hour, and other benefits.

Besides the IUE, the unions in the AFL-CIO coalition are the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, the Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

BREATH SAMPLE blown into a plastic bag is the start of a series of health tests that 20,000 members of Retail Clerks Local 770 may take in the Los Angeles union's new "predictive medicine" program. The screening program, sponsored by the union and the Food, Drug & General Sales Employers benefit funds at up to $500,000 a year, is designed to improve job performance and cut absenteeism by helping find health problems before they become serious. # 6,000 Carbide Workers Press 3-Union Strike

More than 6,000 members of three AFL-CIO unions are on strike against giant Union Carbide Corp. at nine locations in disputes over contract terms.

A major issue, the unions said, is management's insistence that they accept unilateral changes in the Carbide pension plan despite the fact that pension provisions are not open for negotiation this year.

The unions are the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, with 1,200 members at Alloy, W.Va., 1,150 at Marietta, O., 425 at Whiting, Ind., 450 at Speedway City, Ind., and 100 at Hammond, Ind.; the Steelworkers, with 1,800 strikers at Kokomo, Ind., 800 at Ashtabula, O., and 100 at Portland, Ore.; and the Chemical Workers with 200 members at Sistersville, W.Va.

Another union of Carbide workers has a contract expiring Oct. 28 —Local 749 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at Fostoria, O.

Unity Seen Target

The company's main motive appears to be to destroy union cooperation, divide the workers and "win cheap labor agreements," said OCAW Vice Pres. E. D. Swisher.

Plant closedowns began July 2 when Carbide locked out the workers at Alloy after they refused the company's pension offer. It opened the gates at Alloy Sept. 26 and invited the workers to return without a contract, but members of OCAW Local 3-89 refused and voted to stay out in a formal strike.

Swisher accused management of giving an improved vacation plan to unorganized employes and refusing it to union workers unless they accept an "inadequate" pension plan that would tie the unions' hands for five years. All the unions involved also have unresolved local issues and inadequate wage offers, he said.

The unions are coordinating their strike efforts through the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Union Carbide, with a net worth of more than $1.3 billion, increased its net assets by 37 percent in 1965, and this year its net income was up more than 16 percent on an increase of 8 percent in sales, according to the unions.

Manpower Act Training Given Half a Million

Nearly half a million jobless or underemployed workers have taken institutional training in a wide variety of skills in the four years of the Manpower Development & Training Act, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz reported.

The figure was raised to 490,177 workers by training offered 159,800 workers during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1966. During the same period, Wirtz said, 2,832 new training projects were approved, raising the four-year total to 8,584.

Institutional training, the major phase of the MDTA national occupational training program, provides classroom instruction in public and private vocational educational facilities. The aim is to help the worker develop his skills and potentials to the fullest, and to this end it both instructs the unemployed worker in new skills and gives the underemployed the chance to upgrade his skills.

About 90 percent of those who have received instruction were jobless when they started. Some 88 percent of all those who completed institutional training found jobs.

In 1966, approved training costs were $126 million and allowance costs were $160 million, making the four-year total about $765 million. The program is jointly administered by the Labor Dept. and the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare.

Union Docker Gets Top Viet Nam Medal

Saigon — The South Vietnamese government has given its highest award, the Medal of Merit First Class, to Natale "Christy" Arcomone of Brooklyn, N. Y., Local 1814 of the Longshoremen for outstanding service in speeding the movement of ships and freight through this port.

Arcomone and other members of a union team of experts were sent here by the ILA when the port became clogged with shipping and military supplies. They have remained to supervise the carrying out of their recommendations. ILA Pres. Thomas W. Gleason headed the team.

Indiana Crew Law Survives Court Test

The Supreme Court, rejecting a petition by 16 U.S. railroads, refused to review an Indiana Supreme Court ruling that a compulsory arbitration law enacted by Congress on the use of locomotive firemen did not supersede Indiana's full crew law.

Railroad unions called the case a test of state full crew laws requiring rail managements to maintain a specified number of crewmen. Two unions brought the suit which kept the Indiana law on the books —the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and the Conductors & Brakemen.

Other Labor Cases

The court also refused review in several other union-related cases, and agreed to review two involving National Labor Relations Board rulings.

The cases in which it will consider arguments concern the right of two locals of the Auto Workers to fine members who crossed picket lines in strikes against the Allis Chalmers Mfg. Co., LaCrosse and West Allis, Wis., in 1959 and 1962, and the right of an Asbestos Workers local in Houston, Tex., not to use prefabricated materials at a construction job.

In the UAW case, the NLRB ruled that fines imposed under union rules did not violate the Taft-Hartley Act. An appeals court first upheld the board, then reversed it. In the Houston case, another appeals court upheld the right of Asbestos Workers' Local 22 to protect its own work.

By refusing review of certain cases, the court in effect let stand the following decisions among others:

- An NLRB ruling that Sylvania Electric Products Inc. must give the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers information on the cost of improvements the company offered to make in pension and insurance programs at its Batavia, N.Y., plant.
- A ruling by the NLRB, affirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, that the H. K. Porter Co., Inc., was not bargaining in good faith when it refused to consider granting a union dues checkoff to Steelworkers who requested it at the firm's Danville, Va., plant.
- An appeals court decision in Sullivan v. Wirtz that an employer was not entitled to a jury trial in a suit by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz to enjoin wage underpayments to employes.

Unions Seek Right to Picket Rail Terminal

Three unions on strike against the Florida East Coast Railway urged the Supreme Court to rule that they have a right to picket the Jacksonville, Fla., terminal used jointly by that railroad and two others.

Attorneys for the Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen and the Conductors & Brakemen argued that the strike is primary in nature and picketing should not be enjoined even though the Atlantic Coast Line and the Seaboard Air Lines Railroad Co. share the same terminal — the chief Florida interchange point for FEC traffic.

Attorneys for the carriers argued that the picketing of the terminal constitutes a secondary boycott and should be forbidden.

Non-operating unions have been on strike against the FEC since January 1963. The on-train unions struck at different intervals since then. Jacksonville terminal picketing was enjoined by a U.S. District Court judge May 4 and the injunction was kept in effect until the high court rules. Both strikes resulted from disputes over contracts with the FEC, which has been operating with strikebreakers.

11 Rail Unions Seek Increases For 500,000

Chicago — Higher wages and work rule improvements for nearly 500,000 railroad employes are being sought by 11 non-operating unions in national negotiations with some 200 U.S. railroads here.

Contract talks were moved here from Washington, D.C., where exploratory discussions were held with management committees by union negotiators headed by Pres. G. E. Leighty of the Transportation-Communication Employes for five off-train unions, and Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept., representing six shopcrafts.

In proposals made last May, the group headed by Leighty asked for wage boosts totaling 18 percent effective next Jan. 1; an improvement factor raise of 3.5 percent as of next July 1; an escalator tied to the cost of living, longevity pay and other improvements for members of the Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, Railroad Signalmen and the T-CEU.

The shopcrafts are asking a 20 percent across-the-board raise starting next Jan. 1; a cost of living escalator, shift differentials, paid lunch periods and other gains for members of the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Firemen & Oilers and the Boilermakers.

In separate meetings the two labor groups started to present evidence supporting their claim that profitable railroads should share their prosperity with workers whose productivity and living costs both have risen sharply since the last contract settlements.

Five operating unions representing more than 170,000 workers also have contract proposals pending.

Surprise Plant Closing Draws Order to Bargain

An employer who negotiated a new contract without telling a union that he had previously arranged to shut down his plant was guilty of bad faith bargaining and must return to the bargaining table, even though the plant closed three years ago, the National Labor Relations Board has ruled.

The decision came in a case that had twice been sent back to the NLRB by the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

The board ruled for the third time that Royal Plating & Polishing Co., Inc., did not live up to its legal obligation to bargain with Metal Polishers Local 44, Newark, N.J.

The board ordered Royal to pay the 80 former employes of its Bleeker St. plant in Newark their normal wages from the date of the latest decision—Sept. 13—to the date of a new agreement on the effects of the plant closing or the date of a "bona fide impasse" in bargaining.

Under this remedy, no worker would receive pay for more than 11 weeks.

The plant closed June 14, 1963, three weeks after a new contract with the union had been signed. The owner not only concealed from the union his intention to go out of business but, when the union inquired, replied that he was merely "liquidating" to get "smaller" and denied he was closing down, the NLRB said.

It ruled that the employer, by concealing the decision to terminate operations until after a new contract had been signed, prevented the union from engaging in realistic bargaining concerning the effects on the employes of its decision to sell its property and equipment and go out of business.

To "recreate as nearly as possible the economic situation that would have prevailed" if management had not "refused to perform its bargaining obligations" in 1963, the board ordered the firm to engage in bona fide bargaining and to pay part of its former employes' lost wages.

History of Case

The NLRB issued its first order against Royal on Aug. 27, 1964. The 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals directed another hearing to determine to what extent the Supreme Court's Darlington Mfg. Co. decision affected the case. In 1965 the NLRB held that Darlington did not apply to Royal, but that ruling too was returned for further findings on whether Royal had unlawfully refused to bargain.

The court said that Royal Plating was under no obligation to bargain about the decision to close the plant but the effects of that closing were a proper subject for NLRB scrutiny. The board agreed in its latest order.

and origins, to move with us."

There is nothing new about the principles of the civil rights movement, the Negro leaders said, but there is something new in "the conditions which compel us to restate them."

"Not the least" of these new conditions is "abandonment" of the basic principles "by some individuals and groups whose positions are frequently interpreted" as representing civil rights, their declaration continued.

They summarized their basic principles as these, in addition to use of the democratic process to achieve justice and their repudiation of violence and reprisals:

- "We are committed to integration, by which we mean an end to every barrier which segregation and other forms of discrimination have raised against the enjoyment by Negro Americans of their human and constitutional rights.
- "We are equally committed to the common responsibility of all Americans, both white and black, for bringing integration to pass."

"We not only welcome, we urge, the full cooperation of white Americans in what must be a joint endeavor if it is to prosper," their statement added.

The Negro leaders noted "signs of a retreat by white America from the national commitment to racial justice" as a result of the "misdeeds" of a few, which ignores the conduct of the "overwhelming preponderance of the Negro population."

They cited inadequacies in the enforcement of civil rights laws, the "scuttling" of new legislation in the Senate, the use of "white blacklash" appeals in political campaigns, the "full retreat" of one-time friends.

'Disastrous' Trend

The trend can be "disastrous to the nation's, as well as the Negro's, welfare," they warned.

"If our forces are not rallied, and if the hard, demanding job of building public support is not pressed forward, it can be worse than disastrous for the generation of young Americans, white as well as black, who would face a future without viable idealism," they continued.

"It is an obligation of the whole of American society," the declaration said, to assume the necessary leadership burdens and to take the "massive actions" necessary to check the decline of Negro economic status that leads to "frustration and bitterness."

General Board To Meet Nov. 17

A meeting of the AFL-CIO General Board has been called for Nov. 17 at 10 a.m. in the Sheraton-Park Hotel in Washington, D. C. The board is made up of the principal officer of each affiliated national or international union and each trade and industrial department, plus members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The general board meeting will follow the three-day session of the Executive Council, to be held in Washington Nov. 14-16.

Fishing Fleet Proposed:

NMU Urges Steps To Save Shipping

New York—America faces possible extinction of her merchant marine unless constructive action is taken to bolster the shrinking fleet, the National Maritime Union warned as it concluded its 14th triennial convention here.

The 450 delegates approved a series of recommendations aimed at restoring the strength of the merchant marine, including proposals for creation of a huge fishing fleet and the development of the fishing industry to meet the needs of an expanding world population.

'Appeasement' Hit

The resolution was based on the NMU's contention that the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 has been rendered ineffectual by the State Dept. policies the union charges seek "to appease foreign governments at the expense of the U.S. merchant marine."

The convention called for a $100 million appropriation by the next Congress to develop model fishing vessels that would form the nucleus of a modern fishing fleet. It also called for an amendment of the Merchant Marine Act to provide a subsidy for the fishing industry comparable to those which have been available to passenger and cargo shipping concerns that sail major foreign trade routes.

Outlining the fishing fleet plan, NMU Pres. Joseph N. Curran charged the federal government with having neglected America's fishing industry "just as it has neglected its maritime industry."

"We cannot ignore the fact that the sea around us is recognized as the eventual major source of food for the expanding populations of the world," Curran declared. "The United States cannot continue to allow its fishing industry to go down while the State Dept. negotiates. No new rules beneficial to us or fair agreement is going to be reached with the Soviets as long as they can outstrip us under present conditions. Our answer has to be a full scale program to build a fishing fleet that matches any built by other nations."

The NMU leader, discussing the resolution's calls for expansion of America's foreign aid program to include food potentials from the sea, declared that this could be a substitute for depleting grain supplies.

Capt. Lloyd W. Sheldon, president of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, in an address to the delegates asserted that the "tide is running out fast" for this nation's merchant marine. He scored a statement made in Washington by James W. Gulick, acting maritime administrator, to the effect that it is becoming increasingly difficult to secure funds for strengthening the shipping industry.

The convention adopted 30 resolutions dealing with every phase of shipping, including creation of an independent maritime agency, safety at sea, increased ship building, river safety legislation, draft deferment of active merchant seamen, the war in Viet Nam and New York City's controversial police review board.

The Viet Nam resolution reaffirmed Pres. Johnson's stand and declared full support for America's present operations, while at the same time urging that the government continue its efforts to achieve a "just and honorable peace." The police review board resolution endorsed the principle of such boards and urged NMU members to support the continuation of the board in this November's election.

The officers' report to the convention urged delegates—the largest number in NMU history—to help work out a program for the union aimed at meeting "the challenge of social change and its effects on our communities."

Final Transport Bill Excludes Maritime Unit

Congress prepared to give final approval to a new Dept. of Transportation which will take over functions of 34 scattered agencies dealing with highway, rail and air commerce. But the only touch of the sea in the department's jurisdiction will come from inclusion of the Coast Guard.

At labor's urging, a House-Senate conference committee agreed to exclude the Maritime Administration from the new department. This keeps alive the possibility of an independent maritime agency to spur a revival of the nation's dwindling merchant marine.

The Maritime Administration will remain for the time being in the Commerce Dept. The House Merchant Marine Committee has approved a bill to give it independent status and the legislation is certain to be renewed next year if the adjournment timetable blocks action at this session.

Even without maritime jurisdiction, the new Transportation Dept. will rank fourth in size among the 12 Cabinet departments, with nearly 90,000 employes and spending authority for programs budgeted at about $5.5 billion a year. The money and manpower would be transferred from other government agencies.

Pres. Johnson asked creation of the new department last March and the House passed the bill Aug. 30, after first amending it to delete the Maritime Administration. The Senate bill, passed Sept. 29, restored the Maritime Administration to the new department but gave it somewhat greater autonomy than the Administration had proposed.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany wired each of the House and Senate conferees on the bill a statement reaffirming labor's desire for an independent maritime agency, not "buried in another government department, with conflicting and competing interests."

'3rd Rate' Sea Power

Meany said "short-sighted" government policies have dragged the United States down "to third-rate status among the maritime nations."

Pres. Paul Hall of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. praised the exclusion of the Maritime Administration as "a first step in the right direction" towards an independent agency.

He expressed the hope that the Administration will "promptly" come up with a new national maritime program to "restore the American merchant marine to its proper place upon the seas."

Brief Refutes Examiner:

Mill Closing Unfair, Board Counsel Says

The National Labor Relations Board has been urged by its general counsel to make an independent analysis of the testimony in the Darlington mill-closing case and to rule that the closing was unlawful under the Supreme Court's Darlington decision.

An NLRB trial examiner concluded recently that the general counsel had failed to prove that mill owner Roger Milliken's purpose in closing the mill in 1956 was to "chill unionism" in the 27 plants of the Deering Milliken, Inc., textile chain after the Textile Workers Union of America won an election at Darlington, S.C.

The examiner has "substantially misinterpreted the holding of the Supreme Court" and his findings are in error, General Counsel Arnold Ordman told the board in a brief. The general counsel is an NLRB officer who operates independently of board members.

Evidence Clear

The evidence shows conclusively, the brief asserts, that the employer's purpose of "chilling" unionism was not confined to Darlington employes but "was intended to be and was a grim deterrent" to the 14,000 employes in other plants "who might entertain similar notions of unionism."

The evidence also established that this unlawful motive was made known "by repeated and methodical employer warnings to its employes throughout the Deering Milliken enterprise that management would not run a unionized mill," the brief related.

The employer systematically warned his remaining employes that their plants, too, would be obliterated, like Darlington, if they went union, and his labor relations attorney "repeatedly expressed this policy to the plant supervisors who in turn disseminated these warnings among the rank-and-file employes," the brief continued.

The employer had utilized previous mill closings, where labor problems were a substantial factor in their liquidation, to "discourage or chill unionism" at the other plants, it said, adding: "Thus the employer's utilization of the liquidation of Darlington, its only organized mill, to discourage the remaining employes from exercising their rights under the labor act was a continuation of this highly successful policy."

During a union campaign to organize the employer's Drayton mill in 1954, employes were warned, according to the brief: "Remember what happened at the Gaffney mill —(the employer) made a warehouse out of it . . . remember what happened to Cowpens (mill) when they had a strike on account of the union."

Disputing the examiner's reasoning, the general counsel said "the Supreme Court did not intend the board's findings in this case to revolve around a mathematical determination of how many of the remaining Deering Milliken mill employes were in fact chilled by Darlington. The Supreme Court explicitly stated that it was only concerned with the 'reasonably' or 'realistically foreseeable effect' of the employer's motive in closing Darlington."

Ordman recommended that the board independently analyze the testimony in the light of the principles stated by the Supreme Court, and make "new and complete findings of fact and conclusions of law." Such an analysis would show, he argued, that the employer violated the labor act.

The NLRB decided four years ago, in a ruling of major import, that Deering Milliken, Darlington and affiliated firms were a single employer and committed an unfair practice by closing the Darlington mill to discourage employe union activity.

$7 Million Backpay

It ordered the firm to bargain with the TWUA about the effects of the Darlington shutdown on the workers; to restore some 500 laid-off employes to similar jobs, paying their moving expenses if they were required to move; and giving them backpay estimated by the union at $7 million for their lost wages.

The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals denied enforcement of the board order by a 3-2 vote, reasoning that an employer has the "absolute prerogative" to go out of business in toto or "to discontinue it in part, permanently at any time."

The Supreme Court on Mar. 29, 1965, sent the case back to the NLRB for further findings as to the employer's motives in closing the mill. The high court held, in disagreement with the Court of Appeals, "that a partial closing is an unfair labor practice . . . if motivated by a purpose to chill unionism in any of the remaining plants of the single employer and if the employer may reasonably have foreseen that such closing will likely have that effect."

INVESTMENT SPECIALISTS, in Washington for a series of briefings by experts in various fields, heard labor's views from AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger at a session in the federation's headquarters.

Teachers Union Wins Election At Merchant Marine Academy

New York—The American Federation of Teachers won collective bargaining rights for its first Eastern college faculty when the teaching staff of the Kings Point Merchant Marine Academy voted for the union, 39-24, in a secret ballot election.

Kings Point is a four-year college-level institution training young men for careers as officers in the U.S. merchant marine, and is accredited by the Middle States Association of Colleges & Secondary Schools. Faculty members are civil service employes of the U.S. Maritime Administration, and the election was by agreement between the AFT and the agency under Presidential Executive Order 10988 setting up union bargaining rights for government employes.

Recently the AFT won another election under Executive Order 10988. Teachers at the Crown Point, Ariz., Indian School chose AFT Local 1574 to represent them. The victory was the first in a union campaign to organize 700 teachers in the Four Corners area of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Utah, AFT Vice Pres. Herrick Roth said.

The Kings Point faculty voted by a 62 percent margin for the United Federation of College Teachers—AFT Local 1460. The local next will draft contract proposals and start negotiations aimed at improving salary schedules, sabbatical leave policies, promotional opportunities and facilities for teaching and research.

Union Impact Felt

The AFT hailed the vote as indicating a growing teacher awareness of the union.

Dr. Israel Kugler, local union president, and Chapter Chairman Jules H. Drucker said the AFT campaigned for a stronger faculty voice in making decisions like the following:

- Public Law 89-301 authorized a 3.6 percent increase for federal employes effective in October 1965 but academy management applied the increase to the faculty only in January 1966 and deprived some teachers of the full increase.
- The same law authorized increased uniform allowances a year ago but no such increases have been granted at Kings Point.
- Management reduced the size of the annual within-grade pay increases for faculty members and also proposed to make them conditional rather than mandatory.
- Management in 1965 abolished the principle of comparability to local area colleges and gave the faculty the lower end of the Naval Academy salary schedule, although the Kings Point teaching obligation exceeds that at Annapolis by more than 30 percent the AFT said.
- The faculty was removed by management from the armed forces salary scale in 1962. A year later, Congress raised the salary schedule by 17 percent.

Local 1460 previously won bargaining rights for teachers at the Fashion Institute of Technology, a two-year community college here. Its main objective is to organize 10,000 teachers in the 12 colleges comprising the City University of New York, its spokesman said.

Job Growth Seen Best In White Collar Fields

White-collar jobs will grow more than twice as fast as manual jobs in the next decade, with the demand for skilled workers expanding more sharply than that for the unskilled, a Labor Dept. study shows.

It points to the disproportionate concentration of Negro workers in the less skilled, less rapidly-growing fields and warns:

"If they do not gain access to white collar and skilled jobs at an even faster rate than they have in recent years, they will continue to have more serious unemployment problems than their white fellow-citizens."

The study, America's Industrial and Occupational Manpower Requirements, 1964-75," was prepared by the department's Bureau of Labor Statistics and examines the possible effects of major economic and technical changes on manpower needs.

There will be nearly 12 million more white collar jobs in 1975 than there are today, it reports, with the number of blue collar jobs rising by only 4.4 million.

An increase of 4.5 million jobs for professional and technical workers, or a rise of 54 percent, is forecast, with emphasis on sharply greater need for engineers, chemists, registered nurses and draftsmen.

Practically all of the skilled trades will find more jobs available at the end of the decade, with particularly large increases in sight for business machine and appliance servicemen, and operators of excavating, grading and road machinery. The study predicts a drop in demand for some skills, particularly for compositors and typesetters, bakers and machine tool operators, and also in some manufacturing, especially tobacco and furniture and fixtures.

Semi-skilled workers will have a better outlook, the study finds, though growth in the number of jobs will be less than average; clerical jobs will continue to grow with office machine operators doubled in number by 1975; and prospects are bright for service workers—especially policemen, hospital attendants and beauty operators.

This is the decade, the BLS says, when men will get even with women for taking so many of their jobs by invading fields predominantly held by the feminine sex—specifically elementary and secondary school teaching, social work and library work.

USWA Funds Aid Research For Retarded

Atlantic City, N.J.—The Steelworks' executive board voted here to approve an expenditure of $30,000 for underwriting a year's training for a specialist in problems of mentally-handicapped children.

The fund will finance the first occupant of a USWA chair of anthropology at the Institute for the Achievement of Human Potential, Philadelphia. It will permit one individual to work one year with other research experts in the field of his own specialty.

Board members visited the institute in January at the suggestion of former USWA Dir. Al Kojetinsky. Wives of board members made another visit during the union's convention as guests of institute Dir. Glen Doman.

Doman said the institute's supporters hope to establish similar centers in other areas, staffed by persons trained at the Philadelphia headquarters. Five persons, each working individually, are needed to carry out the current institute program, he said.

The union grant will finance the studies of one of the five present researchers, board members were told.

J.T. O'Connell Dies, Ex-Labor Dept. Aide

New York—James T. O'Connell, undersecretary of labor from 1957 to the end of the Eisenhower Administration, died here of a heart ailment at the age of 60.

He was highly regarded by those he worked with in government, labor and management. Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz said he will be "deeply mourned" and remembered by his associates at the Labor Dept. "with honor and affection."

At the time of his death, O'Connell was vice president of the Hudson Pulp & Paper Corp. He is survived by his widow, a son and four daughters.

African Unions Register Sharp Gain in Members

Union membership in Africa has risen 26 percent since 1962—from 5 million to 6.3 million organized workers on the continent.

These and other facts are reported in a new Directory of Labor Organizations — Africa, issued by the U.S. Dept. of Labor.

Job Transfer Pact Preserves Rates

Hamilton, Ont.—Under an agreement with the Tobacco Workers, Tuckett Tobacco Co. employes will keep their same pay rates, though they may be working in lower classifications, if they transfer to Guelph, Ont., when the plant here is closed in about a year.

Also in the settlement is a proviso for early retirement with full pensions for men at age 60 and women at 56, according to Intl. Rep. Roland Gauvreau.

Workers who refuse to go to Guelph or who cannot be transferred will get severance pay based on 2 percent of a year's earnings for each year worked; plus 1 percent for each year they are over 25 and 2 percent for each year over 40.

Progress or Stalemate?

THE 1966 CONGRESSIONAL elections are shaping up as the most pivotal in modern political history. In basic terms they will test whether new, progressive, articulate and intelligent congressmen who have established outstanding records in a brief two-year period can go back to the districts they won by narrow margins and win re-election.

The new liberals elected in 1964—many from districts historically conservative in their congressional representation—have gone down the line for progressive legislation. Their votes in the House spelled the difference on medicare, school aid, poverty programs, civil rights, repeal of Section 14(b) and many other bills.

They have built a solid record, withstanding intense pressure from the conservative interests in their districts. Now they are campaigning on that record, as well as their achievements for their districts in local terms. And the outcome of the Nov. 8 balloting will in effect be measured by how well they have done in upsetting the oft-quoted political laws about the party in power losing in the non-presidential year balloting, especially the marginally-won seats.

THE CONSERVATIVE Republican campaign committees have carefully selected these closely-won seats, won mostly by liberal Democrats, as the major target in the '66 elections. They have poured large amounts of money and supplied the technical know-how of campaigning to the GOP candidates in these districts—nearly all of them down-the-line conservatives who would have voted against the key measures of the past two years that have resulted in the outstanding record of the 89th Congress.

The goal is to defeat enough liberals to re-establish the power of the GOP-Dixiecrat conservative coalition to block critically needed legislation. The effect would be return to the stalemate on progressive programs and policies of the 1940s and 1950s when the coalition held a veto power in Congress on all liberal proposals.

The breakthrough of the 1960s, which saw the weakening of the conservative coalition and its reduction to a state of near helplessness in the past two years, would come to an end if the House liberals of the Class of 1964 pay for their political courage with defeat.

THE ELECTIONS of 1966 are vastly more important than the individual liberals or the collective group of liberals involved. At stake is future progress or stalemate.

Unless a total political effort is put forth this year, unless everything possible is done to re-elect the liberals of the Class of 1964 and bring other new liberals into Congress, legislative progress for years to come is in jeopardy.

If many of the Class of '64 go down to defeat, the deadly caution of "don't rock the boat" will prevail again.

The GOP-Dixiecrat coalition will once more have in its control the machinery, the votes to block the new and broader programs needed to give substantial meaning and effect to the breakthroughs of the 89th Congress.

The '66 Issue

Aids Liberal Candidates:

Tireless Humphrey Brings Zest To Critical Election Campaign

By Harry Conn

IN THE CRITICAL 1966 elections, one man who has been steadily on the hustings, battling day-in-and-day-out for liberal and pro-labor candidates, is Hubert H. Humphrey, the Vice President of the United States.

Few men today could stand up to the frenetic pace set by the Vice President. Before Nov. 8 rolls around, Humphrey will have visited at least 30 states—possibly 10 more—inspiring campaign workers to greater heights and bringing new understanding to complex issues.

"I've always believed that if you are going to be in politics you should enjoy it," Humphrey says and enjoy it he does. He evokes mirth and laughter with his cutting witticisms which make their political points.

On a typical day, he is scheduled to leave Washington at 5:45 in the afternoon. He had spent the day and night before in Pennsylvania working hard for the labor-endorsed candidate for governor, Milton Shapp, and Keystone State congressmen.

He returned to Washington at 2 p.m., touched base with a myriad of problems and people and sped to the airport only 45 minutes late. Waiting in the smooth twin-engine Convair were his staff, newsmen, the ever-present Secret Service, Sen. Birch Bayh, Rep. Winfield Denton and Rep. Andrew Jacobs (Indiana Democrats). The campaign was Indiana bound.

WHILE EN ROUTE to Evansville and eating dinner, Humphrey huddled with the three Hoosiers and discussed the local political picture.

"Rep. Denton is doing a good job and we need him in Washington," Humphrey declared. As the crowd at the airport at Evansville applauded, a group of women standing close to the fence in front of the platform waved a sign reading: "Thanks for Medicare, Winfield." Another sign said: "Labor Supports You." Carrying both signs were members of the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Clothing Workers.

The plane moved on to Indianapolis where state and local officials, en masse, were there to greet the Vice President and his party. With motorcycle police escort, the caravan of cars moved into town to Murat Temple for the Democratic rally. The thousand or more had been waiting for the Vice President and his party for about an hour. Here, again, he dwelt on the records of Jacobs and praised Bayh and Sen. Vance Hartke, who was kept in Washington on official business. Then he got down to some campaign issues.

"If you think you're making too much money; if you think the country is too prosperous; if you think the country is overemployed," Humphrey declared, "vote Republican. You'll get the brakes on the economy. Brother, will you! And you'll go through the economic windshield."

It was 2 a.m. Washington time before Humphrey could retire, following the inevitable cocktail party for the faithful. But the next morning he was full of vim as the motorcade sped to the airport, again under police motorcycle escort—only about an hour behind schedule.

AT THE DETROIT AIRPORT a large collection of labor-endorsed candidates was there to greet him including former Gov. G. Mennen Williams, seeking the Senate seat held by the late Pat McNamara, and gubernatorial candidate Zolton Ferency.

After radio and TV interviews, the campaign party winged to Monroe, Mich., in the southeastern part of the state on Lake Erie. There they were met by Rep. Wes Vivian. At Monroe, the candidates spoke at a restaurant and later the Vice President dedicated a library. In each event, Humphrey stressed why Vivian was such a good congressman and why Williams and Ferency should be elected.

The big event of the evening was a $100-a-plate dinner at Cobo Hall in Detroit.

In his speech of the evening, Humphrey hit hard for the Democratic candidates. Noting that the GOP has been trying to make an issue of crime, he said, "The Republican Party has no monopoly on virtue and law enforcement. We believe in these things, too. But the power of the police is not the answer. People must be made productive citizens; they must be given hope."

As soon as his speech was concluded, the caravan, with police sirens shrieking, sped to the airport. It was 2:30 a.m. before the plane landed at Washington. The weary occupants departed.

Humphrey was scheduled for a 9 a.m. departure. Candidates in West Virginia needed a lift. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

New Southern Moderates Aided By Weltner's Moral Courage

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m. EDT.)

ON THURSDAY, Sept. 27, Rep. Charles Longstreet Weltner, age 38, of Atlanta, described aptly if transitorily as a leader of a "new breed" in Southern politics, inspected the damage done to his hopes for Georgia by an angry shadow from the past named Lester Maddox who, with the figurative use of ax handles and revolvers, had just smashed his way to the Democratic nomination for governor of the state as a rabid segregationist.

Weltner found the damage considerable, but not fatal to his own re-election.

On Friday Weltner flew from Washington to Atlanta to reflect on the situation on the spot and to study the ramifications of a party loyalty oath he had signed—standard procedure in Georgia—to support all other candidates on the Democratic ticket. On Saturday, he issued a statement saying he could not break a solemn pledge. On Sunday, the press interpreted this to mean he would reluctantly endorse Maddox. On Monday, Weltner dramatically corrected this misinterpretation by withdrawing from his own race for a third term—which he probably would have won—so he would not be bound by the oath. "I cannot compromise with hate," he said. On Tuesday, some of his Democratic colleagues complained he had compromised them by not consulting with them first and by not staying in the campaign and fighting extremism on the political battlefield.

Weltner makes no apologies for his decision. His crowded, back-of-the-building office on Capitol Hill, tawdry but telling evidence of how seniority works in Congress, already has taken on that unsettled moving-out look. He will take his wife and four children back to Atlanta and resume the practice of law. He approves of his replacement on the ticket, one Archie Lindsey, chairman of the Fulton County commissioners, and will campaign for him if and when as asked.

He does not think the new breed of political moderates is either dead or dying in the South. On the contrary he believes his action gave it some needed moral strength. He does not know what, if anything, the future may hold for him in politics but he gives every impression of hoping to return to it as a career—if he can afford it.

Another Atlanta congressman, James A. Mackay, 47, also a moderate, running for his second term, respects Weltner's principles, disputes his strategy. Mackay, who, as a freshman representative showed astonishing facility and effectiveness in sponsoring legislation which Pres. Johnson recently signed to create a national traffic safety agency, takes a more pragmatic view of politics. He does not believe he sold his soul by signing the party loyalty oath. He calls Lester Maddox a "aloot," is convinced, nevertheless he will win the governorship but reasons his extremism will be inhibited by a more sophisticated state legislature, some of whose "rednecks" and "wool hats" have been replaced by Rhodes scholars and law school graduates, thanks to reapportionment.

Furthermore he notes that while Maddox was winning a primary runoff, House Speaker George T. Smith, himself a moderate, was swamping another racial extremist, Peter Zack Geer, by 100,000 votes to become the unopposed nominee for lieutenant governor.

Weltner concurs emphatically that Maddox will beat Rep. Howard H. (Bo) Callaway, a multi-millionaire Goldwater Republican, in the governor's race but he is far less sanguine about the immediate prospects for Georgia's continued political evolution. He sees a serious setback. "The redneck and the wool hat reactionaries have come out of the woodwork," he says. Furthermore in Georgia the governor possesses huge patronage powers and virtually controls the expenditure of the budget. "And in politics," Weltner adds, "the strength lies where the money is."

MOST SIGNIFICANTLY OF ALL, perhaps, both Weltner and Mackay agree that Republican efforts to extend the two-party system to the South have been dealt a body blow by, ironically enough, the re-emergence of such racist Neanderthals as Maddox as winning Democrats. The reason for this anomaly is not hard to find. The Republicans in the South, by and large, have been trying to veer more radically right than the most diehard Southern Democrat on the theory that they would pick up the fallout of voters disenchanted with the "socialistic" slant of the national Democratic Party.

"Bo Callaway's idea of integration," says Mackay, "is to have a Negro in a white jacket serve him a julep." But now that the Maddoxes, the Alabama George Wallaces and the Arkansas Jim Johnsons are on the rise, where can Southern Republican candidates, already hooked to extremist positions, go for votes? Johnson, like George Mahoney in Maryland, is another racist candidate for governor.

It probably is true, as the saying goes, that politics is the art of the possible. But how impossible must a situation become before the moral courage of a Charles Longstreet Weltner not to compromise with principle is not applied in vain?

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

SAN FRANCISCO—A great divide may have been crossed Oct. 7-8 in the hard-fought battle between Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, seeking a third term, and his movie actor right-wing Republican opponent, Ronald Reagan.

Brown, at the age of 60, is bouncy, unwearied and a total expert in the details of California government—water shortages and development projects, budget and revenue figures, the explosive population growth of 600,000 a year from the normal birthrate and migration from other states and foreign countries.

The key speech by major candidates for office is made each election year here, traditionally, at the Commonwealth Club, a forum where the sponsors are financial and opinion leaders. Franklin D. Roosevelt in his Commonwealth Club speech of 1932 disclosed his philosophy for what later became the New Deal.

Brown's Commonwealth Club speech Oct. 8 had a classic simplicity and lucidity. It was short, affirmative about his own record, and he fielded tough questions well. He declared he would keep talking about Reagan's tolerance of John Birch Society members among his leaders and he bluntly said about Reagan's opposition to the Rumford Act—California's open-occupancy law—that the state simply had to have a statute on non-discrimination in housing.

REAGAN, meanwhile, roused ovations in a speech to the California Real Estate Association, which sponsored a referendum proposal to get rid of the Rumford Act, but fell into disaster later the same day in a press conference in tiny Chico on the same issue.

A lending agency, public or private, probably has the right to set conditions barring discrimination in housing that it finances, said the GOP candidate. Apartment buildings of "a certain size have got logically to be called public accommodations," he added.

The reporters traveling with him, frankly astounded, asked whether this wasn't substantially what was provided in the Rumford Act, which he had assailed. Then he said that property owners must nevertheless be protected in their right to dispose "individually" of their "private, personal property."

The contradiction was obvious and Ronald Reagan at about 4 p.m. suddenly said he was very weary and perhaps not thinking clearly.

"I'm not sure I know what I'm talking about, I'm so pooped," he said. And then again, "I know I can sit and straighten this out in my mind."

There were more questions about the paradox and Reagan said bitterly: "You're boring in, aren't you? You're boring in because you know I'm so pooped that I don't know what I'm doing."

Reagan's press secretary finally hauled him out of there, and nobody ever found out what it was the candidate thought he thought about the conflicting principles of the right of rugged individualists to discriminate in housing against minorities and the powers of government to protect the minorities by prohibiting discrimination.

REAGAN had already blown another question from a local reporter about the Marysville Dam—a storage dam, irrigation, power and recreation project to control the flood waters of the Yuba and Feather Rivers.

The candidate, astounding his auditors again, referred to this Marysville plan to harness the rivers as part of an entirely different program to preserve a few wilderness streams as "wild rivers."

A few weeks ago he had mixed up the geography of another California river, the Eel, and when his blunder on Marysville was pointed out he commented, with some natural embarrassment:

"Here I am on the wrong river again. You've really got me. . . . You've got me. I can't give the answer."

He has been running for governor or contemplating running for governor for more than a year, and he hasn't even bothered to take a cram course on California.

Win or lose next Nov. 8, Pat Brown as usual is wearing well in the campaign, and Reagan—despite expert coaching by his highly-regarded public relations firm—is blowing his lines as an actor.

2-Pronged Attack on Problems:

Federal, Voluntary Agencies To Pool Efforts in Communities

A NEW, two-pronged attack, combining governmental and voluntary agencies and aimed at community-based programs of disease, ignorance and poverty, was hailed by an AFL-CIO vice president in a nationwide radio interview.

Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, who also heads the United Community Funds & Councils of America, characterized private agencies as "the pace-setters in the communities," but said they needed the financial strength of government to make their efforts more effective. Beirne was questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, an AFL-CIO public affairs broadcast aired weekly over the Mutual radio network.

The five federal agencies joining with the UCFCA in the pact are the Departments of Commerce, Labor, Housing & Urban Development and Health, Education & Welfare, and the Office of Economic Opportunity. The agreement sets up a system of mutual cooperation, advice and counsel between the voluntary agencies and government departments operating in the same social welfare fields.

Beirne conceded that voluntary agencies have in the past often been more concerned with the needs of middle-class citizens and failed to reach the problems in slums and ghettos. "That is changing," he observed.

"IN RECENT YEARS, a concentration of great effort and concern has been directed toward the slum area . . . and private social welfare agencies are opening offices right where the slum problems are," he noted.

"We have recognized that the slums and ghettos are providing many of the future problems of a community and we are acting as expeditiously as possible to move our operations into those problem areas."

Reporters questioning him were Joseph A. Loftus of the New York Times and Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post.

GOVERNMENT and voluntary health and welfare agencies are joining in a new, two-pronged attack on community-based problems, AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne (center) told Joseph A. Loftus of the New York Times and Eve Edstrom of the Washington Post on the AFL-CIO public service interview, Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual Radio Network.

How to Buy:

Sewing Machine Racket Forces Buyer to Beware of Gyp Artists

By Sidney Margolius

THE TEEN-AGE DAUGHTER of a Michigan labor paper editor recently visited a state fair near her home. At one booth she filled out a coupon for a "free drawing" for a New Home sewing machine.

A few days later she got a letter advising that somebody else had won the free machine (natch). But, the letter said, she was second place winner. She now would "be given the opportunity to receive without cost" a sewing machine head. All she had to buy was "a new inexpensive cabinet to contain it," which she could pay for at the rate of $2 a week.

Such "free" drawings are just one of many deceptive tactics used in all parts of the country to sell sewing machines, despite constant policing efforts by the Better Business Bureaus and frequent citations by the Federal Trade Commission.

One of the grubbiest tricks now being used is to advertise that you can "take over payments." The New York State attorney general investigated one company which advertised what were claimed to be "repossessed sewing machines." But the machines were not repossessed. When people came to buy, the salesmen disparaged the advertised low-price machines and tried to sell high-price models.

Newspapers which accept such ads are, of course, no better than the shills which state and county fairs permit to operate to fleece visitors.

The Federal Trade Commission has just cited a Washington, D. C., "New Home Center" for using a whole bag of such selling methods as the "repossession" claim, alleged "free drawings," and "bait and switch."

Contrary to newspaper ads and salesmen's claims, the FTC said, the company is not a finance or credit-collection concern, but a retail seller of sewing machines and vacuum cleaners, and the advertised machines "are not being offered for the unpaid balance."

Another Washington retailer, the R & B Sewing Machine Co., used a little different approach. The FTC charged this firm advertised that famous-brand machines, claimed to be partly paid for on uncompleted layaway plans, were available for as little as $26 for a console machine, and $9.95 for vacuums.

The FTC said that these machines had not been abandoned in layaway plans, and the salesmen showed prospects a machine "which because of its poor appearance and condition was on sight rejected."

The FTC also is in a tussle with the Sewing Machine Co. of America, of St. Paul. The FTC charges, but the company denies, that it also operates under the name of "Domestic Credit Co.," and that it uses bait ads and false representations.

Minnesota has been the scene of sewing-machine selling problems before, when the Midwest Sewing Center of St. Paul was charged by the FTC with claiming that prospects could take over monthly payments to get a console sewing machine with zig-zag attachments at low prices. The FTC also complained that the salesmen quoted fictitious "regular" prices, and the claimed savings were not really provided.

MANY FAMILIES are hungry for sewing machines in the belief—not necessarily true nowadays—that they will save a lot of money making their own clothes. In reality, they tend to use their machines mostly for easy-to-make garments like aprons, blouses, cotton skirts and house dresses, on which the savings are small. Less often do women use their machines to make the more expensive street dresses on which savings might be greater, a survey by the U.S. Agriculture Dept. found.

Actually, many women tend to get trapped by high-pressure sellers because they think they need a more complicated sewing machine than they really do.

At a trade conference sponsored by the FTC, leading home economists testified that it is harder to do the fancy stitching implied by the "automatic" zig-zag feature than it sounds. Considerable knowledge and experience are necessary.

As a result, FTC regulations now bar the use of such phrases as "automatic sewing machine," "automatic zig-zag sewing" and "sews automatically."

Since straight sewing rather than fancy stitching is the major use to which most machines are put, this is the performance feature you should examine most closely. If you do want a zig-zag machine, never buy one without a few days to try it out so you can make sure you will be able to adapt to it.

Be sure that any "receipt" you may be asked to sign for the trial period is not actually an installment contract.

CHILDREN OF AMERICA will be helping needy kids throughout the world in the traditional Halloween "Trick or Treat for UNICEF" collection. The money collected buys milk, vaccine, vitamins to be distributed by the agency, the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund, which was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for 1965 for having done most to advance "brotherhood amongst nations." Pennies, nickels and dimes given by the children of the United States and the dollars given by their parents have been a mainstay of UNICEF support, along with purchases of UNICEF's multi-lingual greeting cards.

School Role Stressed:

Teenage Consumers Need Basic Training

WITH THE RISE of the billion dollar teen-age market, manufacturers and advertisers are showing great awareness of the teen-ager's interests in order to gain his favor.

"To be more specific," says Alvin F. Friedman, vice president of the Amalgamated Bank in Chicago, "business spends about $160 million a year for educational materials, programs and services. This is estimated to be more than all the schools spend on text books. Naturally, the goal of business is to sell; and selling relies on persuasion, not on education."

Because of the increasing ability of teen-agers to spend and the influence by mass media on their choice of consumer items, Friedman suggests that there is good reason for taking another "look" at the consumer education programs in the senior and junior high schools. This is all the more necessary because of the teen-ager's relative lack of any basic, down-to-earth knowledge about the complexities of being a consumer.

A school that provides little or no consumer education for its students in effect leaves to business and advertising the major responsibility of consumer training of our youth, said Friedman.

Since the schools may provide the only unbiased education a consumer encounters, it should certainly be the school's responsibility to fulfill this important role, he added.

TOWARD THIS END, a growing number of high schools are doing positive and promising things. One of them that merits some attention is the program at Lincoln High School in Yonkers, N. Y., the bank official declared.

Consumer education was introduced into several courses at this school. In some of the science classes the students studied the chemistry of medicines and cosmetics. In economics they became aware of the protection offered the consumer by private and government agencies—in, for example, purchasing or renting a home. Budgeting became part of the home economics classes. Some math classes studied how to determine the true annual interest rate charged by various lenders and sellers. One of these sessions, with the help of a local car dealer, explained what to look for in buying a used car. In some of the English classes, students analyzed language used in advertisements.

These youngsters will need this highly useful information when they get out of school and establish families and homes. Such consumer training also helps teach youngsters to think for themselves, Friedman said.

One or more high schools in a community could be chosen for a pilot program in consumer education, he said. Teachers could be taught the new subject matter either in special seminars, or as part of in-training courses, currently accompanying various curriculum changes in many schools. In addition, PTA's can go on record as encouraging the introduction of consumer education courses.

A Personality Test to Separate The Swingers from the Swung

By Jane Goodsell

ARE YOU a swinger? If you want to find out, check the answers which best express your attitudes:

HOW DARING ARE YOU?

(A) You think it's a shame that the topless swimsuit turned out to be a passing fad and not a fashion classic, like the bikini.

(B) You have a mini-skirt, but you refuse to sit down when you're wearing it.

(C) It embarrasses you to undress in front of the TV when Johnny Carson is looking at you.

HOW ATTUNED ARE YOU TO SCIENTIFIC ADVANCES?

(A) You can distinguish polyster/acrylic from continuous filament triacetate.

(B) You take aureomycin for coughs but, in your heart of hearts, you have more faith in soothing syrups and mustard plasters.

(C) You're still trying to converse with telephonic recordings.

HOW ADVENTUROUS ARE YOU?

(A) You've written the President asking to have space reserved for you on the first flight to the moon.

(B) You've put a tiger in your tank, but you refuse to ride in a car without seat belts.

(C) You've almost screwed up your courage to attempt direct long distance dialing.

HOW DO YOU REACT TO THE NEW BEAT IN MUSIC?

(A) The Rolling Stones really turn you on.

(B) You don't care for the Beatles, personally, but you figure they must have something to make all that money.

(C) Lawrence Welk plays your kind of music, and you've never heard of the Rolling Stones.

Now tote up your answers.

If you're an A-type person, you're switched on VROOM!

If you're a B-type, you're trying to keep up, sort of.

If you're a C-type, you must find life very vexing. A pity.

Labor Dept. Figures Updated:

Factory Wages $23 Below 'Modest' Budget for Family

least $3.27 an hour or $131 a week for 52 weeks a year, Scott explains:

"This is the cost of maintaining a four-person family at a modest standard of living in America's cities, the amount required to meet the necessities of life, pay taxes and enjoy a few of the amenities of life—but with no allowance for luxuries or savings other than life insurance."

Scott observes that the updated budget can serve as a useful tool in collective bargaining. Although its figures are not a precise guide to the wage needs of all workers, they do represent a general estimate of the cost of maintaining a modest standard of living in the city, he adds.

"Millions of American workers—skilled as well as unskilled—do not earn the $6,797 a year needed to maintain a minimum, decent living for a city family of four persons," he notes.

Whereas the average factory worker last June was earning $2.71 an hour and fell $23 a week short of the necessary income standard, the retail trades worker made $69.14 a week—about $62 shy of the standard, Scott says.

As for construction workers, he adds, while their average weekly income of $146.31 last June is above the standard, many of them earn less than the necessary $6,797 a year because they become unemployed in bad weather and suffer short workweeks.

The Labor Dept. developed the "modest but adequate" standard, commonly called the "city worker's family budget," just after World War II at the request of Congress. The legislators wanted to know the total number of "dollars required for the average worker in overalls to live" in various cities and to pinpoint the differences in living costs between cities.

How It Started

The principles and concepts of the worker's budget were prepared with the aid of a technical advisory committee made up of university, labor, industry and government experts on consumer buying and living habits.

The Labor Dept. updated the budget in 1959, including goods and services which reflected new standards and buying habits. A further updating, to reflect spending patterns of the 1960s, is scheduled for release by the middle of next year.

The AFL-CIO Research Dept. brought the 1959 budget into current terms through a weighted average of the weekly income required by the government standard in 20 large cities at mid-1966 prices.

The budget measures the income needed by a family of four—an employed husband aged 38, a wife not employed outside the home, a boy aged 13 and a girl aged 8. This family rents in a big city or suburb.

To illustrate the modesty of the budget, Scott points out that it allows less than one egg per person per day. Under furniture and appliances, it assumes the family has the basic furnishings and allows only for such replacements as a washing machine every eight years, a vacuum cleaner every 14 years, a toaster every 12 years.

Under transportation, the budget allows car owners $696 a year for auto purchase, operation and maintenance whereas government experts estimate more than $1,000 is spent by the typical one-car family. Autoless families are allowed only $166 a year for transportation—an average of 12 rides a week for the entire family outside school bus fares.

The income required by this modest budget varies from city to city, Scott points out. An income of $113 a week or $5,851 a year is needed in the lowest-cost city, Houston. A worker in the highest-cost city, Seattle, requires $140 a week or $7,255 a year.

Scott also discusses the differences in the cost of housing, food, medical care and other components of the budget and how these have risen since the 1959 budget was issued.

While the Labor Dept. did not develop a budget for other than four-person families, Scott notes it did devise a technique for calculating income needs of other families. Thus a two-person family of husband and wife, age 35 to 55, needs 69 percent of the four-person budget or $4,690 a year. A five-person family with the oldest child between 6 and 16 years would need 18 percent more than the standard or $8,020 a year.

Scott concludes by refuting employer arguments that the city worker's budget is inappropriate for bargaining purposes. It is one guide to the wage and salary needs of workers, he argues, and a useful one.

The updating of the budget for 1966 prices "indicates the need for substantial wage increases" if workers are to achieve even "modest but adequate" living standards, he adds.

Label Dept. Opens Drive For Kingsport Yule Fund

The AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. has announced formation of a Kingsport Press Strikers Christmas Fund and is seeking donations to aid the strikers, their wives and children.

Dept. Dir. Joseph Lewis said "we ask that every union member, every union officer, every union organization dig down deep and show once again the true heart and generosity" of union men and women.

Going on strike takes courage, and staying out for an extended period means many sacrifices, but "being on strike all your life is another thing," said Lewis.

That is the position, he pointed out, of many children of the 1,200 union members who have been striking since Mar. 11, 1963, to win acceptable contract terms from Kingsport Press, the country's biggest hard-cover book publisher.

Labor's nationwide boycott against books produced at Kingsport, Tenn., is effective and its success only a matter of time, yet hardship prevails among families of the strikers and the battle is not yet won, Lewis said.

Last year, response to a department appeal was "overwhelming and gratifying." But Christmas will soon be here again and the Yuletide season will be "bleak indeed" for children and parents unless the trade union movement once again rallies to a call for help, Lewis declared.

He asked that donations to the Kingsport Press Strikers Christmas Fund be directed to Room 402, AFL-CIO Bldg., 815 16th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Labor Helping New Nations Build Housing

The role of organized labor in providing decent housing in the developing nations was spelled out by Boris Shishkin, secretary of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee, at a conference on Intl. Housing & Urban Growth in Washington. The meeting was sponsored by the Intl. Development Conference with the cooperation of the National Association of Home Builders.

Shishkin outlined a report by the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions to the United Nations which summarizes the training of personnel to assist union-sponsored housing cooperatives and other housing programs.

He also stressed the work being done by the American Institute for Free Labor Development in Latin America and plans being developed by the Afro-American Labor Center, with AFL-CIO aid, for Ethiopia, Ghana, Nigeria and other African nations.

James Holway, AIFLD director of social projects, also spoke. The Intl. Development Conference includes among its trustees AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Jacob Clayman, administrative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

Union Role Established In Civil Rights Act Suit

Oxford, Miss.—A U.S. District Court judge for Mississippi's Delta area has ruled that a union may properly bring charges against an employer as a "person aggrieved" under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Federal Judge Claude F. Clayton, upholding the right of the Chemical Workers to be a party to a lawsuit under the act, rejected the argument of Planters Manufacturing Co. of Clarksdale, Miss., that the court should not permit the union to participate because it was not a "person aggrieved."

"At this point in time and in the development of law in this area," Judge Clayton said in his opinion, "this court is bound to say that the plaintiff union is a party aggrieved within the meaning" of the law.

The court agreed with the argument that the union's duty of fair representation "forbids neutrality and compels the union to exert its bargaining efforts in behalf of the victims of discrimination."

The ruling was one step in the union's effort to eliminate unfair employment practices at the cottonseed and soybean oil processing plant where the UCWA won bargaining rights on May 14, 1965. The next step is expected to be a hearing on the facts of the case.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission first refused to process a union complaint, filed a year ago, on the ground that only individuals can file charges. Five employes then filed complaints and later, in joint action with the union, sued to compel Planters to end race discrimination practices at its plant. The EEOC then reversed its previous ruling and sustained the ICWU complaint. Meanwhile the lawsuit stayed on the court docket.

Chemical Workers Pres. Walter L. Mitchell said his union filed a complaint, and then the lawsuit, because it could not get the company to agree to contract terms that were not discriminatory.

The EEOC, which has the duty of enforcing the Civil Rights law, ruled recently that Planters violated the law by paying Negro workers at much lower rates than white employes doing substantially the same work, excluding Negroes from certain plant jobs and clerical positions, basing its vacation system on race, and maintaining segregated locker room, restroom and drinking facilities.

College-Bound Youths Urged To Apply Now

Workers with children who want to start college in the autumn of 1967 are warned that now is the time to begin working on it.

More young men and women want to go to college than ever before, the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has pointed out, and anyone who waits until next spring to think of registration or seeking scholarship bids is likely to be shut out.

Students are advised that right now they should be studying college catalogues, writing for admission blanks and asking for financial forms so they can apply for scholarship aid.

Requests for admission to at least two good colleges should be in the mail before the coming Thanksgiving Day, the department recommends. If financial aid, National Defense Education Act loans or a freshman scholarship is needed, prospective collegians should state their case to the schools they select by early in December.

Some of the better colleges, the department notes, close admissions by March, most others by Apr. 1.

GIFT OF $1,000 from the AFL-CIO for victims of Typhoon Cora in the Ryukyu Islands was presented to Seiho Matsuoka (right), chief executive of the island government, by Jack Muth (center), Far East representative of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and Pres. Kokichi Kameko of Kenrokyo, the Okinawa labor federation. Also being presented is $50 in personal contributions from the personnel of the ICFTU's Okinawa and Tokyo offices.

Group Practice Doctors Win Full Hospital Rights

Bellaire, O.—Three physicians on the staff of the labor-backed Medical Foundation of Bellaire have scored major gains in their long fight for full professional privileges in area hospitals and medical societies.

The group staffs three clinics operated by the foundation which is a member of the Group Health Association of America, composed of prepaid group practice service units. Members of several unions, notably the Steelworkers and Mine Workers, serve on the laymen's board of the foundation.

Recent developments in the physicians' fight for full rights were:

- Doctors James E. Sams, a retired Army colonel, and Daniel J. Birmingham won an arbitration case giving them membership in the Belmont County (Ohio) Medical Society.
- The same two physicians and Dr. Jack L. Paradise won rejection in U.S. District Court for the Northern District of West Virginia of a motion to dismiss their suit against the Wheeling Hospital and the Ohio Valley General Hospital, both in Wheeling. The three charged the hospitals had discriminated against them in refusing to grant staff privileges.

The arbitration decision grew out of suits Sams filed in 1963 against the Belmont County Medical Society, which had refused him membership, and the City Hospital of Bellaire, which had denied him staff privileges.

The action ended in an out-of-court agreement in May 1965. Under it the hospital admitted Sams to its staff and agreed on binding arbitration in future disputes involving group physicians; the medical society agreed to arbitration in the case of any physician rejected for membership.

Sams and Birmingham were rejected by narrow margins when the medical society voted on their applications last November. They invoked the arbitration clause and won a ruling that they were entitled to membership.

The decision established the principle, foundation spokesmen said, that the medical society, required by its bylaws to solicit the membership of all qualified physicians in the county, may not reject applications merely by vote, as if it were a private club, but must have reasons it can defend before an arbitrator.

In the U.S. District Court case Judge Robert E. Maxwell's ruling established the principle that a private hospital receiving funds under the Hill-Burton Act cannot discriminate against applicants for staff privileges when the discrimination violates the 14th Amendment—even when race or color is not an issue.

A case "where non-Negroes seek redress from the possible deprivation of their 14th Amendment rights," he said in rejecting the Wheeling hospitals' argument, cannot be distinguished "from a case where the plaintiffs are members of the Negro race."

Many of the hospitals' patients come from nearby Ohio.

Jobless Rate Drops to 3.8%, Negro Employment Trails

porting that "the job situation for Negroes and for unskilled workers showed no significant change after a deterioration from April to August."

When the overall jobless rate declined from 4.0 percent in January to 3.7 percent in February and held at that level in April, optimism bloomed. It was with the April job report that Ross told the press there was every expectation the jobless rate would fall to 3.5 percent by year's end.

The rate bounced back to 4.0 percent in May and June, however, and edged down to 3.9 percent in July and August before improving to September's 3.8 percent.

In releasing the September figures, Ross shied from making predictions. Asked to forecast the period ahead, he said the jobless rate "could go a little lower." He put stress rather on the generally strong employment situation.

The most obvious improvement in September came in the sharp rise of nearly a half-million jobs for women 25 years of age and over, pushing their total to 20.7 million, seasonally adjusted. This rise was traced to improved job opportunities.

The net result, the Labor Dept. said, was that non-farm employment rose as expected by about 400,000 to 64.9 million, a record high. Payroll jobs have swelled by 3 million since September a year ago, the report said.

On the unemployment side of the picture, the number of people seeking work and failing to find it totaled 2.6 million. This was a seasonal decline of 350,000 from August.

Unemployment usually edges down in October and then rises with cutbacks in agriculture, construction and other seasonal activities, the report observed. Thus far this year, unemployment has deviated little from seasonal patterns, the report added.

Using the national jobless rate of 3.8 percent as a standard, the situation of particular groups may be illuminated.

The Negro jobless rate hung high at 7.8 percent in September, not significantly changed from the 7.9 percent average in the May to August period. The jobless rate for whites was 3.3 percent in September compared with 3.4 percent in the May-August period.

"The ratio of Negro to white unemployment rates continues at 2.4 to 1, a considerable rise from the 2 to 1 ratio which has been prevalent in recent years," the Labor Dept. said.

Confessing they could not explain why the Negro was not sharing proportionately in the nation's employment growth, the Labor Dept. spokesmen rested on the report's account of what the statistics show:

"The deterioration in the Negro job situation during the late spring and summer resulted from inadequate employment gains for Negroes in the semi-skilled, unskilled and farm occupations, with a consequent rise in the level of unemployment among inexperienced workers.

"In the service occupations, which include private household and other service jobs, employment actually declined whereas a moderate increase is usual during this period."

Ross offered figures which compared the first four months with the second four months of recent years. In the 1963-65 period, joblessness among experienced Negro workers declined by an average of 114,000 between the two quarters of each year. In 1966, however, unemployment in this group rose by 31,000.

Ross tentatively suggested that automation and mechanization on the farm and in the factory may be wiping out Negro-held jobs. He suggested also that Negroes may be forsaking domestic work for jobs with a greater status and future.

The job picture for workers with good professional or manual skills and with good training and experience remains very favorable, the report said. The jobless rates were 2.3 percent for white-collar workers and 1.8 percent for skilled craftsmen.

Married men, who make up more than half the labor force, had a jobless rate of only 1.9 percent.

On the other hand, those with less skill and experience fare poorly. The jobless rate for unskilled workers stood at 5.8 percent.

In contract construction, employment fell by 116,000 to 3.5 million, a decline slightly more than seasonal. On a seasonally adjusted basis, however, construction employment was slightly above a year ago but still down 200,000 from its March peak due to the slowdown in private residential construction.

Manufacturing employment rose by 125,000 over the month to 19.5 million. Seasonally adjusted, manufacturing was down by 75,000 from August, reflecting the departure of teenagers. Compared to September 1965, manufacturing was up by 1 million.

Factory workers' weekly earnings averaged $113.44 in September, up $1.66 from August, the report noted. The workweek was unchanged at 41.4 hours, so the entire rise was attributed to a 4-cent increase in hourly earnings to $2.74, an all-time high. About half the rise, however, was linked to the return to payrolls of some 150,000 high-paid auto strikers.

Bay State Delegates Set Legislative Goals

Boston—More than 1,200 delegates to the Massachusetts State AFL-CIO convention adopted a broad-ranging legislative action program and voted to back it with a stepped-up political effort.

With only a scattering of dissenting votes, the convention voted to raise per capita payments from 6 to 7 cents a month, with the increase earmarked for COPE.

A resolution calling for expanded political activity by labor declared:

"Singly our voices are weak; in chorus they are strong. Singly, our campaign dollars are anonymous, small change; together they are recognizable representatives of a definite point of view. . . . Separately we have not the resources to inform ourselves on issues; together we have."

By unanimous or near-unanimous votes, the convention endorsed the Democratic candidates in the statewide races, including Endicott Peabody for the U.S. Senate and Edward J. McCormack, Jr., for governor.

The State AFL-CIO had gathered signatures to petition to referendum the state sales tax enacted by the legislature, and the convention urged a vote against "the unfair and regressive sales tax."

At the state level, delegates called for a sickness disability program for persons out of work as a result of illness, more adequate unemployment and workmen's compensation, jobless benefits for persons out of work as a result of a lengthy labor dispute, and elimination of present overtime exemptions from the state minimum wage law.

The convention also called for regulation of fees charged by private employment agencies, citing "exorbitant fees" levied by many agencies.

In the federal area, convention resolutions asked a 35-hour workweek, urged strong federal standards on unemployment insurance, endorsed civil rights legislation sought by the AFL-CIO and called for congressional passage of the onsite picketing bill and repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

ICFTU Urges Public Opinion Role To Increase Effectiveness of UN

United Nations, N.Y.—The voice of the free peoples of the world must be heard more loudly in the halls of the United Nations if the world body is to increase its effectiveness, particularly in the area of human rights and economic and social problems.

This is the dominant theme in the annual statement of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions presented to the 21st session of the UN General Assembly. As simple as it sounds, the statement touches on a subject which more and more is being privately discussed by officials and delegates.

Speaking as the ICFTU representative to the UN, Irving Brown said that the UN decisions suffered from "a crisis of implementation," meaning that the UN General Assembly or Security Council may propose but the 120-odd member countries dispose—they can either obey or flout decisions.

"It is our contention," said Brown, "that the mobilization of public opinion in order to influence government policy and decision is vital to the successful operation of the United Nations."

To achieve this mobilization, nongovernmental organizations recognized by the UN, like the ICFTU, should be involved "in a more permanent and continuous participation in the work of the United Nations," said Brown.

It is not enough, he continued, to appeal to non-governmental bodies "to become mere transmission belts" for the UN. What is needed, he said, is "an implementation procedure" through which governments would be obliged to account for their compliance or lack of compliance with fundamental policy decisions and resolutions of the UN.

The ICFTU memorandum, which is distributed to member nations and the UN secretariat, also dealt with the problems of Southern Africa. It asserted that "the fight for freedom in South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and the so-called Portuguese territories in Africa cannot be confined only to the normal, traditional legal channels." It called for UN consideration of strategic economic sanctions against South Africa and boycotts to cripple the export-import trade of the three Southern African countries.

Describing apartheid as "an imminent threat to the peace of the world," the ICFTU said that racialism in South Africa has "become one of the more vicious aspects of an almost totalitarian regime."

Of particular interest to delegations from less developed countries was the section on trade and development, which warned of the dangers arising from "the continuing gap between the poor and the rich nations, between what is now called the North and South of the world."

To help resolve these socio-economic problems, the ICFTU is convening a worldwide economic conference for next year, probably in an African country, "to mobilize the forces of the free trade union movement, especially in the industrial world, to work with and reinforce the efforts of the trade unions in the developing nations to achieve the objective of a fuller and more prosperous economy."

Fake Letter Creates Doubt:

Pan American Vote Set Aside by Board

The National Mediation Board has set aside a fraud-tinged representation election in which the Teamsters sought to oust the Railway Clerks as bargaining agent for 7,500 clerical employes of Pan American World Airways.

The election had been conducted by mail, with ballots sent to employes Aug. 8 and scheduled to be returned not later than Sept. 7.

During this period, Pan Am employes received a fraudulent letter, signed with a faked signature of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, sent in an envelope carrying an unauthorized reproduction of the signature seal of the Railway Clerks' air transport division. It advocated a course of action which ran counter to the election strategy of the Railway Clerks and could have handed the unit over to the Teamsters.

Meany called for a thorough federal investigation of the "attempted victimization" of Pan Am employes and said the forged document was "par for the course as far as the Teamsters are concerned."

Ballots Uncounted

The National Mediation Board, which is the labor-management relations agency for the airline and railroad industries, set aside the election and said the ballots will remain uncounted.

In a letter explaining its action, the mediation board said:

"Information had come to the board's attention of sufficient gravity as to create serious doubt whether the balloting in this case had been conducted in an atmosphere which would enable employes of Pan American World Airways to exercise a free choice concerning representation."

It found there was "sufficient cause to set aside the purported election and order a new election." The new vote, the board said, will be conducted "promptly." But it did not immediately set a date.

The Railway Clerks' air transport division hailed the board's decision to throw out the ballots as a "victory" and urged that any new election be postponed until federal investigative agencies complete their probe of the "fraud and forgery" that marked the first vote.

A formal brief filed by the union with the mediation board stressed that "Pan American employes are entitled to know who practiced fraud and misrepresentation upon them before they are called upon to cast another ballot."

Under National Mediation Board rules, the Teamster raid could not succeed if a majority of eligible employes did not vote in the election. The Railway Clerks, therefore, decided not to allow its name to appear on the ballot and urged members to boycott the election.

The fake letter and a fraudulent leaflet purportedly issued by the Railway Clerks called for a write-in vote for the Railway Clerks—directly contrary to the union's strategy.

Workweek Cut Urged For Rail Supervisors

Chicago—Delegates to the Railway & Airway Supervisors convention were urged to list a shorter workweek and a cost-of-living escalator as high-priority bargaining goals.

James P. Tahney, who served as president of the supervisors' organization since its founding in 1934, said an escalator clause is "a 'must' item if we are to keep pace with the continuous rising cost of living."

His report to the convention also called on the delegates to look ahead to the employment problems of an economy lacking the artificial stimulus of the Viet Nam war.

"The shorter workweek will be essential," Tahney reported, "if we are to keep unemployment down and our economy sound."

The union's "objectives for the future," he suggested, should stress the goal of "obtaining the six-hour day and the four-day workweek," with Wednesday as well as Saturday and Sundays a day of rest.

Apart from the employment issue, a shorter workweek is justified, Tahney asserted, because of heavier burdens on rail and airline supervisors arising out of mergers and massive technological changes.

"These new methods which have brought increased duties and responsibilities must bring improved compensation and working conditions for all supervisors," Tahney proposed.

He also urged continuation beyond 1971 of the supplemental pension plan negotiated by rail unions and management, an increase from eight to 12 in the number of paid holidays, and improved vacations ranging from three weeks after one year to six weeks after 10 years.

The report to the union's biennial convention noted representation victories for various groups of foremen on the Erie Lackawanna, the Long Island Railroad and the Louisville & Nashville over the past two years.

Election of officers to four-year terms was on the agenda of the three-day convention, in addition to action on resolutions and guest speakers from government, labor and the railroad industry.

Safety Pact Ends Strike At Auto Plant

Detroit — A protest walkout against safety conditions and work standards at the Chrysler stamping plant in Twinsburg, O., ended when the company agreed to correct the conditions, the Auto Workers announced here.

The five-day strike of 4,200 Twinsburg workers affected some 44,000 UAW members at seven other plants in the U.S. and Canada, the union said. All resumed production after the striking UAW Local 122 ratified a 14-point agreement worked out by union negotiators headed by Chrysler Dept. Dir. Douglas Fraser.

Major strike cause, Fraser said, was the condition of hi-lo lift trucks which plant workers called unsafe. The settlement includes a provision that Chrysler will purchase 16 new hi-los, start a "crash" program for the repair of other lift trucks and hire five additional mechanics to keep the trucks in repair.

Twinsburg members voted 981-190 to approve the offer. Their strike had pinched off the supply of parts to other plants and caused layoffs of four days or less to workers at the Hamtramck assembly plant here and others in Windsor, Ont., St. Louis, Warren, Mich., Belvidere, Ill., Los Angeles and Newark, Del.

CWA Talks Reopened As Installers Reject Pact

New York—The Communications Workers reopened contract negotiations with the Bell telephone system's Western Electric Co. following the turndown of a proposed new three-year agreement in a nationwide referendum of company installers.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne met here with presidents of the union's 18 Western Electric locals and later announced he would meet with company representatives to report membership dissatisfaction with terms agreed to conditionally a month ago by labor and management negotiators.

Strike Action Deferred

The talks will continue in an effort to avoid strike action, the union said.

A ballot count by Ernst and Ernst, certified public accountants, gave the results of a secret mail ballot of affected members as 7,240 for contract ratification, 8,231 against. The union represents about 23,000 men who install telephone equipment at exchanges and switching stations.

Local presidents told Beirne at their meeting here that a leading complaint against the proposed agreement is in the area of locality upgradings. There is strong feeling also, the presidents of some locals reported, against wage differentials between northern and southern locals, and against East-West differentials.

The union's old contract with Western Electric was extended on a day-to-day basis from its July 28 expiration date, and a walkout had been authorized when negotiators reached tentative agreement in September, subject to membership acceptance or rejection.

The rejected settlement called for wage increases of 13 to 20 cents an hour, with the contract reopenable on money items after 18 months.

Beirne had put the value of the wage-benefit improvements at 7 percent for the 18-month period or 6 percent on a yearly basis.

The proposal also included retroactivity to the scheduled expiration date, an increase from 50 percent to 75 percent in company payments toward health insurance costs, improved vacation terms, reduction of group life insurance payments by employes, and a cut in the amount deducted from pensions depending on social security benefits, beginning next Apr. 1.

The offer included some locality upgradings, and other improvements.

Staff Shifts Made By Rubber Union

Akron, O.—Three new staff changes have been announced by Rubber Workers Pres. Peter Bommarito.

John D. Samels has been named administrative assistant to Bommarito. Samels had served since 1952 as assistant to the union's vice president. Michael Tamburro of Bristol, R. I., will shift from the URW field staff to the union's headquarters at Akron to become assistant to Vice Pres. Kenneth Oldham.

Bommarito also announced the appointment of Curtis Treen as acting director of the Pension & Insurance Dept. Treen has been a URW special representative dealing with supplemental unemployment benefits.

864 Colleges Get U. S. Aid In First Year

Nearly a third of the nation's colleges and their branches received federal funds to help build or remodel classrooms, libraries and laboratories during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1966, the U.S. Office of Education revealed.

Loans and grants under the Higher Education Facilities Act came to about $627 million and resulted in the expenditure of about $2.5 billion by the colleges themselves, the report showed. The improvements, were made by 864 different colleges, universities and branch campuses, the agency said.

The funds were distributed under the act's three titles:

Title I—Nearly $105 million in grants went to 215 public community colleges and technical institutes and $362 million to 622 public and private colleges, all to improve facilities designed primarily for undergraduates.

Title II—To improve graduate schools and centers, $60 million in grants went to 77 institutions.

Title III—Loans totaling nearly $100 million were made to 131 undergraduate and graduate schools.

The USOE noted that some institutions received grants for both graduate and undergraduate construction, and in a number of instances obtained loans as well. The total federal contribution, including both grants and loans, may not exceed more than 75 percent of the cost of building.

reach of major population centers. The House gave tentative approval to an amendment strongly supported by the AFL-CIO to add the "West Beach" area near Gary, Ind., to the national lakeshore. It is subject to a later rollcall vote.

● A bare bones $7.5 million was appropriated by Congress to keep alive the National Teacher Corps, authorized last year to improve education in poverty-area schools but starved of funds despite repeated pleas by the President. Some 1,250 volunteers—teams of experienced and novice teachers—received special training this summer and the money will enable them to be put to work for the balance of the school year.

● The Senate approved a package of major legislative proposals tacked on to a foreign investment tax bill by the Finance Committee. One of the "riders," sponsored by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), would finance presidential election campaigns out of tax funds. An attempt to delete the provision was defeated, 39-33. Another, sponsored by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), would cover the cost of drugs under the voluntary medical insurance portion of medicare.

● The House appointed conferees on the unemployment compensation standards bill, paving the way for an effort to reconcile a weak House bill limited largely to an extension of coverage with a Senate bill providing labor-sought standards on jobless benefits.

● House-Senate conferees met on conflicting versions of "truth-in-packaging" legislation. Here, too, the Senate bill is considerably stronger.

Home Rule Sidetracked

Home rule supporters had hoped to revive the chance of self-government for the District of Columbia by attaching a compromise home rule bill to the college aid legislation as it moved through the Senate.

The Senate last year passed a strong home rule bill. The House, after a bitter fight, substituted a token charter study measure. To compound the problem, the conservative-dominated House District of Columbia Committee refused to agree to a conference with the Senate, thus aborting any chance of a compromise.

Sen. Wayne Morse (D-Ore.), floor manager of the college aid bill, then introduced a home rule amendment. If adopted, the House conferees would have come from the friendly Education & Labor Committee—and the House would have been assured another chance to vote on home rule.

The behind-the-surface hostility to home rule, most observers are convinced, rests in the fact that Washington, D.C., has a Negro majority. Senate southerners served notice they would filibuster any home rule amendment to the college aid bill.

Senate Democratic Leader Mike Mansfield and Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen joined in filing a cloture petition before debate even started on the home rule issue—a move necessitated by the adjournment timetable.

The vote to limit debate was 41-37, far below the two-thirds required by Senate rules. Thirty-one Democrats and 10 Republicans voted for cloture; 22 Democrats and 15 Republicans opposed the move. The effort was then dropped and the Senate moved to speedy passage of the education bill.

The Senate Finance Committee voted 12-4 approval of the President's request for a suspension—until Jan. 1, 1968—of the 7 percent tax credit given businesses on expenditures for new equipment. But it weakened the measure even further than the House did, adding loopholes.

The Senate bill exempts railroad spending for new freight cars. It continues the 7 percent tax windfall on the first $25,000 of spending on new equipment—a wider loophole than the $15,000 exemption added by the House. And it goes beyond the House bill in watering down the Administration proposal to cancel the fast depreciation allowed on the value of new plants. It also postpones the effective date a month.

The AFL-CIO had protested the House loopholes and urged the Senate committee to go back to the original Administration bill.

The Senate Finance Committee also voted to authorize the Treasury Dept. to raise the interest ceiling on long-term government bonds from its historic top of 4.25 percent.

On deck in the House, as the AFL-CIO News went to press, was a hotly-contested battle over the Senate-passed Demonstration Cities bill.

Both the economy bloc and the anti-civil rights forces were trying to beat the bill which is aimed at rehabilitating entire neighborhoods of cities through coordinated programs of housing, health facilities, transportation, recreation and social services.

The Federal-State Employment Service is finding more jobs for the handicapped than at any time since 1945, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced during National Employ the Handicapped Week.

The number of job replacements rose to 301,000 in fiscal 1966 compared with the all-time high of 363,000 set in 1945, when labor-short industry during World War II, recruited persons unable to bear arms, he pointed out.

He cited three factors in assigning reasons for the rise in job placements — labor shortages in some areas, federal manpower training programs, and breakthroughs in medicine and rehabilitation which enable more handicapped persons to qualify for work.

National Employ the Handicapped Week was proclaimed by Pres. Johnson. The September issue of the Labor Dept.'s Employment Service Review was devoted to the handicapped and may be obtained for 40 cents per copy from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402.

Social Security Hike Pledged by Johnson

Baltimore—Substantial increases in social security benefits will be recommended to Congress next January, Pres. Johnson told some 30,000 federal workers who helped launch the medicare program last July 1.

Without disclosing all the details of his upcoming proposals, the President told employes at the Social Security Administration headquarters here they will include:

● An average increase in monthly benefits of 10 percent or more, with proportionately higher increases going to those in the lower brackets. Payments now run from a minimum of $44 to a maximum of $134 per month.

● A basic monthly minimum payment of $100 a month to every worker who retires after being on the social security rolls for 25 years.

● An increase in the permissible earnings an individual may make if he chooses to work part time after being retired from his regular job, without forfeiting his right to social security benefits. The curent maximum is $1,500 per year in earnings.

● The extension of hospital and medical care to more than a million social security beneficiaries who are drawing payments as a result of disability.

In addition, the President said, he was setting up a special task force under Sec. John W. Gardner of the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare and former Gov. Farris Bryant of Florida to develop "a truly modern program for nursing home construction."

Administration sopkesmen estimated the cost of the President's proposed broader benefits at $2 billion plus a year, but suggested that much of this would be covered by the present schedule of social security taxes because payments into the system's Trust Fund are surpassing earlier projections.

The remainder might be covered either by an increase in the tax rate or by broadening the wage-base on which taxes are payable from the current figure of $6,600 a year to $7,800 a year, spokesmen said.

The President paid tribute to the efficiency with which social security operations are handled, pointing out that "the cost of administering" the programs "is only 2.2 cents out of each dollar" paid in through worker contributions.

Payments to beneficiaries are now running at about $20 billion a year, with some 22 million people on the rolls.

Johnson took the occasion of his speech to remind social security workers that when the bill creating the program was pending in 1935, seven minority members of the House Ways & Means Committee denounced it as threatening "a crushing burden on industry and labor" and added that it would "destroy old-age retirement systems set up by private industry."

House opponents tried to kill the bill by sending it back to committee but lost on a 253-149 vote, he remarked, and most of them then tried to "hide their vote" by supporting the measure on passage.

When the medicare fight was pending last year, the President observed, he "had the strange feeling that it had all happened before."

"The nay-sayers dusted off all their old speeches of 30 years ago," he continued, calling the program such things as "socialism, a political hodgepodge and a cruel hoax." They even repeated the tactics of trying to kill it on a motion to recommit but lost again, and 76 House members switched to vote for it on final passage, he commented.

Savings Insurance Raised to $15,000

Persons with deposits in federally-insured banks and savings and loan associations were given added protection against loss in a bill cleared for Pres. Johnson's signature.

Present federal guarantees apply only to the first $10,000 of any account. The new law increases the insurance coverage to $15,000.

Congress Votes Major Bills in Windup

Action on Key Issues Completed

A basketful of major legislation moved from Capitol Hill to the White House to await the President's signature as the 89th Congress—billed as the most productive in history—prepared to close shop.

Its contents included important bills dealing with education, taxes poverty, pollution, packaging and recreation.

The final days of the session were devoted to hammering out House-Senate conference agreements on bills where agreement could be reached—and ditching measures on which the two houses could not agree.

House Republicans made rumbling noises about jamming through an 8 percent boost in social security benefits—at the expense of the major overhaul Pres. Johnson said he will propose at the start of the next Congress. But Senate Democratic and Republican leaders alike threw cold water on the idea and the House Ways & Means Committee decided to postpone action until January.

Two big aid to education bills were cleared for final approval, both authorizing more money than the Administration had sought.

A two-year program of aid to elementary and secondary schools carries a $6.1 billion authorization. Its first-year cost is $2.3 billion, nearly $1 billion more than the budget estimate. The bill includes an expansion of federal aid to school districts serving families of servicemen and federal civilian employes—a program the President sought to phase out. It also lifts the family income ceiling on which grants to schools in poverty areas is based.

A controversy over withholding of federal funds from schools which do not meet desegregation guidelines was resolved by a compromise limiting the time the Office of Education may hold back funds pending a hearing.

The college aid bill authorizes nearly $4 billion over three years to expand the program of grants and loans to help colleges, junior colleges and graduate schools build facilities. It also contains

President Vetoes Guam 'Work' Bill

Pres. Johnson has vetoed a so-called "right-to-work" bill passed by the Guam legislature that would have banned the union shop on the Pacific Island, a U.S. territory.

Gov. Manuel F. L. Guerrero vetoed the bill when it was first passed this summer. But the unicameral ligislature, controlled by the conservative Territorial Party, repassed it over the veto. That left the final decision up to the President, who had 90 days to decide whether to permit the bill to become law.

The White House said the President vetoed the bill just before leaving on his tour of the Pacific.

Guam has only a few unions, the largest of which is made up of federal employes not affected by the law. However, the National Right to Work Committee put on a major campaign for the legislation and in opposition to a presidential veto.

New Program to Aid Cities Wins Congressional Okay

Key Johnson Goal For Great Society

By David L. Perlman

Congress voted final approval of a new demonstration cities program designed to transform decaying areas into decent neighborhoods.

The legislation promises stepped-up federal aid to cities which come up with imaginative plans to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods through improved housing, better schools, recreation facilities, health care centers, social services and improved transit service.

The labor-backed legislation was the major new Great Society program advanced by Pres. Johnson this year.

The President told Congress that the choice was either to "make our cities livable" or else "by timidity and neglect damn them to fester and decay."

The AFL-CIO expressed its "stout support" for the concept of the program in congressional testimony. When the bill came up in the House for a showdown battle, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany reiterated labor's endorsement in a telegram to all House members.

Republicans led a savage attack on the legislation during two days of House debate but were licked on every major point. A move to recommit the $1.2 billion bill with instructions to strike out everything but $24 million in planning funds was beaten, 175-149. The House then passed the bill, 178-141.

The margin of victory was greater than most observers had anticipated. House leaders had twice postponed taking up the bill because of uncertainties over prospects for its passage.

Early in the debate, Rep. Paul A. Fino (R-N.Y.) sought to kill the bill by making what appeared to be an

Meany Hails Declaration On Rioting

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany pledged the labor movement's "firm and unswerving" commitment to civil rights progress in a letter praising a declaration of principles issued by a group of Negro leaders.

Signers of the declaration, including AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph, condemned "both rioting and the demagoguery that feeds it," a pointed repudiation of "black power" extremists. (Texts of declaration and Meany letter, Page 10.)

The Negro leaders warned that "a retreat by white America from the national commitment to racial justice" would be "disastrous" to the entire nation as well as to the Negro minority.

They called for renewed Negro-white cooperation to wipe out discrimination in all its forms and to undertake "the massive actions which alone can turn the downward tide of Negro economic status" and

Locals Act to Extend Victory Pact at GE

By Eugene A. Kelly

A national contract settlement that broke General Electric's "take it or leave it" bargaining approach spurred negotiations by 11 AFL-CIO unions for agreements on a local plant level and also at Westinghouse, the other giant in the electrical manufacturing industry.

The national agreement was reached in bargaining by the 11-union coalition two days before an Oct. 17 strike deadline. It was followed by a series of strikes over local issues and unsettled grievances at scattered GE plants.

T-H at Evendale

One strike—against the GE jet plane engine plant in Evendale, O.—brought an injunction requested by Pres. Johnson by cable from Hawaii on the ground that national defense production was imperiled. A U.S. District Court judge in Dayton, O., ordered 6,100 strikers back to work, and they complied.

But strikes of more than 25,000 GE workers continued elsewhere over local contract supplements. Some supplemental agreements were reached. At Westinghouse, unions coordinating their negotiations extended contracts on a day-to-day basis while talks inched along.

The national GE agreement was hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as "a major accomplishment for collective bargaining" with benefits "substantially better than the original offer" by the company a month ago.

"Credit for these advances is due primarily to the unity established among our unions and to the determination of their membership," Meany told a meeting of the 11-union bargaining committee at which the national settlement was announced. The meeting had originally been called to prepare for a walkout on Oct. 17.

Expressing his thanks to a Presidentially-appointed panel of three cabinet officers for their "patient and constructive help," Meany re-

Solidly Liberal Douglas Battling Strong GOP Challenge in Illinois

By Willard Shelton

Chicago—The veteran Sen. Paul H. Douglas, tall and hickory-tough, is many people's idea of what a U.S. Senator should look like and vote like—fiercely independent although solidly liberal, and a constructive influence throughout his career.

Now running for a fourth consecutive term as a Democrat, he is admittedly in the fight of his life against the younger (47 years) Republican Charles H. Percy, the onetime Bell & Howell business executive who is the only new face the GOP has produced in this state in years.

The campaign was interrupted for three weeks because of the private grief of the Percy family over the brutal murder of Percy's daughter, Valerie.

Douglas, as shocked as anyone else at the tragedy, halted his campaigning until Percy found it possible to resume. It cost him some momentum but this has now been regained, apparently, and in his campaign speeches he is scoring points (Percy is "chameleon-like" on many issues) that the GOP candidate feels it necessary to answer.

Says Percy: "My mind has been changed because of the circumstances and the facts. When I learn new things I change my mind."

One of the things Percy changed his mind on was creation of an Indiana Dunes National Park—an eight-year project that Douglas began almost singlehandedly and finally won in the final week of this Congress.

Percy quipped at one moment that Douglas had become a "third senator" from Indiana, although the dunes will furnish recreation space for more people from Chicago and

Skill Upgrading Plan Gets Funds to Expand

St. Louis—Approval of an on-the-job training program aimed at upgrading the skills and incomes of 1,500 construction laborers in 13 states and the District of Columbia was announced by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz at the Laborers convention here.

The program will be administered by the Laborers and various employer organizations with which it has contracts. Application for approval was sought by the union following the initial success of a similar program sponsored by the Laborers Northern California District Council and the employers its locals bargain with.

Wirtz told the convention that the program had been developed to help meet "persistent skill shortages" in more than 20 construction occupations.

Tentative agreement has been reached, he said, to train 150 workers each in Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois and Washington; 100 each in Delaware, the District of Columbia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Indiana and Missouri; and 50 each in Rhode Island, Idaho and Utah.

The trainees will be chosen on the basis of their annual income record and the length of their unemployment because of lack of skills. The training period will be from six to eight weeks, varying with the occupation and the area where the skill is in short supply.

Placement Service

While undergoing instruction, the worker will receive a wage, fringe benefits and virtual assurance of employment on completion of the course, which will include classroom instruction where needed. The Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare will help in giving related instruction in cases where it is essential if a worker is to move into a more skilled job.

The program, Wirtz said, is expected to cost about $1 million.

"On-the-job training is the best possible way to meet the present manpower needs of the nation," he said.

"Not only does OJT upgrade skills, it also provides the unemployed worker with a job immediately and gives him assurance that he will have a job when he finishes his training.

"In addition, OJT provides for a working partnership between public and private training functions—with the emphasis where it should be, on private responsibility. These programs will pay off in jobs for the unemployed and skills for industry. They will also repay their cost to the government through the taxes on the increased income the workers earn. Everyone benefits from such a program."

Wirtz was warm in his praise of the union and its employers "for their foresight in meeting the challenge of changing technology and rising skill demands" with "this incisive program" of training workers in new skills.

Alexander Named To New Steel Post

Pittsburgh — Steelworkers President I. W. Abel announced the appointment of L. Bruce Alexander, veteran staff member of USWA District 15, as a staff representative with the international union's Dept. of Education.

Abel said Alexander would be assigned full-time to community services and community development projects. This marks the first time that the union has assigned a staff representative to such work on a full-time basis.

The 56-year-old Alexander has been a union member since the early days of the Steel Workers Organizing Committee and was elected president of Local 2227 at the Irwin Works of U. S. Steel Corp. in 1939. He was appointed a district staff representative in 1941.

Railroad Union Calls for Cut In Workweek

Chicago—A resolution calling for a workweek of four six-hour days, with Wednesdays, Saturdays and Sundays off, was unimously adopted at the 28th biennial convention of the Railway & Airway Supervisors here.

The delegates, calling the condition of the economy "basically sound," declared:

"In order to keep the economy moving in the right direction there is no doubt that this nation will have to recognize and come to the shorter workweek and shorter work-day."

Pres. James P. Tahney, the only leader the union has had since it was founded in 1934, was re-elected to another term, as were other officers whose terms had expired this year—Vice Presidents Al T. Stone and T. W. Stiarwalt, Corresponding Sec. G. D. Martin and Recording Sec. W. H. Taylor.

The financial status of the railroad retirement and unemployment insurance systems has been greatly strengthened since changes were made in 1963 to reduce a long-term deficit, A. E. Lyon, labor member of the Railroad Retirement Board, reported.

"In the case of unemployment insurance," he explained, "the higher maximum contributions rate of 4 percent plus the steady drop in benefit outlays as railroad unemployment sank to lower levels caused the deficit to drop by nearly $90 million."

Other speakers included Louis J. Gambaccini, deputy director of rail transportation for the Port of New York Authority; C. H. Heasley, labor sales representative for savings bonds, and William J. Thyer of the Labor Dept.

'Program for Progress':

Organizing, Servicing Goals Set Theme for Laborers' Parley

St. Louis—A broad "program for progress," ranging from expanded organizing efforts to new services and protections for members, was outlined to the 15th convention of the Laborers in the keynote speech of Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi.

Moreschi told the 2,200 delegates that the union's membership has already swelled past the 500,000 mark, and he called on every member to join in a drive "to organize our entire construction jurisdiction, on home building, in heavy and highway construction, in suburban and rural areas, and in the South and farm states."

"After 30 years of effort, the National Labor Relations Board—just one week ago—decided for the first time, squarely and unequivocally, that construction laborers' units were appropriate for purposes of collective bargaining," he reported.

"This historic decision, affording the protection of federal labor law to construction laborers, removes one of the greatest handicaps to organization. I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of this decision to our affiliates in protecting their organized work and in helping to organize non-union laborers."

Another major project in the union's future, Moreschi said, is training construction laborers to round out and increase their skills. Federal approval for a 15-state program was announced in a convention speech by Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz. (Story this page.)

Program of Action

Also already under way and due for expansion, or slated for early initiation, he went on, are programs to meet the needs of federal employes; the chartering and revitalizing of district councils; establishment of a contract review division in international headquarters to provide locals with technical and bargaining assistance; plans to protect every active member and his family with portable welfare and pension coverage by 1970; expansion of the existing Legislative & Public Affairs Dept. and the Political Action League, and establishment of a public relations section.

In addition, Moreschi said, the international union will set up a system of auditing to help local and district secretary-treasurers comply with increasingly complex legal and constitutional obligations.

In his report to the convention Moreschi proposed that "serious merger efforts be undertaken with other international unions in the plant and public service fields, particularly with international unions in the building supply and material fields."

"If these merger efforts prove successful in the latter field," he pointed out, "they will provide us with an identifiiable industrial base, would in turn strengthen our position in the building and construction industry and would provide us with a continuous product from mining and production through the supply shops on to the building sites where our members would help install the material."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler hailed the accomplishments of the 89th Congress and warned that "every single gain we have made this year can be washed out on Nov. 8."

"All the good that the 89th Congress did can be blotted out by the 90th Congress," he reiterated.

"All the bright hopes we have for building upon this great record can be wrecked on Election Day.

'Go to the Polls'

"That's why the AFL-CIO urges you—each of you—to go to the polls on Election Day. Take your wives with you; take those in your family of voting age; take your fellow-workers with you; take your neighbors with you; take your friends with you.

"Go to the polls on Election Day and vote for the kind of candidates who will support the kind of program we want. . . ."

Schnitzler expressed particular satisfaction at enactment of the $1.60 hourly minimum wage effective Feb. 1, 1968, but declared "we will not be satisfied until the federal minimum wage is much higher than the poverty level in this country—that means a $2 minimum wage."

"We will not be satisfied until every worker engaged in interstate commerce is protected by the minimum wage law, and that will mean protection for millions denied it," he continued.

Farm Workers, Too

"We will not be satisfied until all the agricultural workers in this country, those workers who were for too long America's forgotten people, also have the full protection of this act."

Sec. of Housing & Urban Development Robert C. Weaver, in a speech read for him by his assistant, Kermit Bailer, called enactment of the demonstration cities bill "a great victory for our hard-pressed cities."

"For the first time they will be able to mass a vast array of good urban programs to work on both the human and physical decay in whole slum neighborhoods," he said. "For the first time cities will have ample federal funds to experiment and innovate with locally-conceived solutions to pressing local problems.

"Most of all, passage of this measure is a great victory for the American people. There can now be a concerted effort to help those who need it most—those disadvantaged by age, poverty or race—in urban ghettos. There will be a physical rebuilding of slum housing, and better education for children, and more jobs for heads of families."

The federal government is determined to make rehabilitation of existing buildings an essential part of its plans for the future, Weaver said, adding that "there is no union more likely to be called upon to do the work than the 500,000 members of the Laborers."

"To do a job across the nation, of this size, and quickly enough to avoid simply creating more housing that becomes obsolete," he said, "means that rehabilitation must become a major new industry in the construction field. . . .

New Work Source

"To you in labor it will mean a new source of work, scheduled the year around, so that many of you for the first time can count upon wages the year around. Because there is so much of it to do, it will be unaffected by the fluctuations of the housing market. It will be uninterrupted by fluctuations of the weather. It is a chance for you to come in out of the cold and the wind and the rain of both economics and climate."

Acting on internal union affairs, the delegates re-elected Moreschi, Sec.-Treas. Peter Fosco and eight vice presidents. They faced in later action a series of resolutions to carry out Moreschi's proposed program and a proposal for increasing per capita payments to the international.

Speakers still to be heard included Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress, Pres. Walter P. Reuther of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers and Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept.

OPENING SESSION of the Laborers 15th convention, held in St. Louis, is shown in this over-all view. More than 2,200 delegates set a new record for representation of more than 500,000 members.

'Boulwarism' Broken:

Strikes Over Local Issues Close Scattered GE Plants

ported that neither the panel nor the unions were able to move GE to settle one major issue—the solution of disputes during the life of the new contract.

Noting that GE "absolutely refused to agree to arbitration of many disputes that could end in strikes affecting vital . . . production," Meany declared "the only recourse open to workers with unresolved grievances" is to strike.

Asserting that "the attitude of the company provokes such strikes," he said the unions "intend to act responsibly in handling disputes." But full responsibility for such strikes will, he said, "lie entirely upon the shoulders of General Electric."

Unfinished Agenda

The AFL-CIO president called area wage differentials, wage discrimination against southern and rural workers, and strengthening of the coalition the major items of future business. He pledged help to members of Westinghouse locals and promised that, if negotiations fail to secure an acceptable agreement, the Westinghouse unions "will have our complete support in every way necessary to secure a just settlement."

The national GE pact was ratified by members of the GE Conference Board of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, representing 80,000 of the 115,000 workers for whom the 11 unions bargain.

The committee then sought to translate its terms into agreements covering members of the other 10 unions—Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

Most of the IUE locals also have supplemental agreements with GE, covering items like seniority and the disposal of unresolved grievances. Local and national agreements are part and parcel of the same pact, which must be approved by local union members before final settlement is reached, the union said.

IUE estimated that the value of the gains in the national agreement averages nearly $2,500 per worker over three years. An average GE worker, it said, presently earns $2.85 an hour and gets additional benefits worth 50 cents more. Two years from now his wages will average $3.25 and his fringe benefits another 50 cents under the settlement.

IUE gave these highlights of the contract, which runs to Oct. 26, 1969:

- Wage increases of 4 percent the first year, plus 3 percent in each of two succeeding years, with a minimum hike of 6 cents an hour per year and an average of 30 cents an hour in three years.
- Establishment of a cost-of-living sharing plan to protect workers against "runaway inflation"—a major union objective. Employes are guaranteed a minimum increase of one half of 1 percent for two periods—from October 1966 to October 1967, and from October 1967 to October 1968. Further living cost rises will result in raises to a maximum of 10.5 cents an hour over the term of the contract.
- Additional raises up to 10 cents an hour for skilled trades and salaried workers.
- Minimum pensions up from $2.70 a month per year of service to $4.50 a month, and other improvements.

The pact also provides pension vesting rights after 10 years; a ninth paid holiday; two weeks' vacation after two years of service; retraining credits, increased insurance benefits for employes and dependents, and a savings proposal.

The IUE said in a statement that "the unity and determination of 11 AFL-CIO unions broke Boulwarism" and forced GE management to take part in genuine collective bargaining for the first time in more than a decade. It added:

"Although the unions were not able to gain everything the workers wanted and needed, the victory was substantial enough for the unions to pledge a continuation of their coordinated activities in contract enforcement as well as in negotiations.

Union negotiators warned GE early in September that, unless local managers were freed by the company to "start coming to grips" with local issues, strikes would take place even though a national contract was reached.

Government mediators were told the same thing but GE, the AFL-CIO national committee said, "did not give its local managers the go-ahead until after the GE national agreement was reached. This left too little time for settlement."

Local Issues Left

As the President began his Asian tour, strikes commenced over local issues, as the union had warned in statements pointing out that GE had refused to agree to any other way to settle disputes.

The Dept. of Justice then sought a temporary injunction against a strike of the Auto Workers and Machinists at Evendale. It acted at the direction of the President, who told Acting Atty. Gen. Ramsey Clark in a cable from Honolulu that the strike would "imperil the national safety" if it continued.

The President was said to have acted on the basis of an affidavit from McNamara stating that the Evendale plant was the only one making engines for the F-4 Phantom jet fighter plane used in Viet Nam.

A UAW attorney told Judge Carl A. Weinman in Dayton that the T-H statute is "unconstitutional, ill-advised, unfair and one-sided." The judge said he will hold another hearing in 10 days, when the injunction may be renewed for 70 more days.

Said UAW Vice Pres. Leonard Woodcock of the return-to-work order: "It would seem to the union and its members that a company which advertises its patriotism as loudly as does GE would welcome arbitration to peacefully settle such disputes. This union has made every reasonable effort to avert these local strikes but the corporation will not let its local managements settle."

THE NEW NATIONAL agreement with General Electric Co. is a credit to labor unity and membership determination, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told a meeting of the 11-union bargaining committee. Meany is shown taking notes at the meeting just prior to the settlement announcement.

Kentucky Unions Battle Unfair Income Tax Plan

Louisville—Support for Kentucky labor's battle against a local income tax system whose burden falls most heavily on wage earners was voted by delegates to the 8th convention of the Kentucky AFL-CIO.

The convention elected three top officers for another term and instructed them to continue working on the national level for the repeal of Taft-Hartley Section 14(b), making union shop agreements unlawful, and on the local level for the defeat of any more regressive taxes.

Executive Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle reported that the state body has challenged a state law allowing cities and counties to give tax money to Chambers of Commerce for industrial promotion, and also successfully opposed a gross tax on earnings sought by the city of Owensboro.

Both measures were authorized by the last session of the legislature and demonstrate the need for intensified support of COPE-endorsed candidates for office, convention speakers pointed out.

Ezelle reported the federation has filed suit in McCracken County Circuit Court alleging that the city of Paducah violated the state constitution when it bought land for $75,000, and gave it to the Intl. Shoe Co. to tout the advantages of cheap labor in Kentucky. The plant now is operating with some 500 non-union workers at low wages, the suit charged.

The convention approved reports by Pres. Henry Seibert, Executive Vice Pres. John E. McKiernan and Ezelle; elected 23 "organization" candidates for the executive council; voted to raise Ezelle's salary from $13,500 a year to $15,000, and set up a pension plan for state federation employes.

The delegates also asked that Gov. Edward T. Breathitt direct county farm agents to work with the National Farm Organization instead of being "toadies" to the Farm Bureau; urged labor representation on the State Fair Board, and passed 29 resolutions including one of cooperation with COPE in helping elect endorsed candidates.

Convention speakers included AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; Assistant Dir. Frank Fernbach of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research; Gov. Breathitt; Miles C. Stanley, assistant to federation Pres. George Meany, and Louisville Mayor Kenneth Schmeid.

Schnitzler said repeal of the "right to work" law section of T-H still is a major labor objective.

Fernbach lauded the state labor movement for opposing occupational taxes. Of four special types of taxation, a payroll tax is the most unfair, he said, because it taxes a worker's gross income and leaves untouched all income from capital gains, interest, rent or dividends.

GE, Westinghouse Set Profit Records

The General Electric Co. and Westinghouse Electric Corp issued financial reports showing profits breaking all previous records.

GE said third quarter profits were $99 million, up 15 percent over 1965's third quarter, and the nine-month net was $271 million, up 14 percent.

Westinghouse profits were $31 million for the quarter, $90 million for nine months, up 13.9 and 18 percent respectively.

Central Body Support Urged by Schnitzler

San Francisco—A strong plea for greater affiliation of local unions with state and local central bodies was made by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler at the 17th triennial convention of the Roofers.

"If we are talking about 100 percent success in reaching our goal," he told the largest convention in the union's history, "we are going to have an army that represents 100 percent of our membership.

"You just cannot win a 100 percent victory with a 50 percent army."

Schnitzler also praised the AFL-CIO internal disputes plan as a substantial aid to organizing and effective bargaining.

The plan has led to a "constantly growing number" of associations of international unions in joint organizing efforts, he said, with the result that more than 1.2 million new members have joined AFL-CIO unions since the beginning of 1964, and membership exceeds 13.7 million.

He called the recent General Electric Co. settlement only the latest example of "good results" flowing from joint negotiations sparked by the disputes plan.

Roofers Pres. Charles D. Aquadro bitterly attacked Congress for its failure to repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits states to outlaw the union shop.

"Despite Pres. Johnson's pledge, Congress led by Sen. [Everett McKinley] Dirksen (R) and Rep. [Gerald R.] Ford (R) and backed by reactionaries of both houses failed to pass the repeal bill," Aquadro said.

Dirksen Hit

"The fact that Sen. Dirksen may have been motivated by other factors, such as getting support for his constitutional amendment to set aside the one man, one vote decision of the U.S. Supreme Court, is galling.

"He was willing to trade away the economic security of millions of workers to gain the return of the agricultural bloc to power."

Aquadro urged members of the union to step up their political activity. He pointed out as a typical benefit to workers the fact that 50 of the 51 liberal congressmen elected in 1964 voted to save medicare when a switch of 24 votes would have doomed the measure.

Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. outlined the internal operations of the department and urged building trades unions to work together so as to strengthen labor's position.

370,000 Aged To Get Special Monthly Aid

An estimated 370,000 persons 72 or older who are not eligible for regular social security benefits will begin receiving a special monthly payment in November, the Social Security Administration announced.

Under a little-noted social security amendment adopted by Congress this year, benefits are available to persons over 72 if they are not eligible for a higher governmental retirement pension, either from the federal government or a state or local government.

The special payments, financed from general Treasury funds and not from social security tax contributions, amount to $35 for a single man or woman and $52.50 for a married couple. Persons now getting public assistance payments from a federally-aided program must choose between the new payments or their public assistance. They cannot get both.

The majority of persons 72 and older not covered by social security have signed up for the free hospital insurance portion of the medicare program. They have already been contacted by their local social security offices and, if eligible for the cash benefits, will receive their first checks early in November. Others who may be eligible should call or write their nearest social security offices to find out if they qualify.

A person who is not yet 72 but who will reach 72 before the end of 1967 can qualify as of the month of his birthday. Starting in 1968, however, only persons with some work in a job covered by social security will be able to go on to the benefit rolls.

KEYNOTE ADDRESS is given by Pres. Felix C. Jones at the opening session of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers convention in Louisville, Ky. About 325 delegates were on hand for the union's 13th convention.

Spur Organizing Gains, Cement Workers Urged

Louisville, Ky.—Pres. Felix C. Jones set the tone of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers 13th convention by calling on delegates to strengthen the union and expand its influence throughout the United States and Canada.

The organizing pendulum has swung to the plus side, he declared, despite "time-consuming and costly litigation in numerous cases before the National Labor Relations Board."

Jones urged districts and locals to help accelerate the growth trend by stepping up their organizing activities.

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William Kircher's address to the delegates emphasized that "if we hope to continue to make gains in the organizing field today, we must give meaning to the hopes, aspirations and needs of today's workers in relation to today, not to something in the distant past."

Executive Dir. Jack Conway of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. covered the activities of the IUD in the fields of legislation, organizing and collective bargaining. He emphasized the importance of the coming congressional elections and urged the union to make the most of membership voting strength to ensure the return of the liberal freshman congressmen.

"Every one of the freshman congressmen," he said, "is going to be in trouble unless we maximize our efforts."

Assistant Dir. Walter Davis of the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education also urged the delegates to spur a step-up in local political activity.

"We stand on the brink of the most important election in history," Davis declared. "There is a big challenge here and we had better pick up the challenge and face it. . . . The stakes are big. . . . The real issue in the campaign is not hate, but progress; let us keep progress coming."

Other speakers included Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and the union's general counsel, Lester Asher. Scheduled to speak later were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler and Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress.

The 325 delegates from the union's locals in the United States and Canada will be asked to increase per capita payments to the internatonal, improve the union's pension and health and welfare plans, change strike procedures, provide for a Canadian vice president and make other changes in the union's constitution dealing with intra-union policies.

Facing later sessions of the convention was the election of all international officers.

Unions Assist Boys Clubs In 28 States

From ice water to orchestras, from free labor to Christmas parties, AFL-CIO affiliates and their members gave special assistance to 79 boys' clubs in 28 states during 1965, according to a report by Leo Perlis, director of AFL-CIO Community Services.

The support, Perlis pointed out, was in addition to the financial aid the clubs received over the same period from united funds and community chests. Employes of establishments organized by AFL-CIO unions, he added, contributed an estimated $200 million to the funds and chests, or about one-third of their total receipts.

The ice water was cooled by ice bought with a $150 gift from the Union County (Ark.) AFL-CIO to the Boys' Club of El Dorado.

The orchestra was furnished to the Boys' Club of Baltimore. The free labor, the equivalent of a $50,000 donation, was provided by the Northern Colorado Building & Construction Trades Council to a new Boys' Club building under construction in Denver. In Pasadena, Calif., Cement Masons Local 923 contributed hundreds of feet of retaining wall for erosion control and beautification at the Boys' Club's Camp Norris.

The Christmas party was financed for the Rockford, Ill., club by union-sponsored contributions.

Other gifts included $2,000 toward a camping program from the Los Angeles AFL-CIO and the donation of "camperships" by Albany, N. Y., unions. In Little Rock, Ark., Typographical Union Local 92 gave a printing press to the Boys' Club, and in Muncie, Ind., Boys' Club keglers competed for union-donated bowling trophies.

Ontario College Names Labor Official to Board

Sarnia, Ont.—Sec.-Treas. Guy Tyndall of the Sarnia Labor Council, a member of Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers Local 9-14, has been named to the board of governors of the new Lambton College of Applied Arts & Technology here.

Zagoria Asks Automation Warning Plan

Advance notice of plant automation should be as standard in industry as the eight-hour day, Member Sam Zagoria of the National Labor Relations Board declared at one of a series of seminars on manpower policy and program sponsored by the Manpower Administration.

It is "human and intelligent," Zagoria maintained, and is "industry's Early Warning System that enables all parties to take necessary steps to minimize—or avoid—damage to employes."

"We believe in warning people as early as possible about hurricanes or pestilence," he said. "To workers, displacement or even dislocation is a problem of catastrophic proportions equalling the shock of a hurricane or a crippling stroke."

Zagoria said that automation involves a responsibility to the employer, the employes who continue working, the consumers—and "the left-out workers" who lose their jobs.

For the latter, he said, unions and management can consider such things as severance pay—if it is to be granted, and how much and for how long; whether workers are to be retrained, and if so, who pays for it; relocation allowances; and what happens to benefits such as pensions, insurance coverage, health and welfare protection, and vacations.

New Income Needed

In addition, he continued, there is the question of help in offsetting the displaced worker's lower income.

"Should the worker be made whole, and if so, for how long, and by whom? One possibility would be to look at automation with a view to giving the left-out workers some share of profits, perhaps devising a plan for installment payment of benefits as they are realized by the company."

The "tiny man in the towering plant," Zagoria noted, often feels "literally at the mercy" of the economic system.

"Automation and how we introduce it," he added, "may become a test of the morality of the American system. Is it heartless, selfish, as opposing ideologies declare, or has it the capacity to progress technologically without regressing sociologically? This is a major challenge—and a great opportunity."

Federal Policies Scored:

Ship Builders Hit U.S. Maritime Lag

Miami Beach—The failure of successive administrations and government agencies to adopt necessary measures of relief for the ship building and repair industry drew a strong protest from 250 delegates to the 23rd convention of the Marine & Ship Building Workers here.

"Since the end of World War II, the Defense Department and the Maritime Administration have spurned reality and have not taken heed of the lessons of Viet Nam, Cuba, the Dominican crisis, and Korea," Pres. John J. Grogan declared in his keynote address. "By neglect, indifference and rejection, we are today faced with woeful lack of vitally necessary shipping capability to supply and maintain our armed forces in Southeast Asia."

A resolution unanimously adopted by the convention asserted that the "effective control" policy is a "fraud." The assumption that our country can rely in an emergency on ships under foreign flags, provided only that they are owned by Americans and will be made available on demand of our government "has been proven a tragic farce," the resolution declared.

It noted that runaway flag ship owners "pay no taxes to our government, no wages to our seamen, and not a dime of their money goes for building or repairs to an American yard. The lack of restrictions against foreign flag-U.S. ship owners costs this country $1 billion a year in the drain on our gold reserves."

Grogan declared in his speech that an adequate merchant marine and navy ship capability to protect the nation's security "is even more vital to our defense in this age of 'A' and 'H' bombs, missiles, jet power and a host of other awesome implements of destruction."

"The great preponderance of obsolete World War II built ships," he stated, "has been ignored despite the fact that substantial existing ship-building capacity remains idle."

The Maritime Administration, he charged, has recommended "a famine budget" for fiscal 1967—the lowest since 1958—at a time "when the nation faces crucial shipping requirements for Viet Nam and we are forced to charter foreign vessels to carry our own commercial cargo."

In reporting on the union's progress, Grogan observed that "for the first time in many years we meet in an atmosphere of peace, without strikes and with the satisfaction that we open this convention with most of our 1966 bargaining completed. In view of the moribund state of the shipbuilding, repair and allied marine industries, we achieved remarkable results. We have signed two to four year contracts providing for total wage and fringe benefit increases valued at from 38 to 58 cents an hour."

Talks Under Way

Contract parleys, he noted, are presently under way at the major destroyer building yard of Bath Iron Works, Bath, Me., and a cluster of other small companies. Upcoming major negotiations will include Alabama Drydock & Ship Building Co., Mobile; Todd Ship Yards, New Orleans Division, and other Gulf Coast yards.

Among major internal affairs facing later sessions of the convention is election of the three top officers — president, vice-president and secretary-treasurer—and 12 members of the executive board.

Speakers scheduled to address the delegates include Vice Adm. John S. McCain, USN, commander of the Eastern Sea Frontier and deputy director of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations; Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning; AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler; and Walter A. Maggiolo, disputes director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service.

Alabama Labor Spurs Statewide Organizing

Mobile, Ala.—The Alabama State AFL-CIO convention called for a large-scale, coordinated statewide organizing drive to break through anti-union strongholds and bring "decent wages" to low-paid workers.

The drive to make Alabama a strong union state was given impetus by a report to the 450 delegates of significant gains over the past two years. Pres. Barney Weeks said AFL-CIO membership in the state has risen by 12,000 and 32 new locals, mostly newly-organized, have affiliated with the state federation.

Organizing goals were stressed also in speeches to the convention by the presidents of three unions with substantial membership in Alabama —P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists, Paul Hall of the Seafarers and Max Greenberg of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union—and by Alan Kistler, AFL-CIO assistant director of organization, and Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies.

Declaring that "no business is justified in higher profits by paying inhumanly low wages," the convention called for a state minimum wage of $1.40 an hour for persons not covered by the federal law. Alabama presently has no minimum wage law and this, the delegates said, is a major reason why its average income is "near the bottom in the nation."

The convention also called for repeal of a state law which in effect prohibits state employes from joining unions.

It passed a resolution calling for increased spending for schools, declaring that "the education of poor children and rich children alike is the only system of education consistent with democratic belief."

IBEW Strike Backed

Delegates pledged "all-out support" to 2,400 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who have been on strike against the Alabama Power Co. since Aug. 16. They called on locals and union members throughout the state "to offer all aid, support and financial assistance" to the strike.

The three top officers of the state federation were all re-elected without opposition—Weeks, Exec. Vice Pres. William Mintz and Sec.-Treas. A. G. Trammell. The convention voted to incorporate the "dedicated" assessment of $1 a year per member into the regular per capita structure. This will mean a single per capita payment of 16 cents a month instead of a separately collected 8-cent per capita and 8⅓-cent assessment.

Close Contest in Michigan:

Williams vs. Griffin Tied to Romney Role

Detroit—There are two major political races in Michigan this year—Democratic former Gov. G. Mennen Williams seeking to win a Senate seat from the appointed Republican incumbent, Robert P. Griffin, and GOP Gov. George Romney trying to win a third term by a margin big enough to pull Griffin in with him.

A certain weirdness results from the fact that the two stars, Williams and Romney, are running for different offices.

The Williams effort is a straight out Democratic campaign, supporting the entire ticket including the party's candidate against Romney, Zolton T. Ferency, an accomplished needler who can get under Romney's skin.

Romney, a notorious "loner" in politics in the past but now a governor with clearly observable presidential aspirations, carries Griffin with him almost everywhere he goes, including a visit to former House Republican Leader Charles A. Halleck's district in Indiana. Griffin, on the other hand, carefully avoids use of the word "Republican" on his billboards and in public speeches praises Romney's record.

Underneath all this, half a dozen Democratic freshman members of the House, elected when the Goldwater nomination resulted in a GOP debacle almost everywhere, are fighting for second terms.

Williams, elected to six two-year terms as governor with labor backing, and Griffin collided recently before Detroit's famed Economic Club.

The Republican senatorial nominee, who was named to his office by Romney after the death of the late Democratic senator, Pat McNamara, hit the themes that have latterly become familiar in GOP speeches—living costs, the desirability of a cutback in "non-essential" government spending, an alleged "credibility gap" in Pres. Johnson's reports to the people on the Vietnamese war.

Restricted Cuts

Williams also declared that non-essential federal spending should be curbed because of its inflationary impact, but specified that this should apply only to public works and the space program—not to education programs, manpower retraining programs and assistance to senior citizens.

The "backlash" factor may be working in Michigan as in other states, and Williams said bluntly that he was "deeply disturbed" by some recent events and that the drive for equal opportunity must be pushed "within the framework of law and order."

His comment came after Romney had directly accused the administration of raising "false expectations" among Negroes, and urging "too much too soon" on the road toward goals that are "unrealistic."

In the earlier stages of the campaign, Griffin had been forced to defend himself for his role as co-sponsor of the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959.

The original House bill carrying Griffin's name was strongly opposed by labor. It was modified before final passage to remove some of the anti-union provisions at the insistence of Senate spokesmen, Williams noted.

Williams also ran the record of Griffin's five terms in the House, citing his opposition to the education and higher education bills of 1965, his votes against housing bills in 1959, 1961 and 1965, against the $1.25 minimum wage in 1961, against the food stamp bill in 1964, public works bills in 1962 and 1965, against the mass transit bill in 1964.

Williams in his speech before the Economic Club shifted the ground. He hit at Griffin's record of voting against the 7 percent investment tax credit of 1962 and the income tax cut of 1964—"the bills that really kicked off the amazing economic growth we have enjoyed . . . the longest sustained business boom in the history of the United States."

The Detroit Economic Club does not furnish a friendly audience, ordinarily, for Williams, and its preference for Griffin was obvious. But the businessmen paid attention to their manners, and the Democratic former governor was not brutally booed as he was in 1958, during his sixth and last victorious campaign.

Tradition Cited

"Every time I lost an Economic Club debate, I wound up winning the election," the smiling Williams remarked, "and this year is no time to break with a winning tradition."

The mathematics of Michigan politics is that two thirds of the vote is cast in Wayne County (Detroit) and its two burgeoning suburban neighbors, Oakland and Macomb Counties.

A Democrat running for statewide office, according to the local experts, must sweep Wayne County with 65 percent of the ballots to win.

The registration figures for the Nov. 8 election appear to be spotty in their pattern. Some 360,000 names were lopped off the lists after the 1962 election and a new law was passed providing that citizens, to keep their names on the eligible lists, must vote at least once in every two-year period.

The total statewide registration nevertheless is up—3.825 million as against 3.7 million.

The only available opinion polls, published by the Detroit News, show Griffin leading Williams by a narrow margin. But a curious fact can be noticed: only about 3 percent of those interviewed profess themselves to be undecided, whereas normally a 10 to 15 percent proportion would be expected.

The freshman Democratic members of the House include Representatives Weston E. Vivian (2nd District), Paul H. Todd, Jr., (3rd), John C. Mackie (7th), Raymond F. Clevenger (11th) and Billie S. Farnum (19th).

Some of their districts are—or should be—normally Democratic. Some are normally Republican, or should be.

N. Y. Times Urges Douglas Re-election

"Paul Douglas deserves re-election to the United States Senate," the New York Times declared in an editorial.

The influential, nationally-circulated newspaper referred to Douglas' long record in "battling for the public good," his championship of the consumer, his fight for medicare, civil rights and aid to education. The editorial concluded:

"There is more at stake here than the career of an able senator. In every generation there are a few men who by force of mind and character become . . . the standard by which other men in public life measure their conduct. Sen. Douglas is such a man. For this reason, as well as for his integrity, courage and devotion to the public good, Paul Douglas deserves re-election to the United States Senate."

Solidly Liberal Douglas Battling Strong GOP Challenge in Illinois

Cook County than any other area. As the bill began to go through, the GOP candidate suddenly announced that he thought it was a good thing.

Douglas in the past has been a powerful vote-winner with strong labor support. He beat his last Republican opponent, in 1960, by a margin approaching 450,000.

He is uncompromising in his civil rights attitudes, including open occupancy provisions on housing, which he charged Percy with opposing two years ago, supporting this year and finally settling down with a charge that the Douglas position is "impractical."

Percy has a more checkered political career, short though it is. He felt compelled in 1964 to say publicly that there was "no candidate" he preferred for the GOP presidential nomination to Sen. Barry Goldwater and he was rewarded with his party's nomination for governor. But he lost the election to incumbent Democratic Gov. Otto Kerner.

Douglas in his campaign speeches cites his long experience, which has put him high in the seniority ranking of the Senate Finance and Banking and Currency committees and lifted him to the top on the Joint Economic Committee.

"Do you want to trade this away for a new senator who would be the junior member of the least important committees in the Senate?"

He hits at Percy's opposition two years ago to medicare, which the Republican nominee then called "forced insurance," and his attacks on the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" decisions, which Douglas points out gave the cities and the suburbs—"the Republican suburbs, if I may say so"—something approaching equal representation in the state legislatures and the country.

Percy is emphasizing themes that in the last weeks of the campaign have become familiar for GOP candidates—higher social security benefits right now, not next year or in 1968, an end to inflationary rises in living costs, a somewhat vague set of proposals for ending the Vietnamese war.

The election in Illinois, in any case, seems less likely to swing on the openly-discussed issues (except for Douglas' defiance of a so-called "backlash" vote on housing) than on the familiar arithmetic involving Cook County and the rest of the state.

Douglas has always run far ahead of other Democrats in what is called "downstate" Illinois, which includes everything north, west and south of Chicago. But "downstate" is normally and inevitably Republican, even when Douglas is the Democratic nominee.

The Cook County vote, with Mayor Richard M. Daley of Chicago at the controls, is vital to a Democrat seeking statewide office. Cook County has 50 percent of the state's population and votes and a major Democratic margin there is a prerequisite.

There is another statewide race holding elements of interest—the drive of Adlai E. Stevenson III for state treasurer. By every advance indication, Stevenson is running far ahead of his Republican opponent, State Rep. Harris Rowe.

The congressional races appear to be stabilized, with 14 Democrats and 10 Republicans reasonably well assured of returning to Washington, although Democratic freshman Rep. Gale Schisler in the 19th District, normally Republican, has a tougher fight than most of the others.

Rail Carmen Fill Officer Vacancies

Kansas City, Mo.—Pres. George L. O'Brien of the Railway Carmen, who succeeded A. J. Bernhardt in the office on the latter's recent retirement, named these new officers to fill vacancies: Anthony L. Krause as assistant president, succeeding O'Brien, and John J. DiGregorio as vice president succeeding Krause.

Bernhardt retired Sept. 22 after nearly 12 years as top man. He plans to remain active as a member of the union's general chairmen's association.

Hate-Peddlers at Work

CAN YOU talk about race . . . without losing your temper? Try. It's not easy.

Because there are people busy stirring up trouble. They deliberately anger you. They plan it that way.

The extremists, the professional hate-peddlers and racists—they're all trying to blind you to the real issues of the 1966 political campaign.

Hate is not the real issue. Neither is prejudice or property or who lives in your neighborhood.

The real issue is progress.

Do we move ahead on education, medicare, jobs, social security and the whole important roster of social needs? Do we really attack the key problems of tax reform, consumer protection, automation and efficient public transportation?

Or do we simply forsake progress and cave in to the hate peddlers?

IT'S NOT EASY to hear the voice of reason when unreasonable people are shouting hate in your ears. They pistol-whip you constantly about the race issue. They want you to focus your total attention on the race issue. Their plot is to persuade you to desert your real friends and vote their way.

Hate is their stock in trade. Hate is sand in your eyes.

If your Congressman or Senator voted for civil rights legislation, he's a target of the far right. They'll blame him for riots, civil disobedience and all the other social problems caused by generations of discrimination.

The hate-mongers ignore completely what your trade union emphasizes most: The 89th Congress is probably the best Congress since the critical Roosevelt days of 1933. This Congress has passed more legislation for the good of more people than any Congress in history.

Look at the record of accomplishment:

Medicare—helping 20 million elderly Americans meet their health needs.

Aid to education—helping your children and 40 million other American kids get the best possible education.

Aid to colleges—opening the doors wide to all young people who qualify, regardless of ability to pay.

Pollution control—giving us a start toward clear air and clean water, both polluted by years of neglect.

Minimum wage—raising millions of Americans to where they can sustain themselves for the first time in their lives.

And many more sound, solid, progressive pieces of legislation.

THE HATE-PEDDLERS figure they can't lose. They think you're a patsy for their propaganda and a pushover for their plans to undermine progress and democracy.

They're using race to divide and conquer.

They're throwing the sand of hate into your eyes to obscure your vision and give them the chance to get rid of medicare, scuttle education programs, wreck job-creating legislation, beat down the minimum wage and stop dead in their tracks efforts to protect the consumer and reform our antiquated tax laws.

There's nothing new about the technique.

They tried it 30 years ago in Germany. And it worked.

The choice is up to you: hate or progress. You have only one choice. —AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education

'You're Both Guilty'

Laws Vary Widely:

Voting Time Off for Workers Assured by Statute in 30 States

A TOTAL of 30 states now have laws that permit workers to take time off for voting.

In 18 of these states employers are barred from making deductions from an employe's wages for the time he is authorized to be absent from work to cast his vote.

Alaska, Arizona, California, Colorado, Hawaii, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah (excluding hourly workers), West Virginia and Wyoming all require pay for voting time off.

Alabama, Illinois, Kentucky and Wisconsin require that the time off be granted but pay for the time off is not required. Kentucky had a requirement for pay which was held invalid. A similar provision formerly in Illinois law was declared unconstitutional and deleted by amendment.

In the other eight states—Arkansas, Georgia, Indiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Mexico, Ohio and Oklahoma—the statutes are silent regarding payment for voting time. But in Arkansas and New Mexico, the attorneys general have construed the statutory provision as requiring payment, in New Mexico for a maximum of 2 hours.

There are mitigating conditions in many of the states requiring payment. Statutes of a number of them contain provisions that time off must be allowed during working hours only if the polls are not open for a sufficient length of time during nonworking hours.

Seventeen states require the worker to notify his employer of his election day plans. Three of these —Iowa, Kansas and West Virginia—require that the application be in writing.

In Tennessee, the employe is subject to a penalty if he takes time off and does not vote. Hawaii, Missouri and Wyoming employers, however, must give workers time-off pay only if they vote.

Arkansas, Indiana and Massachusetts limit time off to vote to workers in factories or specific industries, and in Alabama such time is limited to workers in counties between 75,000 and 130,000 population.

Alaska, California, Kansas, and New York limit the pay period to enough time to give two voting hours before or after work. Iowa extends this time to three hours.

Minnesota specifies that workers may take the forenoon off for voting. Ohio has no definite period but bars the discharge of an employe who takes a reasonable amount of time off to vote. The Arkansas law calls for a total suspension of work or change of shift by 4 p.m. on Election Day.

Texas also does not specify an exact time-off period but no time off is required if the worker has sufficient time outside of working hours to vote.

Nevada grants one to three hours off, depending on the distance of the plant from the polling place. Tennessee requires the voter to have up to three hours of voting time, unless polls are open three nonworking hours.

Laws of Hawaii and South Dakota state that if the polls are open for two consecutive hours during nonworking time, the employe has opportunity to vote without time off the job. Missouri and Tennessee extend this time to three hours.

Penalties for violation of time-off-to-vote laws include fines ranging from $1 to $1,000 in 25 of the 30 states with these laws on the books, as well as jail sentences running from 30 days up to five years in 14. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Indifference to River Pollution Appears to Be Losing Ground

By Edward P. Morgan

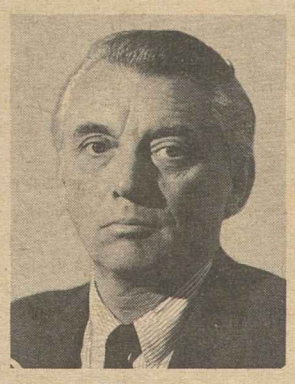
BOSTON—A Boston newspaper headlined a syndicated column as follows: "True Beauty Lies in U.S. Industry."

I couldn't wait to get the message and it wasn't long in coming. The burden of the pundit's song was that all these efforts toward beautification, conservation and anti-pollution on a national scale were really a screen behind which socialists—social engineers, he called them—were conducting a witch hunt against private enterprise and the profit motive.



Morgan

The columnist didn't actually come out in fearless defense of junkyards and billboards but his theme was that the marvel of American industrial productivity was so beautiful that it should, in effect, be pardoned for a little litter-bugging and water-poisoning here and there.

Well, that's a novel theory. It's a little too bizarre for me and I wonder if my colleague would have spun it with such emphasis if he had read the October issue of a magazine called "Boston," first. The cover and lead article are devoted to the virtual ruination of the Charles River, which flows—if sludge and sewage and great gobs of miscellaneous crud can be said to flow—between Boston and Cambridge to the sea.

"For years," Author F. E. (Dinny) Whitmarsh, a Boston journalist wrote, "the Charles provided (34 communities in some 384 square miles of watershed) drinking water, mill power, salmon, shad, smelt and perch fishing and tidy river-bank beaches." Now it is virtually a 70-mile-long sewage ditch.

Vice Pres. Humphrey, who showed up here to resume his New England campaign tour after a diversion to a rally in Brooklyn, had so many other issues on his agenda that he didn't dwell on pollution. But he gave it the full treatment in Erie, Pa. There he said "Lake Erie is dying before our eyes."

He was being charitable. Some conservation experts classify it as already dead—though it is part of the once magnificent system of inland seas, the Great Lakes, which contain a third of all the fresh water on the surface of the earth. The Vice President went on to report that "even if all the pollution in Lake Michigan were controlled, it would still take 500 years to make its water really clean again." And "the Hudson River is so badly polluted that, if no more sewage were dumped into it, the experts say it would still continue to contaminate itself for the next 15 years."

Humphrey mentioned another menace. He said the U.S. Public Health Service has found that some 7,300 communities across the land are being poisoned by air pollution, which is contributing to a rise in such respiratory diseases as lung cancer, emphysema, bronchitis and asthma. Almost nobody is guiltless in these crimes of pollution but industry, with its ruthless disregard for the future, has been, perhaps, the most guilty of all.

The federal government is now moving belatedly to remedy the situations. But before much more can be done, the Vice President warned, "it's clear that . . . a number of city halls will need a good swift kick in . . . their apathy."

CONGRESS is at last responding. It has voted a multi-billion dollar Administration "clean water" program.

A freshman representative from Erie, Joseph P. Vigorito, who was swept into Congress by the Johnson landslide of '64 as the first Democrat in that Pennsylvania district in 28 years, is pushing a bill to create a Great Lakes Basin Compact. Under it the eight states and two Canadian provinces bordering the lakes would coordinate plans for the cleanup and conservation of the waters.

The "Boston" magazine report had some encouraging facts too. It noted that industry along the Charles, partly under prodding of something called the Metropolitan District Commission, had learned the lesson of conservation and was now "sanitizing" its waste.

But the Charles, said the article, is still a "biological wasteland," stretches of it full of junked cars, worn tires, abandoned supermarket carts, cans, containers and other hall marks of our beautifully materialistic civilization.

Every river system in the country is similarly decorated. We all, including the press, need to be kicked in the apathy to reverse such hideosities which are far more than window-dressing.

After the Humphrey speech in Erie one television reporter complained he couldn't use a foot of it on film. "Too dull," he said. "Now if he'd only get into something controversial, like Viet Nam, I could have done something on this story."

Lake Erie, apparently, was too dead to be controversial.

Wurf Cites Exploitation:

Equal Bargaining Rights Held Basic Need of Public Employes

STATE AND LOCAL government workers need the right to determine their wages and working conditions just as other workers do, President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes declared in a radio interview.

Wurf asserted that such workers have an equal right to take part in collective bargaining. They "want to be a part of the decision-making process whereby their destinies are decided," he said. "They don't want some commission to give them largess—tell them they will be better off next year. They want to be part of the democratic process."

Unorganized public workers in the South and in some other parts of the country are paid as little as 80 and 90 cents an hour, Wurf reported. He hailed the recent extension of the federal minimum wage law to cover some such workers. Wages paid certain kinds of public employes, such as those in hospitals, are "atrocious," he said.

"With the exception of agricultural workers, hospital workers in this country are the most exploited people in the country," he declared. "You will find that they range in pay from as little as $100 to $500 a month for the same duties."

Wurf reported "a tremendous growth" in the membership of the State, County & Municipal Employes, but pointed out that certain workers and some sections of the country have yet to be organized.

He also suggested that public employes should have as much right to take part in free and responsible political action as any other workers.

"Probably a higher percentage of our people are registered to vote than in any other section of workers in this country," he noted. "We vote. We are citizens. We are veterans. We are part of various ethnic and religious groups. And we vote in terms of all the things that motivate other people to vote."

WURF DECLARED himself against "little Hatch Acts," which prevent public employes from taking part in complete political activities.

"We are free Americans," he asserted. "We should not be treated any differently than other Americans."

The interview was on Labor News Conference, a public affairs program of the AFL-CIO heard on the Mutual radio network. The reporters were Stanley Levey, labor correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

DETROIT—The Midwest is the traditional Republican heartland, rich in crops, people, cities, suburbs and a galloping hope among GOP professionals that they can recoup the collateral losses they suffered with the crushing defeat of Barry Goldwater in 1964.

There are five congressional seats in Ohio, five in Michigan, five in Iowa, two in Wisconsin, two in Minnesota, plus single-district seats in Illinois and Indiana, that can be identified as presently held by Democrats and districts the Republicans hope to win this time.

The total adds up to more than half of the 38-member House net gain of the Democrats in 1964.

There is this further fact: in the changing political patterns of the country it appears that the states of Kentucky and Tennessee must be counted as midwestern rather than traditionally southern and eternally Democratic.

Kentucky already has two Republican senators and very possibly will elect a Republican majority to its House delegation in November. So may Tennessee, where the GOP has three of the nine House members, and may possibly elect two more this year.

The Republicans are fortunate in that two of their famous vote-winners—Gov. George Romney of Michigan and Gov. John A. Rhodes of Ohio—are running for re-election. The "head of the ticket" counts with voters, and in the heavily-populated states of this vast region Democrats have few celebrated incumbents who must seek new terms and would therefore furnish a coordinating influence on all other campaigns.

Iowa, with Gov. Harold E. Hughes leading the ticket and five freshman Democrats seeking re-election to the House, is a good state to watch.

SOME ISSUES have come alive as the campaign approached its final two weeks, at least in the viewpoint of both Republican and Democratic candidates.

One of them is the cost of living. It would seem more logical for it to be the high cost of borrowing money for houses, automobiles and other expensive consumer goods, but it seems to be simplified to GOP candidates if they simply mention the word inflation. It also seems sufficiently important to G. Mennen Williams, Democratic candidate for the Senate in Michigan, to call for a cut in non-essential government spending.

Another issue, clearly, is the so-called "backlash," which appears to be composed of many things—crime rates, riots, Negro pressure for genuine equality of opportunity.

ONE OTHER FACT is observable: The Goldwaterite Republicans in the South have fallen flat in their drive for a genuine two-party system.

The advices from Alabama are that Rep. James D. Martin will be clobbered by Mrs. Lurleen Wallace, a stand-in for her husband George, for governor, and that two to all five of the House seats the GOP won in 1964 will be lost.

Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway lost his segregationist advantage in his race for governor of Georgia when Democrats perversely nominated Lester Maddox rather than the moderate former Gov. Ellis Arnall. In Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland can treat his Republican opponent, Rep. Prentiss Walker, as inconsequential.

Basically, of course, there is little choice between a conservative segregationist southern Republican and a conservative segregationist southern Democrat.

GOVERNMENT WORKERS, state and local, need the right to set their wages by collective bargaining just as other workers do, Pres. Jerry Wurf (center) of the State, County & Municipal Employes said on Labor News Conference, AFL-CIO public affairs progam heard on the Mutual radio network. Questioning him were Harry Conn (left), editor of Press Associates, Inc., and Stanley Levey, labor writer for the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

How to Buy:

Higher Mortgage Rates Strike New Blow at Working Families

By Sidney Margolius

WORKING FAMILIES seeking to buy or refinance homes have suffered another blow with the latest increase in FHA and Veteran's Administration mortgage rates to a new high of 6 percent. The additional FHA premium of one-half of 1 percent, which the borrower pays to insure the lender against loss, now pegs the true FHA rate at 6.5 percent.

Thus, moderate-income borrowers who can least afford it now will pay higher rates for mortgages than well-to-do families. FHA mortgages are used mostly by moderate-income home buyers who can make only small down payments. The conventional mortgages (non-government insured) which require larger down payments, have gone up, too—to a new high of 6.18 percent on newly-built homes—but are lower on average than the FHA rate.

The three jumps in FHA and VA rates over the past year are going to cost home buyers a fantastic amount of money. The mortgage payment and premium on a typical FHA mortgage of $16,000 for 30 years at 6.5 percent requires a monthly payment of $102.63. This means the family would repay a total of $37,000 on the $16,000 mortgage, or $21,000 just in interest fees. That's more than the house itself costs, and $3,600 more than the same mortgage cost in 1965.

Thus, FHA is treating moderate-income home buyers as harshly as any of the commercial lenders who recently have raised rates. The excuse is that without the rate increase, lenders will not make FHA and VA loans, or will use the subterfuge of charging extra "points" or other hidden charges.

What we would urge is that Pres. Johnson seek the proposal he made when he was a Senator. In 1957, he proposed that the government make direct federal mortgage loans for veterans to stimulate construction and "help to slow down the rising interest rate which has been so costly and so harmful to so many fellow Americans."

This, of course, is no time to seek a new mortgage if you can avoid it. If you must, insist on as liberal a "right to prepay" clause as you can get, so you can accelerate your payments later if mortgage rates come down. On conventional mortgages, a few lenders permit prepayment after one year with no penalty charge. Others may permit prepayment of up to 10 percent in any period without penalty. This, too, is reasonable. Still others may charge a penalty of 3 percent of the original mortgage if you prepay the first year, 2 percent the second, 1 percent the third.

On an FHA mortgage you can prepay up to 15 percent at any time without penalty. But if you prepay the whole mortgage before 10 years, you must pay a penalty of 1 percent.

If you can put up a large enough down payment, you may be able to reduce your costs by getting a conventional mortgage instead of FHA. Conventional rates for new homes are lower than FHA in the East and in the Chicago area. But the conventional mortgages are even higher than FHA on the Pacific Coast, in the Atlanta area, in the Southwest and in most Midwest and North Central areas such as Detroit and Minneapolis.

In some states where rising mortgage rates have bumped up against a 6 percent anti-usury ceiling, lenders are getting around the laws by charging extra "points" and other fees and bonuses.

ON OLDER HOMES, FHA mortgages still have an advantage over conventional mortgages in most areas except the East. The nationwide conventional average is 6.36 percent.

In taking out a mortgage, whatever you do, avoid any lender who insists on putting in an "escalation" clause. This would permit the lender to raise your interest rate when its costs increase. In the Los Angeles area, home owners recently held mass meetings and picketed the Prudential Savings & Loan Association and won recision of increases made in their mortgage payments on the basis of such a clause.

Ominously for the economy and future employment stability, mortgage foreclosures and delinquencies on installment debts are increasing even as the interest rates are rising. By mid-1966, foreclosures were running 7 percent ahead of last year.

People are getting into trouble on installment debts, too. The collections index of the Associated Credit Bureaus shows a jump of 15 percent over last year in accounts turned over to collection agencies.

But even while bad debts are increasing, families are going into hock more heavily. Installment debts recently made their largest jump in five years. Even more than mortgages, this is the worst time to use installment credit heavily.

The Experts Are at It Again—Upgrading Nursery Game Skills

By Jane Goodsell

I'VE ALWAYS thought of Bingo as an easy-to-play game of chance, requiring no particular skill or aptitude.

Any six-year-old with an average attention span and a rudimentary grasp of numbers and letters could learn to play it in five minutes. The holder of the lucky card won, and that was all there was to it.

As usual, it turns out I'm wrong. Somebody has written an instruction manual on how to win at Bingo by using a card-selection system based on variable percentages. Thus, by substituting expertise for chance, Bingo has been upgraded to a game of skill in the bridge-golf-chess category.

One Gift Works Many Wonders

GIVE THE UNITED WAY

Campaigns Under Way:

Unions Aim at Higher United Giving Mark

MEMBERS OF AFL-CIO unions in all parts of the country are hard at work protecting the proud record they have built up in support of United Way campaigns.

The nation is in the midst of its annual drive for donations to community chests and united funds, with 2,225 campaigns scheduled before the end of the year. Last year a record $615 million was contributed in this way and was channeled through some 300,000 health, welfare and recreation services to benefit 25 million families.

More than one-third of this impressive total represents the gifts of AFL-CIO members. This year they hope to do even better—one reason being that a labor man, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers, chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Service Activities Committee, has been elected president of the United Community Funds & Councils of America.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has declared that Beirne's election to the UCFCA leadership has "honored" the AFL-CIO. Beirne takes to the post, he added, a "wealth of experience" garnered as CSA chairman "as well as the labor movement's traditional and present concern for people in need."

"THIS YEAR, I am confident, the affiliates and members of the AFL-CIO will respond to the great needs of our time," Meany added, "working in the united way through our community services organization, and giving generously of their time and money to make this year's campaign a resounding success."

Gifts for the relief of those who need help are being sought by a veritable army of 7.6 million volunteer solicitors. Many of them are union members whose own contributions are checked off by their employers. Last year more than 30.5 million individuals, groups and corporations made donations.

The United Way does more than help health, welfare and recreation agencies meet their obligations to their respective communities.

It also is a major source of financing assistance to service men and women overseas, and for relief measures in meeting emergencies arising from floods, hurricanes and other disasters.

United Way giving also means that virtually all of each contributor's dollar goes to help the people who need help. Before the era of the single campaign, hundreds of worthy causes competed for dollars, time and interest. Each had to mount a separate campaign, divert money for fund-raising and administrative costs.

The central fund concept has brought efficiency and economy—and assured donors that their contributions are going where the need is greatest.

Union Education Aid Totals $1.4 Million

More than 1,400 students are attending college or pursuing some other form of higher education this fall with the help of financial aid from the labor movement, Dir. Lawrence Rogin of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education writes in the current issue of the American Federationist.

The aid may be $50 for the winner of a high school essay contest or as much as $2,500 a year for four years to the winners of some international union scholarships—but this year's total, Rogin's department estimates on the basis of a continuing survey, will be about $1.4 million.

The grants go chiefly to union members or the children of union members, he notes, but assistance also is directed toward other youngsters selected because of special abilities or an interest in specific fields, such as teaching.

"Most of the money to make up this $1.4 million comes from union treasuries, financed by regular dues payments," Rogin writes.

Local Levies

"In a few cases, local union members have assessed themselves to establish scholarship programs and there are a few scholarship trust funds made up in part from gifts received especially for this purpose. More and more, however, the scholarship program is becoming a fringe benefit, either part of a health and welfare program or financed by a specific number of cents per hour negotiated just to help some union members or their children pay the costs of higher education."

The help that unions can provide is a "very small part of what is needed" if equal educational opportunity is to become a reality, Rogin points out—and the union members who have established the programs know it.

"They know that increasing tax support of both students and institutions of higher education is essential to establish this goal," he writes.

"But for those who are helped by union grants, the assistance is real, in some cases making the difference between going to college and not going, and in others making it possible for the recipient to have a real choice of the college."

Rogin outlines the AFL-CIO program, under which six scholarships worth up to $1,500 a year—the amount is based on need but is usually the maximum—are awarded annually in cooperation with the National Merit Scholarship Corp.

For purposes of the program the country is divided into regions. Three of the awards go to the children of AFL-CIO union members and the other three are unrestricted.

Rogin also discusses some of the scholarship winners, past and present, and outlines the award programs of some international and local unions, their regional bodies, and state central bodies.

Each year, he points out, about 10 percent of the high school graduates designated as Presidential Scholars have been the sons or daughters of union members. The existence of such talent among their offspring "is no surprise" to unionists, he writes, adding:

"For American workers have long been making great sacrifices so that their children might have opportunities to go on to college and university. They have seen their children work long hours at low-paying jobs in order to put together the money needed for higher education. But, too often, parents have had to tell their children, anxious and able for more study: 'Sorry, but the money just isn't there' or 'You'd better get a job so the family can make ends meet.'

"It has been this latter bitter experience that has placed unions in the forefront of the fight in state and nation for free or low tuition institutions of higher learning with open admission policies; for student aid programs which would enable workers' children to have a real opportunity for higher education.

"And it has been the same experience which has caused national and local unions, the AFL-CIO and many state and local federations to establish their own programs of scholarships and grants."

AFL-CIO policy is that every high school graduate who wants higher education and can benefit from it should be given the opportunity, Rogin observes.

This involves, he continues, "sharply increased" federal and state funds for construction of educational facilities in both public and private institutions, "so that no student shall be denied opportunity for higher education because of lack of space;" increased federal and state support for community colleges to make free education available through the 14th year; an expanded student aid program, and in the long run legislation to make possible the free choice of college or university.

Schmitt Elected Head Of Wisconsin AFL-CIO

Madison, Wis.—The Wisconsin State AFL-CIO elected two new top officers and made major executive board changes at its biennial convention here.

The new president, John W. Schmitt, said his administration would be dedicated to more aggressive political action, greater participation in community affairs and more support for migrant workers, Negroes and American Indians.

Schmitt, a member of the Brewery Workers, had been vice president of the state federation and director of its Committee on Political Education since 1960.

He was elected by acclamation succeeding George A. Haberman, 69, who retired after 44 years in the labor movement.

Haberman, a member of the Iron Workers, had been president of the State AFL-CIO since its formation in the 1958 merger and had been president of the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor from 1943 to 1958. He is the first officer to benefit from a pension program adopted in the 1964 convention.

John Giacomo, a staff representative of Steelworkers' District 12, was elected as vice-president, and Sec.-Treas. George W. Hall, a member of the Painters, was re-elected.

Schmitt's entire 16 member executive board slate—12 incumbents and four new members—was victorious.

For the first time the State, County & Municipal Employes are represented on the board—a reflection of their rapid membership growth and increased affiliations with the state central body.

The convention approved increases in the salaries of the state AFL-CIO's top officers, the first in eight years. The president's pay was raised from $15,000 to $16,000 now and $17,000 a year from now. The vice-president and secretary-treasurer, who previously received $13,000 a year, will get $14,000 now and $15,000 a year hence.

The delegates endorsed Lt. Gov. Patrick J. Lucey, Democratic candidate for governor in the November election, as well as Democratic Representatives Clement J. Zablocki, Henry S. Reuss, Robert W. Kastenmeier, Lynn E. Stalbaum and John A. Race, and Republican Rep. Alvin E. O'Konski.

Local's Mental Health Plan Brings Hope, Recovery to Office Worker

San Francisco—The big wonder to one third grade teacher in a San Francisco suburb when school opened for the 1966 fall semester was that she was there at all.

Six years ago, she was an unemployed office worker, so beset by emotional and economic problems that she was nearly insane.

Her return to normal life is the most dramatic example of a little-known social program by Office & Professional Employes Local 3.

In recent years, Local 3 has saved jobs or found jobs for more than a dozen office workers who had cracked under the pressures of life and some of whom, like the teacher, had been committed. It has persuaded employers to keep jobs open for them, underwritten union dues, and health and welfare coverage for them, giving them a feeling of security which helped their recovery.

The teacher, Dorothy (which is not her real name), was an office worker then. Her husband had quit a secure job and failed in a flyer at another trade. He was jobless and had begun drinking heavily. A particularly painful death of a relative and the threat that the couple might lose their Mission District home were other factors which brought about her mental collapse.

She developed delusions of persecution and commenced to drink. She lost her job. Her husband had her committed and she went to Napa State Hospital, diagnosed as a borderline psychotic.

Local 3's business manager, Phyllis Mitchell, decided to gamble on Dorothy's future. She obtained union approval to keep Dorothy's union dues current, and, more important to Dorothy, to keep her union health and welfare fund account paid up. That meant medical service was guaranteed for her husband and three children.

The union let Dorothy know that it would use every resource to place her in another job when she recovered.

Job Was Factor

"The assurance of a job after being institutionalized was the greatest thing that happened to me therapeutically speaking," Dorothy said. "It was one of the greatest factors in my recovery," she says.

Meanwhile the union's help to Dorothy had inspired her husband to "some self-inventory," and he stopped drinking and found a job. Dorothy was discharged from Napa. Her name went on Local 3's hiring list and she was referred to a job. She repaid the dues and health payments which the union had advanced.

The story doesn't end there. Dorothy, who had hated the human race bitterly ("The world was all wrong and I was all right"), found her faith in human nature had been revived. Along with it, an old dream of helping children as a teacher came to life.

She worked at her new office job for a year. Then with her savings and her husband's help she entered San Francisco State College. She had had two years at a southern California university and in three more years at State she got her teacher's credential.

"The union by simply trusting my ability to come back from mental illness gave me the courage of my convictions," she sums up. "Instead of self-pity, I determined I'd do what I'd always wanted and become a teacher."

Leaflet Explains Wage Law Changes

The Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour & Public Contracts Division has published a leaflet describing the newly-enacted changes in the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The leaflet—WHPC publication 1158—is titled "Highlights of the Fair Labor Standards Act, as Amended 1966." It may be obtained from the division's field offices or from the Labor Dept. headquarters in Washington, D. C.

Pact Settles Hotel Walkout By Musicians

New York—Members of Musicians Local 802 returned to work at 32 hotels here as a 3-day strike ended with agreement on a new contract boosting wages $20 a week over three years and cutting the workweek from six days to five.

Similar individual agreements had been signed earlier with 17 night clubs, Pres. Max L. Arons of Local 802 said, with negotiations continuing at seven others.

The last bar to settlement of the union's disagreement with the Hotelmen's Committee of Hotel Users of Music was removed when both sides accepted a clause providing for arbitration on job security which had been worked out with the aid of Herman A. Gray, lawyer and mediator called in by Local 802.

The contract raises basic salaries from $147 to $152 a week retroactive to Oct. 1; to $162 on Oct. 1, 1967, and to $167 the following year.

Arons called the agreement "another step forward in our efforts to achieve new professional stature and greater economic security for musicians in every branch of the business."

Involved in the dispute were 115 musicians working in the hotels and 140 with jobs in the 24 night clubs. The Local 802 executive board called the strike after members had turned down by a 120 to 3 vote a so-called "last ditch" offer. Seven major night clubs—the Copacabana, El Morocco, Latin Quarter, Playboy, Chateau Madrid, Roundtable and Chez Vito—reached speedy agreements and were not affected by the walkout.

Painters Place N. Y. Council In Trusteeship

Painters Pres. S. Frank Raftery announced that the union has placed New York District Council 9 in trusteeship following the indictment of its secretary-treasurer on charges of having taken bribes in connection with painting of public housing projects.

Raftery named John Damery, a general representative from the Boston area and former secretary of the area's District Council 35, as trustee of the New York council and ordered him to take charge of the council and its offices.

Indicted by a New York grand jury along with 10 others was Secretary Martin Rarback of District Council 9 which has a membership of about 12,000. The others included three public officials and seven contractors. All were indicted on charges of conspiracy, collusive bidding and bribery.

In a telegram to the council's officers, Raftery said that the indictment of Rarback made it "difficult, if not impossible" for the district council "to properly and effectively conduct its affairs" and that the rights and interests of council members are likely to be "placed in jeopardy." Raftery acted with the approval of the union's executive board.

IUE Local Pickets Birchers' Library

Rochester, N.Y.—Members of Local 338, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, have begun picketing the John Birch Society's American Opinion Library to protest anti-civil rights signs in the window.

Kenneth Hed, Democratic candidate for the 37th Congressional District seat now held by Rep. Barber Connable, Jr. (R), joined the union pickets their second day on the line.

Text of Negro Leaders' Statement:

'We Condemn... Rioting and Demagoguery'

Following is the text of the declaration of principles issued by seven prominent Negro leaders, which appeared as an advertisement in the New York Times, Oct. 14:

NO one can any longer doubt or ignore the depth of crisis which today confronts Negro Americans struggling to enjoy full and equal citizenship in their native land. The year's events have piled confusion and uncertainty on underlying racial prejudices in the majority population. The consequence has been intensified resistance to change at a time when the need for change is greatest. We consider it imperative, therefore, to make crystal clear to Americans of every origin and of every degree of commitment to justice the principles upon which the civil rights movement rests.

There is nothing new about these principles. What is new are the conditions which compel us to re-state them—not the least of which is their abandonment by some individuals and groups whose positions are nevertheless frequently interpreted as representing the civil rights movement.

I. We are committed to the attainment of racial justice by the democratic process. The force of law and its fulfillment in the courts, legislative halls and implementing agencies, the appeal to conscience, and the exercise of the rights of peaceful assembly and petition are the instrumentalities of our choice. We propose to win genuine partnership for all our people in the United States, within the framework of this nation's constitution.

II. We repudiate any strategies of violence, reprisal or vigilantism, and we condemn both rioting and the demagoguery that feeds it, for these are the final resort of despair, and we have not yielded to despair. Defense of one's family, home and self against attack is not an issue; it is a basic American principle and must not be perverted into a cover for aggressive violence.

III. We are committed to integration, by which we mean an end to every barrier which segregation and other forms of discrimination have raised against the enjoyment by Negro Americans of their human and constitutional rights. We believe that a sense of personal worth and a pride in race are vital to integration in a pluralistic society, but we believe that these are best nurtured by success in achieving equality. We reject the way of separatism, either moral or spatial.

IV. As we are committed to the goal of integration into every aspect of the national life, we are equally committed to the common responsibility of all Americans, both white and black, for bringing integration to pass. We not only welcome, we urge, the full cooperation of white Americans in what must be a joint endeavor if it is to prosper. It should go without saying, that, in seeking full equality for Negroes, we cannot and will not deny it to others who join our fight.

The reaffirmation of these principles must do more than simply distinguish between those who accept them and those who, for one reason or another, no longer choose to operate under them. For us, these principles are inextricably joined with obligations to which we have consistently devoted our meagre resources and our energies. We call upon the nation as a whole to assume the same obligations; its failure to do so will not only extend and perhaps complete the sabotage of our efforts, but will ultimately undermine domestic security and United States leadership in the world of nations.

It is not condoning riots to cry out against the conditions in the Negro ghettos which render some Negroes susceptible to the emotional gratification of pillage, looting and destruction. It is not condoning riots, but demanding the means to end them, that compels us to note the steady worsening of the average Negro's lot in the face of unprecedented general prosperity. It is not turning our backs on the need for education to note that the average Negro college graduate can expect a lifetime's earnings no greater than those of a white high school graduate. It is not an abdication of responsibility, but an affirmation of it, to say that society cannot perpetuate discrimination against Negroes and then blame the victims or their leaders for the outbursts of those who have been made desperate.

It is an obligation of the whole of American society to take the massive actions which alone can turn the downward tide of Negro economic status with its concomitant growth of frustration and bitterness. It is the special obligation of those who can see more clearly and feel more keenly than the rest to assume their own leadership burden and to spare no effort to bring their fellows to an equal comprehension. It is the obligation, in particular, of the mass media to moderate their obsession with sensation and conflict and to help create a climate of genuine knowledge and understanding in which perspective is restored.

The near-total absence of this perspective is reflected in the survey figures showing declines in public sentiment favoring civil rights. Has the nation forgotten, for example, that for every Negro youth who throws a brick, there are a hundred thousand suflering the same disadvantages who do not? That for every Negro who tosses a Motolov cocktail, there are a thousand fighting and dying on the battlefields of Viet Nam? It is a cruel and bitter abuse to judge the worth of these larger numbers, the overwhelming preponderance of the Negro population, by the misdeeds of a few.

We cannot ignore the signs of a retreat by white America from the national commitment to racial justice. The inadequacies of enforcement of this commitment, which has been hammered out over long years of judical, legislative and administrative pronouncement, have been a scandal; yet we have seen the United States Senate scuttling enforcement of antidiscrimination law and refusing to act on legislation to protect Negroes against racist assault. We have seen the appeal of bigotry elevated to a major political instrument, with votes being sought and won across the nation, by exploiting the so-called "white blacklash." We have seen sometime friends pulling back in full retreat and yielding to the battlefield scavengers ground which could have been held if it had been fought for.

This trend can be disastrous to the nation's, as well as the Negro's welfare if it is not checked, if our forces are not rallied and if the hard, demanding job of building lasting public support is not pressed forward now. It can be worse than disastrous for the generation of younger Americans, white as well as black, who would then indeed face a future without viable idealism. Thousands of them have been personally involved in the civil rights movement over the last few years, many in situations involving hazardous confrontations. They are needed now more than ever before, in work which, while seeming more routine and less adventurous, is in many ways harder and more vital. They can be effectively drawn to these new tasks only if they have assurance that the adult world is solidly engaged to the same purpose.

Ninty years ago, this nation permitted the democratic promise of Emancipation to wither and die before a rampant reaction which condemned the Negro to segregation, disfranchisement, peonage and death. Then, as now, the voices of temporary liberalism sounded discouragement and disillusionment with the capacity of the freedmen for full citizenship. Then, as now, the South capitalized on Northern weariness with the "race problem" and was enabled to shut off the hope of freedom. But the "race problem" remained, and today we are paying for yesterday's default.

We are determined that this history shall not repeat itself and we call upon all our countrymen, black and white, of all faiths and origins, to move with us.

'Extremism Is the Antithesis of Democracy'

Following is the text of a letter which was sent by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Federation Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph:

Dear Phil:

It was with warmth and enthusiasm that I read the advertisement in the New York Times this morning, signed by yourself and your fellow leaders of the civil rights movement.

Please extend to each of them my warm thanks and congratulations for they have in this restatement of principles and commitments summed up, in admirable fashion, the problems, the aspirations, the needs of America in this crucial moment in history.

I know that you need no reassurance of the AFL-CIO's intentions but I would appreciate it if you would convey to your colleagues the AFL-CIO's firm and unswerving determination to achieve full equality in America in all fields—education, employment, accommodations, housing and justice.

Your restatement of commitment to the attainment of racial justice by the democratic process, your repudiation of the strategies of violence, reprisals or vigilantism, your reaffirmation of the goals of integration commends itself to every thinking American.

There is, in America today, a so-called "white backlash." It is deplorable. It was born out of the ability of demagogues to capitalize upon rioting. It stems from unreasoning fear stimulated by the reckless cries of "black power."

It thrives on the ignorance of many citizens as to the real issues involved in equal rights controversies.

You and I agree that extremism is the antithesis of democracy and extremism by advocates of justice for America's minority population cannot be countenanced any more than extremism by advocates of white supremacy. In my book, the advocates of black supremacy and white supremacy belong in the same camp and the American trade union movement opposes both equally.

I know we are also in agreement that the problems faced by the civil rights movement cannot be resolved in an economic vacuum. As the AFL-CIO has repeatedly said, equal opportunity in employment is meaningless unless there is full opportunity; equal housing is impossible until we eliminate the slums and build the homes America needs for all its population—black or white; equal education is impossible until America puts its money where its mouth is and builds the kind of schools and supplies them with enough well-paid teachers to do the job of providing good education for every one of our children.

The AFL-CIO is dedicated to building the kind of America which will supply the answers to all of these problems. Our goal is to provide the schools, provide the jobs, provide the homes, provide the health care and provide the understanding that it is poverty and ignorance and despair that are the real root causes of all of America's domestic problems.

The AFL-CIO will not retreat from its commitment to the cause of civil rights any more than it would retreat from its commitment to abolish poverty, illness, suffering, and want in this nation.

You and I agree, I know, that a vital first step to the achievement of our goal must be a massive turnout of every registered voter on Nov. 8, voting for those who back our program, voting in opposition to those who would delay or destroy it. We know both the friends and the enemies of the civil rights movement and of the labor movement in the Congress of the United States.

In the crucial elections of 1966, it behooves both the civil rights movement and the labor movement to support our friends and defeat our enemies. Those who counsel a boycott of the polls this year are either deliberately or mistakenly aiding only the enemies of both civil rights and the labor movement, and are playing into the hands of the demagogues who would use the white backlash to halt social progress in America.

No one could honestly pretend that the road to the achievement of full civil rights for all will be an easy one but it is a road America must traverse for it leads to a goal we must achieve.

In the achievement of that goal, the labor movement marches side by side with the leaders of the civil rights movement, like yourself, who joined in today's restatement of the policies and commitments of the civil rights movement.

Let me reiterate the AFL-CIO's position: We reject out of hand the concept that there can be any first-class or second-class citizenship in the United States. In our country there can be only one class—citizen—the highest and most meaningful title in a democracy.

Study Points Up Shortcomings:

Stronger Remedies by NLRB Urged on Employer Defiance

Stronger remedies are needed to control the hard-core minority of employers who succeed in killing new-born unions by defying the law, a researcher reported after a study of 1,000 National Labor Relations Board cases.

Most employers, however, comply with the law requiring them to bargain collectively, Dr. Philip Ross concluded in an analysis of all refusal-to-bargain charges closed by the NLRB in the five-year period ending June 30, 1962.

"The major shortcoming of the NLRB lies in its failure to adopt adequate and realistic remedies in those cases where the employer has unmistakably demonstrated a continuing intent to frustrate the [National Labor Relations] Act," he said.

Former Examiner

Ross is a former NLRB field examiner who is now on the faculty of the University of Pittsburgh's Graduate School of Business. The study was an individual effort financed in part by the board and published by it but the conclusions are only of Ross and not of the board, he said in presenting the report, the "Labor Law in Action," to Board Chairman Frank W. McCulloch and General Counsel Arnold Ordman.

The facts demonstrate, Ross said, that "the duty to bargain does work in practice and, on the whole, works remarkably well. But a grave problem emerges . . . concerning the employers who flagrantly violate the law and succeed in destroying collective bargaining."

The issue is "not simply a matter of safeguarding unions' interest" since "the basic purpose of the law is to protect the rights of employes to engage, or refuse to engage in, collective bargaining," he observed.

Ross asserted: "The successful frustration of employe rights by unlawful means is a serious matter. . . . It would be a mistake to gloss over the results . . . and conclude that all is well and nothing new need be done."

Agreeing "it is good to know that the non-compliers are relatively few in number," he declared that this "nevertheless does not minimize the danger of their serving as examples for others."

If the survey supports any conclusion, it is that the major impact of the NLRB lies in its effect "upon the millions of employers and tens of thousands of unions who do not figure in unfair labor practice proceedings," he continued.

Any weakening of employers' willingness to observe the law probably would result in a rise in strikes "induced by widespread cynicism of the value of board remedies," Ross said.

Recommending no new law, Ross urged the board to exercise the authority it now has, as follows:

"In clear-cut, naked refusal to bargain cases . . . accompanied by widespread unfair labor practices or in a context of repeated violations, the settlement agreement or board order should require" the offending employer to take specific action to "expunge the effects of the unfair labor practices and restore the parties as much as possible to their positions prior to the violation."

Among the actions Ross suggested were these:

- Providing an opportunity on company time and property for a board agent to read the NLRB notice to all employes and to answer their questions.
- Allowing the union a bulletin board on company premises.
- Under certain circumstances providing the union's representative with access to the place of business and with opportunities to talk to employes at specified times and places.
- Requiring the employer to adopt a model grievance procedure which would remain in effect until a contract has been reached.

Ross noted that the facts of each case should determine the precise remedies needed to overcome the consequences of an unfair labor practice. His recommendations, he said, would "impose the bare minimum of collective bargaining upon employers who have deliberately sought to gain" from unlawful conduct.

Ross made other major findings in his survey, which was limited to the effectiveness of the NLRB in dealing with the effects of one section of the labor law on employers and unions—Section 8 (a) (5), which says "It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer . . . to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employes . . ."

In the Law Since '35

"After all," he wrote, "the duty to bargain has been part of the legal environment of the American businessman since 1935."

His survey showed that:

Employers, by and large, take their legal obligations seriously and most of them have accepted board directives.

Most employers who violate the law have had little or no bargaining experience. In more than 74 percent of all cases studied, the parties had been bargaining three years or less, and in 58 percent of the cases, there was no bargaining history at all. By contrast, only 140 employers—14 percent of all violators—ran afoul of the law after bargaining with unions for 10 years or more.

About 55 percent of all accused employers had 39 or fewer employes in the bargaining unit. There were only 31 cases—about 3 percent of Ross's total—involving firms with 1,000 or more employes. Fully 95 percent of all cases occurred in units of less than 500 employes.

Employers who fought it out legally "often succeeded in ousting their unions." But an employer's decision to comply with the law "led more often than not to the establishment of stable bargaining," Ross reported.

The Ross study covers a period ending more than four years ago. Since that time, the number of unfair labor practice charges has set new high records in every succeeding year.

Such charges totaled 13,479 in fiscal 1962, the final year in the Ross study; 14,166 in 1963, 15,620 in 1964, 15,800 in 1965 and an indicated 15,900 for the year ended last June 30.

To slow down the great flood of employer violations and to balance the scales somewhat for employes, the board, responding to union complaints, has been moving in the direction of tailoring the remedies to the facts.

ILO Oil Parley Maps Automation Guidelines

Geneva—Guidelines to assure that the oil industry's technological changes will serve to better the life of its workers the world over were drawn at a 21-nation session just held here by the Intl. Labor Organization.

B. J. Schafer, secretary-treasurer of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, hailed the meeting of the United Nations agency's Petroleum Committee because of what he called its "broad approach to the social consequences of technological changes both in the developing and developed countries."

"The session marked only a start on this problem, but nevertheless it was a beginning," he emphasized.

Sec.-Treas. Newell J. Carman of the Operating Engineers completed the AFL-CIO team at the two-week conference of delegates representing workers, employers and governments of the leading oil producing and consuming countries.

Carman served on a sub-committee that prepared a unanimously approved charter on how vocational training should be used to help workers acquire and improve the skills that lead to more satisfying and better paid jobs.

It was stipulated that the training provided a worker to meet a need of his employer should be given on the company's time.

The committee noted that the "important changes" in the oil industry were structural as well as technological because they concern not only the extraction and the processing of crude oil, but also the siting of refineries.

Gains Stressed

"All such changes," the committee agreed, "should result in improved conditions for the workers employed and for the whole community of the producing country."

It urged arrangements "to protect the interests of the petroleum workers" and avoid job displacement.

How such arrangements should be carried out, both in the big industrial nations and in the socially and economically retarded countries where much of today's production of oil is concentrated, was carefully detailed.

Such accomplishments as this led Schafer, when addressing the committee's final meeting as chairman of the worker delegates, to describe the session as a "momentous and fruitful meeting."

Earlier, speaking as a U.S. delegate, he deplored the industry's trend toward keeping workers on the job overtime instead of offering more employment opportunities within the normal 40 hour week.

Both Schafer and Loyd B. Haskins, general secretary of the Intl. Federation of Petroleum & Chemical Workers, strongly criticized the continued denial of the 40-hour-week to oil workers in many parts of the world although the committee had proclaimed it a "desirable goal" as far back as 1948.

A resolution reaffirming this goal and calling for the "progressive reduction of hours of work without loss of pay for workers in the petroleum industry" was unanimously adopted.

50c Package Settles TWUA Dyers' Strike

New York — A package worth more than 50 cents an hour over the life of a three-year contract has ended a strike of about 10,000 members of the Textile Workers Union of America in more than 200 New York and New Jersey dyeing, finishing and printing plants.

The walkout, which affected eight locals, lasted 12 days. The workers went back to their jobs after ratifying the settlement, which was worked out with the employers by a 26-man union team.

The agreement earmarked 43 cents in wage increases, with a 20-cent general increase effective immediately; 13 cents on Oct. 1, 1967, and 10 cents a year later. In addition, maintenance men receive an additional immediate increase of 10 cents an hour and their helpers 5 cents.

The first-step hikes raise the minimum rate to $2.60 an hour and the average to $2.72. The minimums will go up to $2.83 effective in 1968 and the average to $2.95, according to William Gordon, TWUA dyeing industry director.

Other contract improvements include higher employer contributions to the Dyers & Printers Pension Fund and the Supplementary Vacation Pay Fund, both of which are operated jointly by the union and management.

Pensions will be adjusted upward and a third week of paid vacation will be given workers with 10 years of service on an industrywide basis.

Benefits for sickness or accident, formerly pegged at a flat $35 weekly, will now range between $38 and $55. Paid condolence leave was increased from one to three days, and a tenth holiday, Christmas Eve, was added.

halt the growth of "frustration and bitterness."

Meany wrote Randolph that he had read the statement of principles "with warmth and enthusiasm." He asked Randolph to convey to the other signers the AFL-CIO's "determination to achieve full equality in America in all fields—education, employment, accommodations, housing and justice."

The "white backlash" that has held back civil rights progress, Meany noted, has been fanned by "the ability of demagogues to capitalize upon rioting. It stems from unreasoning fear stimulated by the reckless cries of 'black power,'" he said. Meany added:

"In my book, the advocates of black supremacy and white supremacy belong in the same camp and the American trade union movement opposes both equally."

He stressed that "the AFL-CIO will not retreat from its commitment to the cause of civil rights any more than it would retreat from its commitment to abolish poverty, illness, suffering and want in this nation."

The issues are related, Meany noted. "Equal opportunity in employment is meaningless unless there is full opportunity; equal housing is impossible until we eliminate the slums and build the homes America needs for all its population—black or white; equal education is impossible until America puts its money where its mouth is and builds the kind of schools and supplies them with enough well-paid teachers to do the job of providing good education for every one of our children."

He called for "a massive turnout of every registered voter" in the Nov. 8 election as "a vital first step." He charged that "those who counsel a boycott of the polls this year" are "playing into the hands of the demagogues who would use the white backlash to halt social progress in America."

The reaffirmation by the signers of the declaration "of commitment to the attainment of racial justice by the democratic process . . . repudiation of the strategies of violence, reprisals or vigilantism . . . reaffirmation of the goals of integration commends itself to every thinking American," Meany said.

The labor movement, he declared, "marches side by side" with those who joined in the "restatement of the policies and commitments of the civil rights movement."

Mrs. Kelsey Dies; Headed Auxiliaries

Salt Lake City—Mrs. Anna Kelsey, president emeritus of the AFL-CIO National Auxiliaries, died here at the age 78.

Mrs. Kelsey had served as president of the Auxiliaries from 1957 to 1959. Previously she had been president of the Utah Auxiliary of the former Street & Electric Railway Employes, and had headed the American Federation of Women's Auxiliaries of Labor from 1951 to 1957.

She is survived by a son, W. Frank Kelsey, and a daughter, Mrs. Lillian Hardman, both of Salt Lake City; six grandchildren and three sisters.

Major Bills Passed In Drive to Adjourn

new money for loans to needy college students.

Both the House and Senate had voted for a $1.75 billion authorization for the poverty program, so the conference differences were largely over the earmarking of the money. However, a battle over appropriations was under way as the AFL-CIO News went to press. The House cut $187.5 million from the authorized amount in passing its final money bill of the session and efforts were under way to restore the cuts in the Senate.

A watered-down version of Pres. Johnson's proposal to suspend temporarily the 7 percent tax credit for business investment in new equipment was agreed to by House-Senate conferees. The suspension would run from Oct. 10, 1966—a month later than the President had proposed—until Dec. 31, 1967. The tax credit would still be given on the first $20,000 of equipment spending. The conferees dropped a Senate exemption for purchase of railroad cars, truck-trailers and cargo planes. The tax move was intended as an anti-inflation device to cut down spending by business and loosen the tight money squeeze.

A "truth-in-labeling" bill, the remnants of the original "truth-in-packaging" legislation, cleared Congress as the Senate accepted the House-passed bill which put regulation of packaging sizes on a strictly voluntary basis.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Warren G. Magnuson (D-Wash.) told a news conference the Senate conferees accepted the House bill "with great reluctance" because the alternative was "to have no bill at all."

He and Sen. Philip A. Hart (D-Mich.) told the Senate the bill was an effective labeling measure which would be helpful to consumers trying to compare price and contents of various brands.

On the House floor, a dialogue between House Commerce Committee Chairman Harley O. Staggers (D-W.Va.) and the committee's ranking Republican, Rep. William L. Springer (Ill.) provided an explanation of the refusal of the House conferees to compromise.

Springer noted, and Staggers agreed, that "there would have been no bill to come from the committee" if the chairman hadn't agreed to hold firm for the House version in conference. "A large majority" of the committee, Springer said, expressed themselves "very forcefully" on that matter.

Millions of people living in the Chicago-northern Indiana area will have preserved for recreation use a large area of the Indiana Dunes along the shores of Lake Michigan. Final agreement was reached for federal purchase of 6,539 acres of dunes, a relic of the last Ice Age, for a new Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore. The existing 2,181-acre Indiana Dunes State Park will be incorporated in it if the state donates the land.

Creation of the lakeshore was a major victory for Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), for years a leader of the fight to prevent commercial despoliation of the area. Indiana Democrats backed the bill; Republicans fought it.

Conservation forces won another victory with approval of a four-year program to halt the pollution of the nation's waterways. It authorizes more than $300 million for research and $3.4 billion for construction of sewage treatment plants.

Agreement was also reached on two significant health bills—an extension of federal aid to state health programs and a three-year grant program to help recruit and train nurses, laboratory technicians, dental aides and other health personnel.

House-Senate conferees dropped a segregationist rider from a $10.5 billion appropriation bill. As inserted by the Senate, it would have permitted segregation in federally-aided hospitals if the segregated facilities had been requested by a physician for "medical" reasons. Opponents charged this was an open invitation to southern doctors to "prescribe" segregation.

11 Rail Unions Charge 'Stall' In Negotiations

Chicago—Eleven railroad unions turned to federal mediation and strike authorization votes among their 500,000 members to get stalled wage and rules talks started again.

Negotiations by five non-operating unions and six shopcraft unions with nearly 200 U.S. railroads came to a halt in what the unions said was a "stall" by rail managements over proposals for improved wages and work rules.

Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board, called labor and management to meet with him starting Oct. 19 in settlement attempts. If no settlements result, and if a presidential emergency board also fails to get agreement, unions may stop work after giving notice under the Railway Labor Act.

The five "non-ops" include the Railway Clerks, the Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation-Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen, and Hotel & Restaurant Employes. They asked last May 10 for an 18 percent pay hike effective next Jan. 1, a cost of living escalator clause, a 3.5 percent increase next July 1, longevity pay and other improvements.

The AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. bargains for the Railway Carmen, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, and the Firemen & Oilers. They served similar proposals last May 17.

The non-ops have begun circulating strike ballots among their 300,000 members. The shopcrafts were reported preparing to do likewise. The former group said in a statement "the employes we represent have not had equitable wage adjustments since 1958."

Congress Approves Rail Pension Pact

Congress cleared the way for long-service railroad workers to get bigger pensions when they retire.

It gave final passage to an amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act incorporating a union-management agreement for supplementary pensions of $45 to $70 a month for workers with at least 25 years of service retired since July 1.

Management will pay the full cost and joined with the unions in urging Congress to pass the enabling legislation.

Living Costs Continue To Rise in September

The cost of living rose by three-tenths of 1 percent in September despite a drop in food prices, the Labor Dept. reported.

Higher apparel prices, especially for women's new fall clothing, were primarily responsible for the rise although housing and medical care costs also increased, the department said.

The Consumer Price Index advanced to 114.1 in September. This means the market basket of goods and services which cost $10 in the 1957-59 base period now costs $11.41.

Compared to a year ago, the CPI was up by 3.5 percent.

Dr. Arthur M. Ross, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, told reporters "it is our expectation that consumer prices will go up less in 1967 than in 1966."

Ross said indications are that the CPI rise for calendar year 1966 will be 3.5 percent. The rise next year will be lower, he added, unless there are unexpected happenings in the military and agricultural areas.

In a companion report on spendable earnings, the Labor Dept. reported that the take-home pay of a worker with three dependents surpassed $100 in September.

In terms of purchasing power, however, the worker's position was unchanged from a year ago. Reducing the gain in take-home pay by the rise in the CPI leaves the worker with 3 dependents with $88 a week, the same as Sept. 1965.

The spendable earnings of a factory worker with three dependents —his gross pay less social security and federal income tax deductions —averaged $100.33 in September. The single worker averaged $92.40.

The rise over the month was $1.30 for both groups. The entire increase was traced to a 4-cent rise in hourly earnings to $2.74—a record high. The workweek was unchanged. The auto workers were the main group receiving the hike.

The CPI rise shrunk the September earnings increase to 90 cents.

On the basis of the September CPI, some 78,000 workers will receive wage hikes because of an escalator clause in their union contracts. About 56,000—most of them at Douglas aircraft—will receive a 3-cents an hour rise.

Within the CPI, the food component fell by two-tenths of 1 percent. Fresh fruit and vegetable prices plunged an average of 7.5 percent due to abundant supplies.

Labor Dept. experts pinpointed the reasons for food prices rising 5.4 percent this year, noting that generally it was a matter of supply and demand. A freeze and dry spell caused a shortage earlier of fruits and vegetables. Meats were in short supply because this was a low point in the six-year production cycle; when consumers switched to poultry, the high demand on the available supply caused prices to rise. A world demand for grains used up surpluses and caused a temporary shortage and price rise. Low production in the dairy area pushed up prices in those products.

Strikers Win Vacation Claim In Kingsport

Cincinnati, O.—Members of five printing industry unions at Kingsport, Tenn., will get an estimated $503,000 in vacation pay under a ruling by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals here that some 1,806 workers are entitled to the money for vacations earned before they went on strike in 1963 against Kingsport Press.

John S. McLellan, attorney for the Allied Kingsport Press Unions, said management has refused all union requests for vacation pay on the ground that the strike terminated all such claims.

The unions recently called on management to resume talks on other unresolved contract issues in the long dispute but have received no reply, the attorney said, except for the filing by management of decertification petitions with the Atlanta office of the National Labor Relations Board. The petitions will not be acted on until the NLRB has disposed of union appeals in unfair labor practice charge cases, he said. The unions involved are the Bookbinders, Printing Pressmen, Stereotypers, Machinists and Typographers.

Fino termed the legislation "a tool of black power" and charged that "it will demonstrate how to burn shops and throw rocks. Vote against this bill if you want to stand up to black power," Fino shouted.

A Fino amendment to require the Justice Dept. to investigate groups involved in demonstration cities programs was decisively beaten on a voice vote. The bill's floor managers agreed to a restriction against requiring correction of racial imbalance as a condition of federal funds after explaining there was nothing in the legislation which could be interpreted as authorizing such a requirement.

The legislation authorized $400 million in demonstration grants for the fiscal year beginning next July 1 and $500 million the following year.

The money would generate large additional sums of federal grants under existing programs since it could be used to pay up to 80 percent of matching funds needed to take advantage of the federal programs.

Other sections of the omnibus bill add $250 million to funds available under the regular urban renewal program, set up a new program of grants for metropolitan area development, and authorize federal mortgage insurance for construction of group medical practice facilities.

Ready for Signing

The Senate had passed similar legislation in mid-August and a House-Senate conference resolved differences between the two measures. The final version won quick approval in both houses and moved to the White House.

Responsibility for administering the program falls on the new Dept. of Housing & Urban Development.

Johnson charged the department to see to it that plans approved for demonstration cities grants be large enough "to make a substantial impact within the coming few years on the development of the entire city."

He held out the hope for a rebirth of cities to make life "more tolerable," avoid the "waste of human resources," stop the flight of middle-income families and reduce welfare costs.

The President asked: "Let us begin—begin now, this year."

EDITORIAL: The Record of the 89th Congress

THE 89TH CONGRESS, which adopted more legislation sought and supported by the labor movement than any other Congress, clearly did more for more people in more areas of need than any of its predecessors.

- Education for our children
- Medicare for our elderly
- New minimum wage coverage for millions and increased minimums for millions more of the working poor
- Housing hope for those who live in slums and ghettos
- Support for our armed forces in Viet Nam
- Anti-inflation tax measures to protect the economy
- Recreational areas for residents of our crowded cities
- Help for overburdened transportation systems
- Health measures to protect our air and water from pollution

This is but a partial list of the legislation sought by the AFL-CIO and passed by the 89th Congress, the best Congress yet.

Perhaps the most important single victory of the 89th was its defeat of Sen. Dirksen's attempt to block the one-man, one-vote concept—won by the labor movement after years of fighting in the courts. Twice Sen. Dirksen tried to overturn that judicial triumph and twice the Senate rebuffed him.

The record, of course, was not one of complete success. Many of the most important bills on labor's legislative agenda did not pass.

Repeal of Section 14(b) and new civil rights legislation were both killed by the filibuster when Sen. Dirksen revived and led the southern Dixiecrat-reactionary Republican coalition to a victory for the minority over the majority. Situs picketing and federal standards for unemployment compensation did not survive the full legislative route. Labor's battle for these and other needed bills must be and will be renewed next January.

It is obvious that the AFL-CIO's legislative victories in the 89th Congress were the result of our 1964 COPE effort. The liberals of both parties in both Houses, whom we helped to elect, operating under the leadership of a President dedicated to building a better America, wrote this box score.

It is now up to us to protect it and expand upon it in the next Congress. While we praise the record of the 89th Congress, we cannot be satisfied or smug. We still must achieve the legislation that didn't pass this time.

That means we must re-elect all the liberals in the 89th Congress, and defeat all those who fought progress, fought Pres. Johnson and fought labor.

Your COPE voting record tells the story about every member of the Congress. Those who supported the President and who voted for labor's program deserve your support and your vote. Those who didn't, deserve to be beaten.

Labor's age-old slogan is just as true today as in Gompers' time: Support your friends and defeat your enemies.

The 89th Congress did its job; now it is up to us to do our job at the polls on Election Day. If we do, the box score of the 90th Congress will be even better.

All-Out Labor Vote Urged for Liberals

Goal to Go

Meany Calls On Unions To 'Do Job'

The "best" Congress in the nation's history completed its work and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany called on union members to turn out at the polls Nov. 8 to re-elect labor's friends and defeat "all those who fought progress, fought Pres. Johnson and fought labor."

The guide, Meany stressed, is the COPE voting record, which "tells the story about every member of the Congress."

Elected in the 1964 Johnson landslide, the 89th Congress was the first since the peak of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal to have a liberal majority.

Its first session was one dazzling triumph after another—historic breakthroughs on medicare, aid to education, voting rights, immigration reform, a bold stimulus to the economy to bypass the traditional cycle of recession after a period of growth.

The second session saw the biggest advance in the wage-hour law ever enacted, the start of a pioneering new program of help for the cities, solid advances in a multitude of areas—and some frustrations and setbacks. (Summary of major actions, Pages 10 and 11.)

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller was asked in a network radio interview how he graded the two-year record of Congress. Biemiller, who served two terms in the House before becoming labor's chief legislative spokesman, said that despite several "bitter disappointments," the 89th Con-

House Margin Is Major Election Issue

By Willard Shelton

When voters go to the polls Nov. 8, they will be deciding basically a single issue—whether to continue the record of liberal legislation that marked the 89th Congress or allow a slippage back to conservative control of the new Congress by a bipartisan coalition.

Up for election are 435 members of the House, 35 senators and 35 governors.

It can scarcely be expected that the Republican Party, in a midterm election following its massive defeats of 1964, would not manage to show some bounce-back this year—not unless the GOP has become a permanent minority party of about the significance suggested by the 294-141 Democratic House majority elected two years ago.

As election day drew near, however, a remarkable fact could be observed—the once confidently-advanced Republican claims that House gains of 40, 50 or even 70 seats were within their grasp tended to disappear.

The more modest figure of a net gain of 30 seats emerged again as the hoped-for prospect.

Most political observers would write down anything less as another GOP defeat, because this is a midterm election, because the Goldwater incubus is not directly attached to the candidates and because the disaster of 1964 was so colossal that the party seemed to have no way to go but up.

There were solid experts, moreover, who placed the probable GOP gain as no more than 25 seats, and others who placed it as low as 18 or 20, with the prospect for significant gains in the Senate and among the governors appearing barren.

The areas of Republican gains or losses must be considered at least as important as sheer numbers.

There seems some likelihood, for example, that Republicans will lose two or three House seats they won in Alabama in 1964 while winning two or three in Georgia. Such changes would not be substantive, because the voting records of southern Goldwater Republicans and conservative segregationist Democrats have been shown to be identical.

The re-election of freshman Democratic House members from Iowa, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, and Wisconsin, on the other hand, would have major significance, because these congressmen are among the 50-odd liberals who furnished the balance of power for major Johnson Administration programs such as medicare, school aid and minimum wage improvements.

Farm Union Gets Election At DiGiorgio

San Francisco — The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee and the DiGiorgio Fruit Corp. have signed an agreement providing for a representation election Nov. 4 at the firm's gigantic King Ranch, at Arvin, Calif.

The election will be a yes or no vote with only the AFL-CIO affiliate on the ballot.

IUE Wins Key Westinghouse Pact; IBEW Seeks National Agreement

By Eugene A. Kelly

Coalition bargaining won a major settlement for 40,000 Westinghouse employes represented by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers but deadlocked negotiations between the company and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers posed the possibility of a strike of 14,000 IBEW members.

An IBEW spokesman said "we may have to go out at midnight Oct. 31" unless the corporation moves in the 10 areas the union calls "critical to our members"—the chief issue being a national agreement at all 60 IBEW locations. No progress was made in those areas at last-minute meetings called by federal mediators in Pittsburgh, the union said.

Westinghouse offered the same contract "package" to IUE and IBEW, but IBEW turned it down on the ground that it failed to resolve additional national and local issues. The brotherhood has a national agreement covering fewer than 2,000 members but local pacts involve 12,000 others.

The IBEW wants all its Westinghouse members covered by a single national agreement similar to the one the company has with the IUE.

The two unions, and nine others, have been coordinating their negotiating efforts through the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining at both Westinghouse and General Electric Co. Though some of the unions have settled, others have not and strikes over local issues were in progress at nine locations of both firms as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

Other unions in the coalition, besides the IUE and the IBEW, are the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

The IUE reached agreement with GE as the first fruit of coalition bargaining, and then with Westinghouse, second major giant in electrical manufacturing. All 11

the payroll during the period Oct. 18-26 are eligible to vote. More than 600 farm workers are expected to cast ballots. The unit embraces more than 2,000 workers at peak employment.

The Teamsters, who lost the first DiGiorgio election to the Farm Workers in Delano on Aug. 30, had held up the Arvin vote for six weeks by refusing to accept election recommendations. The Teamsters have now announced their withdrawal from the DiGiorgio campaign, thereby clearing the way for the vote.

The election agreement was made public at a press conference in Los Angeles by Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown. Present was a delegation of workers off the DiGiorgio ranch led by Dir. Cesar Chavez of the Farm Workers and Dolores Huerta, one of the union leaders.

Brown had been in almost daily contact with the parties and is credited by all with having played a key role in setting up the vote. He told the press that the election is part of California's effort to eliminate all semblances of poverty and second-class citizenship, and added that it is not a give-away program or any kind of welfare, but rather represents, in the best American tradition of cooperation between government, industry and labor, the extension to farm workers of the opportunity to help themselves through unionism and collective bargaining.

Labor Body Cited

AFL-CIO Organization Dir. William L. Kircher, who handled the negotiations, singled out the labor movement in San Francisco for special credit in the accomplishment.

Extensive support was given throughout the campaign by AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Daniel V. Flanagan; Robert Ash, Russell Crowell and Richard Groulx of the Alameda County AFL-CIO; Pres. George Johns of the San Francisco AFL-CIO; and Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts, Vice Pres. Manuel Diaz and other officers of the State AFL-CIO.

"This great manifestation of trade union solidarity was a principal factor in accomplishing the election agreement," Kircher said.

Florida Rail Pickets Upheld by High Court

The Supreme Court in a 4-4 tie vote affirmed the right of rail union members to picket the Jacksonville, Fla., terminal of the struck Florida East Coast Railway.

The ruling, though a legal victory for the Railroad Trainmen, Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, and the Conductors & Brakemen, does not signal the resumption of picketing. Still unsettled is an anti-picketing injunction issued by a state circuit court judge in Jacksonville, union spokesmen said. They will ask that the state appeals court expedite hearings in that case.

The Supreme Court action, announced in a one-sentence opinion, upheld a ruling last May 24 by the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, New Orleans, that the Norris-LaGuardia Act bars federal court injunctions in such cases.

Justice Abe Fortas did not participate in the decision. Court officials said that when the Supreme Court affirms a lower court by a tie vote, the action does not set a precedent.

The suit to block picketing was brought by the Jacksonville Terminal Co. and two other railroads which share the station with the FEC. They said they have no dispute with the unions and that picketing halted all their traffic as well as that of the struck FEC.

On May 10 a U.S. District Court in Jacksonville ordered picketing limited to an entrance set aside for FEC employes. The decision was overruled by the 5th U.S. Circuit but the injunction was ordered kept in effect during the appeal.

Union attorneys told the high court, in argument early in October, that the dispute involves "primary, common-situs picketing" and the Jacksonville terminal is "the house where the FEC does business" and therefore the place where pickets may advise the public of a labor dispute.

Members of non-operating unions have been on strike against the FEC since January 1963 and the other three unions—all on-train employe organizations—at different intervals since then. Both strikes resulted from union efforts to get contracts with the FEC, which has been run by strikebreakers.

Hungarian Uprising, 10 Years Later, Cited as Lesson for the Free World

New York—The Hungarian uprising of 1956 cracked the fable of the "monolithic unity" of the Communists and destroyed the myth that only under Communist dictatorship can the oppressed and exploited build a better society, Anna Kethly, minister of state in the short-lived government of Imre Nagy, declared here.

The 78-year-old freedom fighter and former president of the Association of Hungarian Office Workers was the principal speaker at a meeting commemorating the 10th anniversary of the uprising. The session was co-sponsored by several AFL-CIO unions, including the Seafarers, Utility Workers Local 1-2 and affiliates of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Also participating were Freedom House and the labor-backed Intl. Rescue Committee.

Miss Kethly, who came to this country from her home in exile in Brussels especially for the meeting, pointed out that the Hungarian revolution "proved beyond any doubt that no dictatorship is based on the consent of the people." Ten years later, she said, the Russians who quelled the uprising are still fearful and the Communist secret police "are everywhere in Hungary arresting and jailing Hungarians."

"I know that there are voices in Europe and in America that say things have improved in Hungary under the Communist government," she said. "But why are thousands of my people persecuted—why are tens of thousands of Hungarian workers fighting back and resisting by slow-downs in the factories?

"After 10 years we are more convinced than ever that the cause of freedom in the whole world would have gained a great victory if the free countries had come to our rescue . . .

Meaning of Freedom

"The free world needed the shock of the Hungarian revolution to overcome its indifference and illusions. The suppression of the revolution taught the free world that freedom is no empty slogan . . .

"Ten years after the Hungarian revolution, freedom on this side of the Iron Curtain is still not fully protected against Communist aggression, subversion and infiltration. It is nevertheless a consolation for us Hungarian refugees that people listen to us and are prepared to draw the necessary lessons from our tragic experiences."

At the conclusion of her address, Miss Kethly thanked "the entire membership of the AFL-CIO, its Executive Council and its Pres. George Meany."

Dir. Jay Lovestone of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs told the meeting that if the free world had gone to the aid of the Hungarian freedom fighters, the world would not now be faced by war in Viet Nam.

He called for action by the United Nations to force the Soviet Union to release the unknown thousands of Hungarians it has imprisoned and to open the way for free democratic elections that would let the people decide if they want to continue a Communist government that was forced on them.

Per Capita Hike Voted:

Laborers Approve Skill Training Plan

St. Louis, Mo.—Expansion of the Laborers' program of training to upgrade the skills of construction members was unanimously approved by the union's 15th convention.

The more than 2,200 delegates acted after the convention Committee on Education, Training & Safety warned that without the acquisition of new skills, "the construction laborer will soon become extinct."

"Training is not a one-shot proposition but must be based upon a continuous program of upgrading and skill conversion to provide greater job mobility for our members," the committee said.

"In the long run this can only be achieved by our establishing permanent training facilities in every location possible through our collective bargaining agreements."

The convention also voted without discussion to accept recommendations of the executive board increasing the per capita payment to the international from $1 to $1.25 a month, the minimum monthly dues from $3 to $4 and the initiation fee from $75 to $100.

In addition, the international constitution was revised to permit the executive board to waive the initiation fee and to allow the board to transfer its authority in this respect to the president.

Eighteen cents of the increase in the per capita payment was earmarked for the general fund to meet higher costs and expanded services; 5 cents goes to the death benefit fund, and 2 cents to the international union's retirement and pension fund.

Pension Fund Change

The pension fund, which is contributory and voluntary, henceforth will receive 5 cents from each monthly per capita payment instead of the previous 3 cents, and will continue to receive 3 percent of each initiation fee the international receives.

The convention also liberalized the pension plan for paid officers and employes of locals and district councils, raising the maximum on which a 10 percent levy is imposed from $10,000 to $20,000, increasing benefits and providing an option under which widows of beneficiaries can receive retirement benefits.

Pres. Joseph V. Moreschi's proposal for establishment of a Public Relations & Publication Dept. in the international union was approved without dissent.

Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers hailed the union for its growth in the past few years and for the development of its training and retraining programs.

"It must give you a great deal of satisfaction to know that not only have you built a great union, not only have you achieved the economic and social gains for your membership that you have," he said, "but in addition, you have been able to bring into the life of the laboring class of this country, the laborer himself, by name and by definition, more dignity, more pride, more recognition in the social life of this country, and made for him a far better place in this world."

With Canada preparing to observe the centennial of its confederation in 1967, Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress took stock of organized labor's contributions to the growth of that nation in the past century and outlined some of the challenges that still face its trade unions.

The accomplishments, he said, include better living standards, reduced hours, greater leisure and major improvements in social benefits—and they have contributed to the welfare of non-union as well as union workers.

In labor's "charter for tomorrow," Jodoin said, the top target in the economic field is job security "to protect workers and assure the economic health of the country." Also on its agenda, he said, are further improvements of living standards and wages, a sound manpower program, and a better social security program.

Calls for Growth

Pres. B. A. Gritta of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. urged every member of the Laborers to "give a little bit of his time and energy towards improving the lot, yes, of the common people of this country—to improving their wages and working conditions, bringing them into the folds of the trade union movement."

"This is what will make our great movement greater," he said. "This is what will make this great organization greater. If there is no other message that I could leave with you, that would be my plea to you—to go home and organize, to organize so that we can bring the unorganized workers into the trade union movement."

Sec.-Treas. Frank Bonadio of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. declared that unless unionization in the construction industry is stepped up, "we will not be respected as the backbone of the American trade union movement."

He urged the delegates to impress upon their members at home that "the stronger you are locally, the more influence we have nationally."

Pact Averts Canada-Wide NABET Strike

Toronto, Ont.—More than 1,800 members of the Broadcast Employes & Technicians in 34 centers won pay increases totaling 24.15 percent over 30 months in a new contract which averted a nationwide strike at the government-owned Canadian Broadcasting Co.

The settlement was negotiated by a union bargaining committee headed by Regional Dir. Tim O'Sullivan at a marathon session conducted by Assistant Deputy Labor Minister Bernard Wilson.

Nine percent of the pay boost is retroactive to Jan. 1, 1966. Another 9 percent becomes effective next Jan. 1 and a final 4.5 percent in October 1967. The total is raised above the 24 percent mark because the increases are cumulative.

Earlier the members had rejected the recommendation of a federal conciliation board for three non-cumulative increases of 7.5 percent, or a total of 22.5 percent.

CBC technical employes have rates ranging from $65 to $138 a week, with the majority in a unit with scales from $70 to $120.

The CBC under the settlement agreed not to contract out work when it would result in members of the bargaining unit losing employment. The union may invoke binding arbitration immediately if it feels the contract is being violated in this respect.

Labor, Rights Groups Back Randolph:

Ten-Year 'Freedom Budget' Set Forth to Erase Poverty

New York—The full support of the American labor movement stands behind a new 10-year program calling for more than $100 billion to wipe out poverty, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman declared. The new offensive, known as a "Freedom Budget for All Americans," was conceived and launched at a conference called by A. Philip Randolph, AFL-CIO vice president and head of the institute bearing his name. Its purposes are to:

- Restore and maintain full employment.
- Guarantee a minimum adequate income to all who cannot be employed.
- Assure adequate income for all employed.
- Wipe out slum ghettos and provide a decent home for every American family.
- Provide modern medical care for all Americans.
- Provide educational opportunity for all within the limits of their ability, ambition and means.
- Wipe out other examples of neglect, including air and water pollution, transportation snarls and inadequate use of great natural resources.
- Correlate full employment with sustained production and economic growth.

In his remarks before the conference, which drew several hundred people in civil rights, trade union, social welfare, educational and religious organizations, Randolph called the proposed "freedom budget" the "most important anti-poverty development since the famous March on Washington in 1963."

Since that day much has changed," Randolph declared. "There are signs of a new resistance to our struggle. We face more complex and difficult problems. A weary, but no less cruel, indifference has settled upon elements in the Congress. And within our own ranks, confusion and division have been exploited by our enemies."

He pointed out that the "freedom budget" program has some 140 signatories representing every important segment of the community—national and local civil rights organizations, the united labor movement, major Protestant, Catholic and Jewish institutions, forward-looking business leaders, prominent economists and academicians, and students and intellectuals. All, he said, are committed, both morally and financially.

While explaining that American Negroes count importantly in the freedom budget program, Randolph noted that "we must not forget that 75 percent of the poor are white, and no less than Negroes are denied adequate income, decent housing, quality education, sufficient health care and security."

"The tragedy is that the workings of our economy often pit the white poor and the black poor against each other at the bottom of society," he said. "The tragedy is that groups only one generation removed from poverty themselves, haunted by the memory of scarcity and fearful of slipping back, step on the fingers of those struggling up the ladder."

He called the "freedom budget" program "feasible, concrete, specific, quantitative, set forth in dollars and cents, and down-to-earth with goals and priorities." The federal government alone has resources equal to the task of the program, he asserted.

In his remarks at the conference, Slaiman quoted a statement to Randolph made by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in which he declared:

"The AFL-CIO is dedicated to building the kind of America which will supply the answers to all these problems. Our goal is to provide the schools, provide the jobs, provide the homes, provide the health care and provide the understanding that it is poverty and ignorance and despair that are the real root causes of all America's domestic problems. . . .

"The goals of the 'freedom budget' parallel the objectives of the American labor movement and will make a significant contribution to their achievement."

Randolph told the conference that the institute bearing his name plans to circulate upwards of 125,000 booklets setting forth the "freedom budget" program. Bayard Rustin, institute director, reported that already most of these booklets have been earmarked for distribution among labor, civic, social welfare, religious and educational groups.

The "freedom budget" is based on the belief that deliberate efforts must be made to see that through combined private and public effort, a large enough proportion of the nation's "economic growth dividend" is directed towards the priorities of the nation's needs.

"The 'freedom budget' has moral as well as materialistic needs," the A. Philip Randolph Institute declares.

Top priority in the "freedom budget" would go to achieving and sustaining full employment. This accomplishment would so boost national production and national income that the "dividends" of economic growth would finance programs needed for the total elimination of poverty.

Dual Value

Creation of full employment would, in itself, meet many of the social goals of the program, its sponsors note. To meet the housing need for lower middle-income as well as poor families, construction jobs would advance by 35 percent in 1970 and by 53 percent in 1975.

The "freedom budget" calls for allocation of about $27 billion for school construction over the next half-dozen years; it calls for a doubling of health facilities.

Full employment, the report stresses, means full-time employment at adequate wages for all able to work. Substandard wages account for a fifth of all poverty in the nation, it points out.

With sustained economic growth, the federal budget could rise substantially in dollar terms and yet amount to a smaller portion of the national wealth, the report says.

The "freedom budget" projects sharp increases in federal spending over the next 10 years, particularly for the anti-poverty program, housing and community development, agriculture and natural resources, education, and health services and research.

With rapid elimination of unemployment among those able to work, society would easily be able to provide a decent—not just minimal—standard of support for persons unable to work, including the elderly and infirm, the report declares.

ACHIEVEMENT AWARD for being one of the first 10 international unions to meet its quota of affiliations to state and local central bodies was presented to Pres. Felix C. Jones on behalf of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler during the union's convention in Louisville, Ky.

Cement Union Re-elects Felix Jones as President

Louisville, Ky.—The Cement Workers' delegates wound up their 13th convention here by re-electing Pres. Felix C. Jones and all incumbent vice presidents.

In the only contest, Reuben Roe of Davenport, Ia., the union's first general vice president defeated Local 14 Pres. Ralph Talotta of Coplay, Pa., for the office of general secretary-treasurer, 225 to 67. Roe will succeed Toney Gallo, retiring.

Elected Canadian vice-president, a new position established by the convention was Gabriel E. Cormier of Montreal.

In other actions, the convention:

- Improved the union's pension and health and welfare plans.
- Increased salaries 5 percent effective Nov. 1, 1966.
- Increased the per capita payment to the international by 15 cents per month per member.
- Increased monthly minimum dues to $5.00 from $4.50.
- Liberalized vacations for the union's officers and representatives.
- Approved constitutional changes regarding strike procedures.
- Adopted other constitutional changes regarding union policy.
- Rejected a proposal to print a portion of the union's monthly magazine in the French language.
- Established a severance pay plan for the union's officers and representatives.
- Conferred the title of general secretary-treasurer emeritus on Gallo, effective next Jan. 1.
- Urged more activity from locals on the legislative and political fronts, particularly through the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.
- Called on all of the union's Canadian locals to affiliate with the New Democratic Party.
- Overwhelmingly endorsed Pres. Johnson's policies with respect to Viet Nam.

Heading convention speakers were AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William Schnitzler and Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Miami Beach, Fla., was selected as the 1968 convention site.

IBEW Deadline Nears In Westinghouse Talks

coalition unions approved the terms of new national contracts with GE but locals at these GE locations struck over local issues:

The Machinists at Belleville and Rockford, Ill.; the UAW at Fort Smith, Ark., and Warren, Mich.; the IUE at Appliance Park, Louisville, Ky., involving one department; the IUE and the Technical Engineers at Schenectady, N.Y.; and the AFTE at Pittsfield, Mass.

Two Westinghouse locations were struck also over local grievances. At Jersey City, N.J., IUE Local 456 called out salaried workers, and Local 486, representing production and maintenance workers, voted to respect the picket lines; the Machinists struck at Beaver, Pa., over a grievance and IBEW production workers observed the lines.

IUE's national agreement with Westinghouse benefits 40,000 workers represented by 29 locals. The settlement was reached after six weeks of negotiations.

The IUE's Westinghouse Conference Board voted unanimously to approve the new three-year pact calling for nearly 30 cents an hour in direct wage increases, a cost-of-living provision and pension plan improvements.

Conference Board Chairman Robert Nellis of IUE described the settlement as "the best we have ever negotiated with Westinghouse." He said the average worker, now earning $2.95 an hour, should be earning $3.24 an hour, exclusive of living-cost adjustments, by the end of the contract period—Nov. 10, 1969.

The pact provides across-the-board raises of 11.5 cents an hour this year, and from 6 to 12 cents an hour in each of the following two years, plus a formula insuring additional increases totaling up to 3.5 percent in the last two contract years, geared to living-cost rises.

Also gained were additional increases of 1 to 10 cents an hour for skilled trades and salaried workers at individual locations; a minimum pension guarantee and other pension improvements; a ninth paid holiday in 1968; chosen by local option; and better health and hospitalization protection.

Pension improvements, a major contract objective, set a basic normal retirement minimum of $120 a month as against the present $83.

All through the negotiations, members of the 10 other unions were part of the IUE's negotiating committee, and IUE members sat in other meetings. The unified approach will continue this year and the coalition will seek to perfect it in the future. The backing of all AFL-CIO unions has been pledged by Federation Pres. George Meany.

The IBEW Westinghouse Council met in Pittsburgh Oct. 27 and 28 to vote on rejection of the firm's "package" proposal to the national IBEW negotiating committee and to consider possible strike action. Unsettled issues, besides a national contract, include night shift and group leader differentials, company-wide seniority, arbitration, union security and geographic wage differentials.

The coalition method, tried this year for the first time in bargaining with GE and Westinghouse, was credited with breaking GE's 22-year-old "take-it-or-leave-it" bargaining technique to win agreements for all 11 unions.

Indiana Labor Mounts Major Election Effort

Indianapolis—The Indiana AFL-CIO set its sights on the election of friendly candidates Nov. 8 and improvements in state labor legislation.

Nearly 1,000 delegates to the state body's fifth biennial convention endorsed a political action program aimed toward a record election turnout of union members and their families and a legislative program keyed to passage in 1967 of a state labor relations act.

The convention endorsed bills providing increases in workmen's accident insurance coverage and unemployment compensation. The bills, and others, were drafted by study commissions which included members of Indiana labor bodies.

The delegates voted to increase endowment funds for the Eugene V. Debs Memorial Foundation and the Philip Murray Foundation, which conducts research into heart disease.

They adopted the political action resolution after hearing National COPE Dir. Alexander Barkan urge them to make the election their main activity until it is concluded.

Barkan and Pres. Miles G. Stanley of the West Virginia AFL-CIO, assistant to Federation Pres. George Meany, lauded the Indiana labor movement for its part in getting the legislature to repeal the state "right-to-work" law last year. The law, on the books since 1957, had barred employers and unions from negotiating union shop agreements.

Other convention speakers included Pres. Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employes, Sec.-Treas. Sam Ezelle of the Kentucky AFL-CIO, Senators Birch Bayh (D) and Vance Hartke (D), Rep. Andrew Jacobs, Jr. (D) and Gov. Roger D. Branigin (D).

The convention returned Pres. Dallas W. Sells, Sec.-Treas. Max F. Wright and Vice Pres. Jacob R. Roberts to office for new two-year terms without contest and chose Willis Z. Zagrovich of Steelworkers Local 1014, Gary, as vice president succeeding George Colwell, who retired after serving as a full-time officer since merger.

The number of executive board seats was increased from 12 to 15.

DELEGATES to 20th convention of the Chemical Workers heard Pres. Walter L. Mitchell, shown at rostrum, recommend changes designed to strengthen the union in the face of new bargaining techniques developed by huge chemical and allied industrial combines to hold down contract gains. The convention voted to accept Mitchell's proposals for expanded organizing and defense funds.

Chemical Union Acts to Beef Up Bargaining Program, Strike Fund

Montreal, Que.—A record turnout of delegates to the Chemical Workers convention approved a series of proposals designed to strengthen the union's collective bargaining position in the chemical industry.

The 676 delegates from 353 locals in the U.S. and Canada approved a 50-cents monthly increase in per capita payments to be divided equally between the strike and the general funds, a "crisis strike plan" placing a floor of $500,000 on the existing strike fund, and constitutional language aimed at giving the international union stronger centralized bargaining authority.

The convention also voted to increase minimum dues to $5 per month, up from $4, and approved a $2 million expansion of ICWU headquarters in Akron, O.

Salaries Raised

Salary increases of $5,000 per year were approved for Pres. Walter L. Mitchell and Sec.-Treas. Marshall Shafer, and $3,000 hikes a year were voted for the nine vice presidents. Mitchell and Shafer now earn $23,000 and $21,000 respectively, the vice presidents, $15,000.

Mitchell in his keynote address labeled this a "collective bargaining convention" and later characterized the five-day sessions as "the most successful" ever held by the union.

The 50-cent increase in per capita tax brings monthly payments to $2.80 and is the second increase authorized by an ICWU convention in the last two years. In 1964, delegates raised per capita payments by 30 cents.

The new "crisis strike plan" is activated when the strike fund "totals less than $500,000 on the 15th day of any month." The next three months are defined as "emergency months" and payments of $5 (in addition to regular monthly dues) are invoked and will continue until the strike fund balance on the 15th day of the previous month "is equal to the highest balance previously achieved, or $5 million whichever is less."

Delegates also vested responsibility for collective bargaining in the international union when they adopted a change in the constitution which reads in part: "It shall be the responsibility of the international union to adopt programs and policies with respect to collective bargaining and all collective bargaining shall be conducted in accordance with such policies. . . ."

Additionally, the convention gave the international president the authority to approve all contracts. Mitchell later called this perhaps the most significant action of the convention, as it deals directly with a problem of local autonomy that he said "plagued this union for many years."

Featured speakers at the convention were Auto Workers Pres. Walter Reuther, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Sen. Clifford Case (R-N.J.), Donald MacDonald, secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Labor Congress, and T. C. Douglas, leader of Canada's New Democratic Party.

Case was given a unanimous endorsement for re-election by the convention after his speech in which he called for a revival of the two party system.

"There is no security in reliance upon a single individual or institution," he declared. "Competition is the only thing that will do it.

Wirtz told the convention that repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act is still high on the Administrations' list of legislative priorities.

Aluminum Pacts Set Salary Status

Kingston, Ont.—Some 1,200 employes of the Aluminum Co. of Canada abandoned their hourly-rated pay status and became salaried workers this month under a new contract between the company and two unions, the Steelworkers and the Machinists.

The two-year agreement yields a package averaging better than $20 a week. Pay boosts range from $4.80 to $12.40 a week retroactive to last May, with additional increases of $4 to $11.60 due next May. After the 1967 hikes, salaries will range from $92 to $134 a week.

Members of the two unions continue to receive shift premiums and overtime pay. They also will receive five weeks of paid vacation after 20 years.

Political Action Stepped Up:

'Massive' Organizing Set by Ship Builders

Miami Beach—Dedication to a massive organizing drive among remaining holdout shipyards and intensified political activities were the themes dominant at the 23rd convention of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers.

Winding up their four-day sessions here, the delegates unanimously re-elected Pres. John J. Grogan, Vice Pres. Andrew A. Pettis and Sec.-Treas. Ross D. Blood to four-year terms.

They were urged by Grogan to step up their political activities both before the November elections and throughout the year.

"Crucial to the life-and-death struggle for the marine industries is the outcome of elections for the House and for Senate seats," he declared. "As never before in the history of our organization, every member of this union must fight for the election of candidates ready to open the frontiers of a policy to expand and build the American merchant marine."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, a former shipyard worker, gripped the delegates' attention in describing the hazardous conditions under which he worked years ago. He dwelt at length on the constructive legislation enacted by the 89th Congress and urged the re-election of freshman congressmen who had ensured passage of Pres. Johnson's social program.

Work at Polls Urged

"There's work to be done at the polls," he said, "and if you are to get re-endorsement of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers Act to save your lives and limbs and to prevent injuries in the yards, and to make progress in achieving the humane goals AFL-CIO stands for, you will work to seat the candidates your organization endorses."

Under Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, addressing the convention, cited a "creditability gap" in the position of the ship owners who insist on sailing their vessels under foreign flags in view of the national requirement of a fleet to meet both defense and economic's needs. He decried efforts of shipping and industry magnates to divide maritime labor in advocating the build-abroad policy.

Reviewing the state of the economy, Henning cited the unprecedented expansion under the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations for business.

Another featured speaker, Vice Adm. John S. McCain (USN), declared that seapower is not only vital in time of war, but it also has a direct bearing on the every day lives of every individual in the nation.

McCain, commander of the Eastern Sea Frontier and deputy director of the U.S. mission to the United Nations, warned that Communist nations will gain control of the world unless the United States keeps global sealanes open.

"If we control the seas, we have access to 85 per cent of the world's surface," he observed.

If merchant shipping doesn't get through, he told the delegates, the economy of free nations will be stifled because both raw materials and production will be completely quarantined and boxed in.

In dedicating the union to an expanded organizing drive, the delegates also directed the staff's endeavors to unorganized workers who will build the vessels, vehicles and underwater equipment to explore the ocean depths in the fast-approaching oceanographic era.

The convention by resolution reaffirmed its support for civil rights and a sustained effort to abolish discrimination. It called upon all affiliates to resist Ku Klux Klan and John Birch Society supervision of the bill of rights. The delegates pledged their every resource in carrying on "a relentless battle against the suicidal doctrines" of every form of discrimination and prejudice.

Another resolution called upon Congress to appropriate funds to build at least 60 to 90 merchant vessels a year for the next five years to make the merchant marine an effective instrument in foreign and domestic waterborne commerce.

The convention lauded the Administration's efforts to gain freedom and lasting peace for the Vietnamese people and bring the Communists to the negotiating table. They unqualifyingly endorsed U.S. aid to the embattled South Vietnamese to promote economic development and wipe out ignorance, hunger and disease.

Medicare Units Planned

The convention directed all locals to establish committees for the extension of medicare and other vital aid to the elderly.

The delegates called for a modernized unemployment insurance program as a "major preventive strategy" in the war on poverty, and for higher standards and greater coverage under the federal minimum wage law. They urged Congress and the states to remedy the shortcomings and inadequacies of workmen's compensation laws by lifting minimum standards.

Other resolutions supported free education from elementary school through college and urged intensification of efforts to defeat state right-to-work laws and repeal section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Runaway Bread and Milk Prices Laid to Processors and Retailers

Retail prices of bread and milk jumped sharply over the past few months because farmers, processors and retailers all took a bigger cut out of the consumer's dollar, the Federal Trade Commission reported after making an investigation at the request of the Dept. of Agriculture.

Farm prices went up because of smaller supplies, the report said, with processors and retailers adding on three times as much in the case of bread and double the amount of the increase for milk.

"Retailers not only passed on the increases but added to them by expanding their own gross margins, both absolutely and proportionally," the report said.

The FTC said retail bread prices increased by about 1.9 percent during the first six months of 1966, but by early in September had risen 7.5 percent. The one-pound loaf that sold for an average of 20.7 cents in August 1965 cost 22.8 a year later, the report showed.

Between Jan. 1 and Aug. 15 the increase averaged 1.7 cents. The farmer got six-tenths of 1 cent as his share, the baker seven-tenths of 1 cent and the retailer four-tenths of 1 cent, the FTC said.

The commission attributed the higher price for the farm-supplied ingredients to the relatively small 1966 wheat crop and the demand for grain for export. Their total cost per loaf rose from 3.5 cents to 4 cents between January and August, the report showed.

Milwaukee bread-eaters were hit by the sharpest price rise over the year, the cost going from 15.1 to 18.5 cents a loaf, or 22.5 percent.

The average retail price of a half-gallon of milk, the FTC found in its survey of 35 cities, went from 48 cents to 51.7 cents between January and August. Farmers collected about 2 cents of the rise, the commission continued, while processors got the nine-tenths of 1 cent and retailers 1 cent. Cleveland suffered the largest January-August rise, from 35.7 cents to 44.8 cents.

The FTC pointed out that prices paid dairy farmers had been so "severely depressed" over the past 10 years that many of them had left farming or turned to other types of agriculture.

"By 1965, the exodus became so great the total milk production declined," it said, adding that the drop forced up prices for raw milk "which were quickly transmitted to the processors and retailers."

The upward price trend "will not be extended," the FTC predicted. Milk might go up during the winter because of seasonal factors, it said, but "it is likely that some of the recent advances in bread prices will not stick because of the wide differential in some markets between retailer and baker brands."

"For both bread and milk retailers," the FTC went on, "gross margins have become so wide in some markets that effective competition may exert downward pressures.

"There is growing consumer resistance to price increases which may induce retailers to intensify price competition and curtail the promotional competition which has substantially raised retail distribution costs over the past decade."

Lab Staff Chooses Chemical Workers

Van Nuys, Calif.—A four-month organizing campaign at the Bio-Science Laboratories, which serves hospitals, clinics and health departments all over the world, resulted in victory here for an AFL-CIO union. The vote was 135 for the Chemical Workers, 60 for no union in the National Labor Relations Board election.

The Dow Chemical Co. is a major stockholder of the research and analytical laboratory. The bargaining unit includes medical technologists and chemists, clerical workers and maintenance employes. The range in skills is from custodial workers to employes with masters of science and chemistry degrees.

Control of Congress, States:

Liberal, Conservative Battle Dominant Issue in Elections

Democrats in the Rocky Mountain states also would be significant, because on the Republican side that is Goldwater country, and in many areas the contests are quite baldly between right-wing Republicans and liberal Democrats.

The campaign this year has been remarkable for the non-emergence of issues—at least of issues the candidates were willing to talk about.

Inflation, or the rise in living costs that is one of its symptoms, became a favorite theme of Republican contenders as the weeks wore on.

War Issue Dims

The war in Viet Nam, on the other hand, practically disappeared from the campaign after Republican Gov. Mark Hatfield of Oregon, seeking the Senate seat being vacated by Mrs. Maurine Neuberger, was badly burned on what seemed practically a "peace now" program and was directly challenged on the issue by the Democratic nominee, the articulate and progressive Rep. Robert B. Duncan.

An unspoken issue—unspoken, that is, except in Maryland and two or three Deep South states—may have emerged in what is referred to as a "backlash" against the Negro civil rights revolution.

Most Republican candidates, however, preferred to appeal to whatever "backlash" sentiment may exist in the code words that have become familiar — "crime," or "crime in the streets," or "riots and broken windows," or a complaint that civil rights changes are being pushed "too far and too fast."

The "too far and too fast" theme was echoed by Michigan's Republican Gov. George W. Romney, the "safety in the streets" theme by Ronald Reagan, GOP candidate in California against incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown.

Only Wyoming's Republican Gov. Clifford Hansen, running for the Senate against Rep. Teno Roncalio, carried it far enough to tie the Johnson Administration's alleged failure to do enough about "crime" to the brutal but local murder in Kenilworth, Ill., of the teenage daughter of Charles H. Percy, GOP candidate against the veteran incumbent Sen. Paul H. Douglas.

The depth of "backlash" sentiment, and how widespread it might be, in any case was not measurable in advance—and very possibly was overrated, as it was in 1964.

A factor that will count, on the basis of the record, is the size of the vote Nov. 8.

U.S. voter turnout, measured by Japanese or Australian standards, has always been low, and in midterm elections such as this year's is invariably lower than in presidential years.

What is perhaps of greater significance is the fact that voter turnout, relative to the potential eligibles, has been steadily rising in midterm elections for the past quarter of a century. The record high was set in 1962, when 46.5 percent of the voting-age population went to the polls.

The Census Bureau estimates that just under 116 million people will be of voting age and able to meet state residential requirements on Nov. 8, which is not the same as saying that all of them are registered, of course. A continuation of the trend toward constantly rising participation would mean a voter turnout of about 54 million, according to a Congressional Quarterly estimate.

There have been widespread reports of "apathy" during the campaign, but there nearly always are reports of apathy in the midterm period, and any defection of voters in eastern, northern and western sections might well be offset by the heavily increased registration of both Negroes and whites in southern states, where the record of voter turnout has always been lowest.

Past Records

A commonly-accepted doctrine on midterm elections is that Democrats benefit when the voter turnout is large and suffer when the turnout is small. It is based substantially however, on the record of the relatively recent past.

Thus in 1942 there was only a 32.7 percent voter participation in the midterm election and Republicans gained 47 House seats, and in 1946 only 37.6 percent participation and the GOP picked up 56 seats and control of the 80th Congress. In contrast, Democrats argue, voter participation proportions of 41.6 percent to 43.2 percent resulted in substantial Democratic gains, or at least in minimal losses.

The only thing questionable about the theory—and it seems generally sound—is the documentation from 1938, when voter participation jumped high to 44.5 percent, and the Republicans scored a net gain of 80 in House seats.

It was a long time ago and may have resulted from the fact that it merely reflected the practical decimation of Republican officeholders in the Franklin D. Roosevelt second-term election of 1936.

A curious dearth of nationally celebrated names will show on the ballots this year.

In California, Gov. Brown and the TV actor, Ronald Reagan, are running against each other; in Illinois the deservedly trusted veteran Douglas is seeking re-election; in Michigan the ambitious Romney is seeking re-election as governor and G. Mennen Williams, a six-time Democratic governor, is running for the Senate; in New York the twice-elected Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller is trying for a Republican third term, with Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., Liberal, as one of his opponents.

VICE PRES. HUBERT H. HUMPHREY raises the arm of a doughty liberal warrior, Democratic Sen. Paul H. Douglas, during an outdoor political rally in downtown Chicago. Douglas, seeking a fourth term, is challenged by Republican Charles H. Percy.

Political Paths Change In Maryland, Virginia

The two states immediately bordering Washington, D.C., the nation's capital, appear to be moving on opposite political paths this year.

The long-dominant Byrd Democratic organization in Virginia suffered a severe blow when the senior Sen. Harry F. Byrd retired last year (he has since died) even though his son, Harry, Jr., was named to fill the vacancy.

The organization had already suffered other blows, however, when the then governor, J. Lindsay Almond, led the state to repudiation of Byrd's doctrine of "massive resistance" to the Supreme Court's school desegregation decisions and the present governor, Mills E. Godwin, was elected with the clearly observable help of Negro votes.

This year the venerable Rep. Howard W. Smith, long dictator of the House Rules Committee, was beaten in the 8th Congressional District Democratic Primary by a member of the state legislature, George C. Rawlings, Jr., and Sen. A. Willis Robertson was defeated in the statewide Democratic primary by State Sen. William B. Spong.

The younger Byrd himself narrowly escaped defeat by former State Sen. Armistead Boothe, like Spong and Rawlings rated as a liberal-moderate.

Race A Tossup

There appears to have been some drifting of old-line Democrats away from Rawlings to the Republican 8th District candidate, conservative William L. Scott, and the race is considered a tossup.

Both Spong and the younger Byrd are rated likely to win their Senate races—partly because they are challenged both by Republican and Virginia Conservative Party candidates, and opposition votes will be split.

The future of the Virginia Democratic Party appears to lie with candidates of the Spong-Rawlings type as urbanization of the northern suburbs and the Norfolk-Portsmouth area proceeds rapidly and the rise in Negro election participation broadens the voter base.

In Maryland an extraordinary situation arose when a Baltimore contractor, George P. Mahoney, won the Democratic nomination for governor with approximately 30 percent of the vote in a four-man race.

Mahoney's one campaign theme was opposition to either federal or state open housing laws ("Your home is your castle—protect it"). Rep. Carlton R. Sickles, barely squeezed out by Mahoney, declined to endorse him for election. Atty. Gen. Thomas B. Finan, who ran third, gave nominal support to the entire party ticket.

Republicans nominated Baltimore County's top executive officer, Spiro T. Agnew, and a third candidate, Baltimore City Controller Hyman C. Pressman, who filed as an independent, also has support.

The State AFL-CIO, which backed Sickles in the Democratic primary endorsed Agnew for the general election.

Maryland House of Representatives districts were given new lines for this election by a federal district court. Baltimore city and suburban districts are considered safely Democratic, the Western counties safely Republican. Incumbent Republican Rep. Rogers C. B. Morton might be upset on the Eastern Shore by conservative Democrat H. C. Byrd if Mahoney sweeps the district heavily. Populous Montgomery County, a Washington suburban area, is listed in the doubtful class this year.

Phone Installers to Vote On Revised Agreement

New York—The Communications Workers reached agreement with the Western Electric Co. on improved contract terms covering more than 22,000 Bell telephone equipment installers and sent the settlement to a new membership referendum.

An earlier agreement had been rejected in 8,231-7,240 vote. The union said the new pact provides improvement in expense provisions for permanent transfers; a better Saturday holiday clause and improved company contributions toward hospitalization insurance in specified areas.

Ballots that went out this week will be counted Nov. 16 by Ernst & Ernst, accounting firm. A yes vote will put the agreement into effect, a no vote empowers the union to call a strike, members are being told.

Meanwhile the union reported that 81,000 of its Bell System members now are covered by agreements following the 1966 version of the CWA "pattern" settlement with Bell. Contracts covering another 75,000 CWA-represented Bell employes are either in the final bargaining stages or awaiting ratification, and similar benefits for 200,000 others will be sought when their contracts expire in the coming six months, a union spokesman said.

Contracts approved to date feature wage hikes of about 7 per cent, wage reopening provisions after 18 months, retroactivity for the first time in any Bell contracts, better life, health and hospital insurance programs and improved vacation and pension plans.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne called the three-year agreement the best the union has ever negotiated in the communications industry.

Newly effective are contracts covering 18,000 employes in all Ohio Bell Telephone Co. departments; 17,500 plant, traffic and accounting employes of Northwestern Bell; 2,000 at Illinois Bell traffic and Chicago toll offices; 7,700 traffic employes of New Jersey Bell; 6,600 in traffic, plant and accounting departments of Wisconsin Bell; 11,000 in all departments of Chesapeake & Potomac of the District of Columbia; 2,000 production and maintenance workers at Western Electric's Buffalo, N.Y., plant; 3,000 in all Cincinnati & Suburban Bell departments; 13,500 plant, traffic and accounting employes in Pacific Northwest Bell's plant, traffic and accounting departments and in Oregon, Idaho and Washington offices and 500 Western Electric job clerks.

Approaching settlement, the union said, are contracts for 34,800 employes of Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. in California; 17,000 Michigan Bell workers; 7,000 at Indiana Bell and 16,800 Chesapeake & Potomac employes in Virginia, West Virginia and Maryland.

Government Employes Name Contracts Head

Cyrus S. Littenberg has been appointed director of the contracts and negotiations division of the Government Employes. A civilian employe of the Navy for 36 years, Littenberg will work with union officers on 700 AFGE contracts and exclusive recognition agreements, Pres. John F. Griner said.

Kuchel Refuses To Back Reagan

Franklin Lakes, N. J.—Republican Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel (Calif.), assistant GOP Senate leader, said pointblank here that he would not endorse or campaign for his party's nominee for governor, Ronald Reagan.

Our "proud party," he said, "has been punished unmercifully by those who will promote one kind of philosophy to the exclusion of all others."

Speaking here in behalf of the liberal GOP incumbent Sen. Clifford P. Case, Kuchel said that a "realignment" of parties on a liberal-conservative basis would result in GOP losses at all levels of politics. The liberal-conservative alignment was advocated prior to 1964 by then Sen. Barry Goldwater (Ariz.), the party's presidential nominee, to whom Kuchel also denied a campaign endorsement.

Air Line Dispatchers Boost Dues

Las Vegas, Nev.—Air line dispatchers, a highly-skilled segment of the aviation industry, will have to master entire new areas of education and training to prepare for the supersonic era, their union president said here.

Pres. Robert E. Commerce told delegates to the 24th annual convention of the Air Line Dispatchers Association that the rapid change in aviation operation control is continuing. He stressed the importance of union members keeping alert to new developments and job requirements to hold on to their traditional work jurisdiction. While one of the smallest unions, with 767 members, the ALA bargains with 30 major airlines.

Delegates voted to raise dues $3 a quarter for dispatchers—to $36 every three months—and $1.50 a quarter for assistant dispatchers, who pay half the regular dues rate.

The increase will permit paying expenses of negotiating team members, Commerce said, and will help finance additional research.

Under the union's staggered election system, only two offices were up for election this year. Sec.-Treas. James Boyd was re-elected unopposed to a two-year term and Fred Ritter of Ozark Airlines defeated incumbent F. R. Keithley of Pan American for a five-year term as vice president.

Turning Point

THE 89TH CONGRESS marked a turning point in the nation's history. Never before had a two-year legislative session achieved a comparable record of accomplishments in a period of economic growth and prosperity—a period free of the economic crisis atmosphere that marked previous great Congresses.

The record of the 89th Congress has been widely acclaimed and historians are drawing the comparison with the two other "vintage" Congresses of the 20th Century—the 63rd Congress of Woodrow Wilson's first term and the 73rd Congress of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

In comparison with these, the record of the 89th takes on new meaning as part of the evolution of progressive and liberal public policies to meet the changing needs of the country.

The 63rd Congress met as the nation hit the low point of a two-year recession and with the echoes of exposure of corporate and business scandals, of the trusts, ringing in its ears. Pres. Wilson's "New Freedom" program, designed to cure some of the evils and put the nation on a solid course of economic growth and stability, won resounding approval.

The Democratic Party enjoyed a comfortable margin in the Senate and a 163-vote margin in the House in those two years that produced the Clayton Anti-Trust Act, the Federal Reserve System and many other legislative milestones.

Twenty years later the 73rd Congress convened in the depths of the Great Depression and enacted the monumental programs of Pres. Roosevelt's "New Deal."

Reacting to the despair of the greatest economic tragedy in American history, the Congress responded to FDR's 100 days program to check the nation's fear and drift and went on to lay the groundwork for programs designed to prevent ever again a depression of the magnitude of the Thirties.

In that Congress the Democratic Party held a 23-vote margin in the Senate and a 196-vote margin in the House.

THIRTY-THREE YEARS later the 89th Congress went into session to deal with Pres. Johnson's "Great Society" program. The economic atmosphere was remarkably different. At the beginning of 1965 the country was in the fourth year of continuous economic growth. More Americans had a higher living standard than ever before in history. There was no crisis that demanded the plug-the-dike actions of the New Deal Congress.

The Democratic Party fell short of the huge majorities of the earlier "vintage" Congresses with a 155-vote margin in the House, although it held a 34-vote edge in the Senate. Given the nature of the Republican-Southern Democratic conservative coalition, the margin needed to pass "Great Society" legislation was much narrower—a circumstance that did not weigh so heavily in the earlier Congresses.

The record of the 89th with its breakthroughs in education, medical care, housing, conservation and adoption of a host of other programs is thus unique. It responded to Pres. Johnson's call that in a period free of economic crisis or desperation the country move forward to insure a better, fuller life to all. In a period when 80 percent of Americans were more prosperous than ever before, the 89th Congress dealt with the problems of the 20 percent who lived in poverty and deprivation.

The 89th Congress thus takes its place as the most outstanding of this century—a productive, pioneering Congress responding to the need for fulfillment of the American dream.

'Wow!'

Biemiller Summary:

Outstanding Legislative Record Posted by 89th Congress

The following is excerpted from an interview with AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller on the federation's public affairs program, Labor News Conference, to be heard on the Mutual radio network.

THE OVERALL RECORD of this Congress is so outstanding that it can properly be called the most outstanding Congress in our history. I think it is more important than the 100 days of Roosevelt.

The minimum wage law passed by this Congress is unquestionably the most important and best minimum wage law that has ever been passed. We still hope to improve on this in later Congresses, but getting the minimum wage up to $1.60 and adding 8 million new workers to its coverage was an important forward step.

The Demonstration Cities Act, which will, for the first time, coordinate various kinds of programs in our cities, we think is going to be a real landmark piece of legislation.

The education bills that passed this Congress are outstanding. We made a breakthrough, first of all, in getting federal aid for elementary and secondary education. On top of that, we now have legislation that is promoting college education and will make it easier for children of poor parents to go to college. The continuation of federal loans to college students is a very important thing. I want also to say that the AFL-CIO is particularly proud that this Congress passed Sen. Ralph Yarborough's (D-Tex.) Cold War GI Bill of Rights. This applies the concept of the earlier GI Bill of Rights to those who have been in the service during the last 10 years or so. This bill, in some ways, does more for children of poor parents than any other bill I know of.

We think that progress was made in the civil rights field, in spite of the fact that we lost the open housing provision in the 1966 bill.

The poverty program has been renewed.

Good programs have been started in the fields of water pollution and air pollution.

The Indiana Dunes law is a good example of the kind of legislation we think was badly needed to establish that fine park near the busy area of Chicago and Gary. Incidentally, that is only one of half a dozen such bills that have passed this Congress. Over 1 million acres of our ground have been laid aside for recreational purposes.

The mine safety law was one that our unions have been fighting for for a long time. Metallic mines now have the same kind of safety provisions that coal mines have had in the past.

Then there was the bill to create training programs in the auxiliary health professions that we have been needing for a long time. There was a very important bill passed to establish money for planning health programs in our larger areas.

The Dept. of Transportation was established by this Congress. The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development also is a product of this Congress.

The transit legislation was very important.

Last but not least, of course, is the fact that medicare passed in the first session of this Congress, and that was the greatest breakthrough in the Social Security field that we have had since 1935.

Then we defeated a bill that we consider, in some ways, the most important accomplishment of this session. We killed the "Dirksen Amendment," which would have undone the "one-man, one-vote" ruling of the Supreme Court.

WE ARE very, very disappointed that we did not get a good unemployment compensation bill, that we did not pass the situs picketing bill and that we did not repeal Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act. But we recognize, particularly on the question of the repeal of 14(b), that we ran into a problem we are going to have to do something about in the next Congress. That was the filibuster led by Sen. Everett M. Dirksen (R-Ill.). I think it is also worth noting that not only did Sen. Dirksen kill off 14(b) repeal with a filibuster, but he also killed off the fair housing section and other important provisions of the civil rights bill, by exactly the same tactic.

I am sure that there will be a fight mounted in the opening days of the 90th Congress to change the rules of the Senate and make it possible to cut off debate by a smaller number than the two-thirds margin now required.

I think it is worth noting that Pres. Johnson has always regarded himself as a protege of Pres. Roosevelt, and I think that just as Pres. Roosevelt showed great legislative leadership during the 100 days, Pres. Johnson showed the same kind of legislative leadership during the 89th Congress. And I think that one reason this Congress was so successful was the very excellent leadership it got from the White House.

Morgan Says:

World's Ills and Cures Found In New York, Not in Shangri-La

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

NEW YORK—New York City, says Ambassador Jamil M. Baroody of Saudi Arabia, is a "bedlam. . . . The physical atmosphere of this town is becoming unendurable" with its violence, sex, traffic jams, crowds, noise, air pollution, water shortages, lack of trees, discrimination, abundance of crime and other dangers.

Morgan

Tensions created in such a setting, the Arab diplomat said, are not conducive to the calm, serene consideration of world issues. New York, he added, may have jinxed the United Nations. He told the General Assembly's budgetary committee it should consider moving the UN to Europe or the Middle East rather than approve a study project for expansion of its headquarters in New York.

The ambassador, who has resided here more than 25 years, is dead right on one point. The nation's largest city has become no place to live in and almost impossible to visit. But his excellency is dead wrong when he suggests the UN should quit this human maelstrom and seek its domicile in some neutral country Shangri-La so delegates can reflect with more detachment on world affairs.

New York is where the action is, and that's where the international forum of the UN should be. The city is a microcosm—if a megalopolis of 8 million can be a microcosm—of almost every crisis currently plaguing our planet.

There is slag and sludge in New York's human melting pot which should be studied first-hand. Can nations honestly expect any disarmament plan to work if rival nationalities, rival gangs in a single city remain at war? Would the ambassador from Saudi Arabia seriously suggest that Arab-Israeli differences could be diminished by removing the UN to Jerusalem or Cairo or Istanbul?

The population of the world is migrating to urban living—if living is the word—and New York is the laboratory where the staggering problems created by this transition are being identified and solutions to them tested. The world is not a peaceful place and this is no time for UN ambassadors to seek an ivory tower from which to ponder the heaving horizons of international politics.

Furthermore, if the delegates can take time to look, they might detect in the middle of the throbbing bedlam of New York City the strengthening heartbeat of a new dynamism in the American society which, if properly channeled, is going to help to power vast changes in the struggling, bickering—and multiplying—family of nations.

The slums of Harlem are an insupportable shame. The acid of prejudice, racial, religious or whatever kind, continues to eat into the fabric of the open society. In the richest country on earth, poverty still flourishes in overcrowded cities, on the scratchy soil of Appalachia and elsewhere.

BUT SOMEHOW an exciting discovery has been made. It is that all these things—poverty, prejudice, ignorance, disease, over-population, human hostilities and desperation—are interrelated. An intelligent attack on one has an effect on the others. It is this discovery which has directed the thrust of the most important load of social legislation steered through Congress since Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal.

It is barely beginning to gather momentum. Individual parts are grinding their gears with wasteful ineffectiveness. But viewed in the large, these efforts bear much hope. Congress completed action on the Johnson Administration's high priority "demonstration cities" bill, which blueprints a coordinated assault on the very human and material problems of cities which Ambassador Baroody rightly said were making New York so unliveable.

The Planned Parenthood-World Population conference bestowed on Pres. Johnson the Margaret Sanger Award for world leadership in formulating policy to deal positively with the international population explosion.

A mere decade ago "birth control" was such a poisonous term in politics that Pres. Eisenhower shunned any federal action on the problem. He later reversed himself and became a valuable supporter of education and clinical help in this controversial field. Pres. Kennedy first approached the issue at arm's length but then prepared the ground which Lyndon Johnson has stood on so courageously that almost overnight active assistance in family planning has become a part of official U.S. policy.

In his eloquent acceptance of the award for the President, Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz recalled the observance of the late A. Powell Davies, a Unitarian clergyman, that the world has become "too small for anything but brotherhood and too dangerous for anything but truth."

The truth is that coordinated attacks on mankind's interrelated ills can correct the meaninglessness of life for millions. The U.S. is beginning belated experiments by this rule. The process is as complicated as life itself but it holds promise. And the promise of the UN itself will be brighter if it will stick around to encourage the process with constructive criticism and help propagate its positive results.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

NEGRO VOTERS can play a major role in the Nov. 8 elections, clear across the country, although in no state, southern or northern, can they win a statewide contest by Negro votes alone.

Mayor Robert King High of Miami, for example, has become the target of a renewed campaign of Republicans and conservative Democrats in his race for governor. He is a liberal, a modern-minded political figure, and the best thing that has happened in the state's Democratic Party since Leroy Collins was elected governor in far more tranquil times.

High knocked incumbent Gov. Hayden Burns out of office in the Democratic primary last May, and the state's nearly 300,000 registered Negro voters helped him do it. The conservatives are zeroing in on him now, however, with the Republican nominee, Claude R. Kirks, Jr., talking extensively about Miami's "high crime rate," a phrase with a well-understood meaning in the context of this year's campaigns.

High needs all the help he can get, from moderate to liberal white voters as well as Negroes who have finally managed to lift the registration total of their voting-age citizens to nearly 61 percent.

In Maryland as well, Negro voters in Baltimore can exercise a clear balance of power in the triangular race for the governorship between Democrat George P. Mahoney, Republican Spiro T. Agnew and Independent Hyman C. Pressman.

Scores of thousands of Democrats are unable to tolerate Mahoney, with his open appeal to racism, and will vote for Agnew, who has been endorsed by the state AFL-CIO just as High has been endorsed by the Florida AFL-CIO. Any splitoff involving the traditionally liberal white Maryland Democrats and Negro voters who are ordinarily equally Democratic might be just enough, however, to put Mahoney in the statehouse.

THE MAVERICK MAYOR of Los Angeles, Samuel Yorty, polled a shockingly large vote against incumbent Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown in the Democratic primary. Los Angeles contains the tortured Watts ghetto. If Negroes and other minority groups including Mexican-Americans and Spanish-Americans do not help Brown carry Los Angeles County substantially, Ronald Reagan, the Goldwaterite Republican, may be the new man in Sacramento.

Negroes in the Chicago area have been engaged in running disputes with Chicago's Mayor Richard J. Daley, but the veteran liberal Democratic Sen. Paul H. Douglas clearly needs a heavy Cook County majority if he is to win over the Republican nominee, Charles H. Percy.

There are congressional districts by the dozen in which Negro voters are vital to the re-election of liberals. State legislative seats are at stake as well as congressional elections, and the state legislatures, it might be remembered, still have the power to set the benefit levels, duration and qualification rules for unemployment compensation; a great deal to do with aid to city school systems; the nature of a state's participation in medical care programs.

The elections this year are important to all our people, and not least to Negro voters.

THERE IS a final fillip. In Dallas County, Ala., where Selma is the county seat and where federal court injunctions, the presence of the Justice Dept. and the imposing presence of federal troops were required to guarantee the safety of perfectly peaceful demonstrators for the march to Montgomery, Sheriff James G. Clark is trying to get returned to office through a write-in vote.

Clark was beaten for Democratic renomination by a moderate, former Selma Public Safety Dir. Wilson Baker. There aren't as many registered Negro voters in Dallas County as white voters, but the primary proved that Negroes and even moderately liberal white citizens could win an election together.

It would be a regrettable incident if Clark should reverse this result by the write-in route.

Legal Safeguards Urged:

'Sanctioned' Strikebreaking Held Barrier to Farm Unions

STRIKEBREAKING is a major roadblock to organizing California farm workers, Cesar Chavez, director of the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, charged during a network radio interview.

Chavez said that legal safeguards for the right of farm workers to form unions are vital to the continued success of their drive to win fair wages and decent working conditions.

California Gov. Edmund G. ("Pat") Brown (D) has pledged to push next year for a "little Wagner Act" which would end "strikebreaking, which is now, in effect, being sanctioned by the state" because laws already on the books exclude farm workers, Chavez said. His statements came during the public affairs program, Labor News Conference over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Chavez praised Brown's quick response to the farm workers' plea for help in setting aside a "rigged election" at the DiGiorgio Corp. He said the governor "really set up the new representation election without any law, without any precedent in the whole history of the country."

IN A SENSE, Brown "gave birth to the union . . . gave us the life that we needed at that precise moment," Chavez declared.

The farm workers' leader reported that determination to form unions runs high among both resident and migratory farm workers. He noted that some workers have "come from as far away as 2,500 miles to vote in [union representation] elections."

Reporters questioning Chavez on the weekly AFL-CIO-produced program were Sam Sharkey of the Newhouse Newspapers and John Herling, editor of John Herling's Labor Letter.

Denver Hotel Signs Contract After Boycott

Denver, Colo.—Some 800 members of Hotel & Restaurant Employes Local 14 have ratified a new contract that removed a picket line which four distinguished speakers had refused to cross so as to address a convention at the Denver-Hilton Hotel.

The settlement raised cooks and bartenders from $15.20 to $16.60 a day; other non-tipped employes, who have been getting $9 to $12, by $1.35 a day, and gave hikes of 85 cents to tipped employes—waitresses who have been paid $8.10 a day and bellboys getting $4.65.

Hot Meal Provided

The contract, which also covers employes of the Cosmopolitan, Shirley-Savoy and Oxford Hotels and the Union Station Restaurant, improves the seniority clause in the old agreement, establishes a nondiscrimination policy in hiring, and assures each employe a hot meal, plus breakfast for night workers.

The picket line at the Denver-Hilton, where about half the membership covered by the settlement is employed, was honored by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner, Executive Dir. Whitney M. Young of the National Urban League, Gov. John Love of Colorado and Mayor Tom Currigan of Denver during the convention of the National Rehabilitation Association.

Gardner learned of the picket line after flying into Denver and registered at another hotel, declaring the strike was "legitimate." Young cancelled his scheduled appearance, explaining that "I am honoring the picket line."

Love, a Republican, sent word he would not open the convention as scheduled because of the picket line. Currigan, a Democrat, wrote convention authorities that "it has always been a strong personal conviction of mine never to cross a picket line."

FROM THIS BUILDING on the left bank of the Seine River in Paris, the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization—which marks its 20th anniversary on Nov. 4—carries on its work of promoting cooperation among nations in the areas of education, science and culture. The agency is embarking on its third decade of furthering universal respect for the rule of law and for the human rights and fundamental freedom affirmed in the UN charter.

Equal Time Ordered To Rebut 'Weep' Film

An employer who made coercive "captive audience" speeches to his employes and showed them the slanted anti-union movie "And Women Must Weep" has been directed to give the Communications Workers equal opportunity to reply—to both the movie and the speech—on company time and property.

The order, subject to National Labor Relations Board review, was directed by Trial Examiner Arthur M. Goldberg to the Forest Industries Co. of Forest, Miss., a subsidiary of the giant Sunbeam Corp., Chicago.

The CWA filed charges last January that management launched a union-smashing drive in 1965 at the plant, which employes 800 persons to make Sunbeam clocks and food mixers in a plant built by Scott county on 40 acres of county-owned land.

The campaign started early that year when a group of its employes held a meeting to discuss efforts to get a wage increase, witnesses testified. Within a day or two, management instructed supervisors to tell employes the company did not want a union in the plant, though no union had been involved up to that time.

Next the firm held employe meetings at which top management delivered a "coercive anti-union speech," and herded the workers into showings of the discredited "Weep" movie depicting union members as thugs and terrorists.

Employer showings of the film have since 1961 brought repeated NLRB rulings that it exceeds the permissible limits of free speech.

The movie purports to document a 1957 strike of the Machinists at the Potter-Brumfield Co. plant in Princeton, Ind. The IAM describes it as a fictional account by professional actors using a contrived script showing a brutal local union president forcing a strike on terrorized members and then committing violence in the town.

The facts, the IAM said, are that the union president was a "warm, grandmotherly woman" who urged the 400 workers not to walk out on her account but only if provoked by company actions. Only nine of the members voted against the strike.

Rebuttal Film

In a rebuttal documentary film—"Anatomy of a Lie"—the IAM revealed how management imported strikebreakers.

Besides showing the phony movie, the examiner said, Forest Industries also questioned employes unlawfully about their organizing activities for the CWA, which started an organizing campaign later in 1965; recruited workers to spy on the union, solicited employes to withdraw, threatened to fire union sympathizers, and discriminated against workers who wore union buttons to work.

He ordered the company to halt these unfair practices and to give the union at a mutually agreeable time, within three months of the decision, an equal chance to address the assembled employes on company time and premises and on a second occasion to answer the representations of the "Weep" movie.

In State Federation Case:

AFL-CIO Contests Hatch Act Penalties

The AFL-CIO's associate general counsel has filed a Hatch Act test case challenging the right of the U.S. Civil Service Commission to dock a postal worker 30 days' pay for mailing out newsletters reporting activities of far-right extremists in the 1964 Goldwater-Johnson campaign period.

The commission ruled 3-0 last Aug. 9 that Robert E. Hobart of Concord, N. H., member of the Postal Clerks and part-time secretary-treasurer of the New Hampshire AFL-CIO, "took an active part in a political campaign in violation" of the Hatch Act and civil service rules. Chairman John W. Macy, Jr., and Commissioners L. J. Andolsek and Robert E. Hampton upheld a CSC hearing examiner's finding and ordered that Hobart be suspended for 30 days without pay.

Asks Pay Refund

Hobart denied the charges, and a petition filed in the U.S. Court of Claims by Thomas E. Harris of the federation's legal department asked that court to award Hobart a refund of $674.62.

At issue in the case is whether Hobart engaged in partisan political activity when, at the direction of state AFL-CIO officers, he mailed copies of Group Research Report to a mailing list of New Hampshire citizens.

Hobart's counsel said that "the basic concern of the publication is extremism, as distinguished from" normal political activity and that it does not support or oppose either the Democratic or Republican Party.

Hobart mailed only one issue of Group Research Report—for July 15, 1964. He and other officers testified that it was "pure chance" that the issue was the only one mailed. About half of its contents dealt with right-wing activity at the Republican convention, which had just been held.

Associated with Harris in the case are J. Albert Woll, AFL-CIO general counsel, and two associates, Robert C. Mayer and Laurence Gold. They argued that Hobart's suspension violated his free speech rights and also was "illegal and void" for the following reasons:

- The finding that Hobart "took an active part in a political campaign" in violation of the Hatch Act and a Civil Service rule "was not supported by substantial evidence" and was arbitrary and capricious.
- Hobart's activities did not violate the Hatch Act or CSC regulations and in fact were "affirmatively sanctioned" by a section of the Hatch law.
- If the act or the regulations are interpreted as prohibiting the activities complained of, they violate the 1st and 5th amendments to the U.S. constitution and are unconstitutional.

The brief contended that the general counsel for the Civil Service Commission both files the charge and later makes an "initial decision" and that the commingling of his roles as both prosecutor and judge deprives Hatch Act respondents of a "valuable protection essential to fair procedure."

It argued also that a 1940 Hatch Act amendment states that nothing in a specified section of the act shall be construed to prohibit political activity "in connection with any question which is not specifically identified with any national or state political party."

Union Carbide Lockout Ruled Illegal Coercion

Union Carbide Corp. has been ruled guilty of forcing a lockout that triggered a strike of 6,100 union workers at nine company locations.

Trial Examiner George J. Bott heard testimony on charges by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers that Carbide tried to force 1,200 workers at the Alloy, W. Va., plant to accept unwanted admendments to the pension-insurance plan that was not open for bargaining until 1967, in exchange for the economic gains they were seeking. He found the firm guilty of illegal discrimination, coercion and refusal to bargain in locking out its employes last July 1 to compel them to accept the company "package."

Management's whole course of conduct, Bott concluded, was "equivalent to insistence upon union acceptance of an altered pension-insurance plan as a condition of settlement." He said the company "insisted to the point of impasse . . . on obtaining a settlement of this nonmandatory issue, and locked out its employes to secure that end."

He recommended that the NLRB order Carbide to resume operations at the Alloy works; to offer immediate and full reinstatement with backpay to the locked-out workers, and to bargain with OCAW Local 3-89 in a lawful manner.

The strike spread to eight other plants after the billion-dollar corporation resisted all contract settlement efforts by the Steelworkers, the Chemical Workers and the OCAW, union spokesmen said.

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. has been coordinating the bargaining and strike efforts of the Carbide unions. The unity effort will continue to aim at getting management to engage in "real bargaining," the IUD said.

Other strikers include 1,800 members of the Steelworkers at Kokomo, Ind., 800 at Ashtabula, O., and 100 at Portland, Ore.; 200 members of the Chemical Workers at Sistersville, W. Va.; and OCAW locals representing 1,150 strikers at Marietta, O., 450 at Speedway City, Ind., 425 at Whiting, Ind., and 100 at Hammond, Ind.

Local 749 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers at Fostoria, O., has a contract expiring Oct. 28.

The NLRB finding at Alloy will blunt the company's attempt to destroy the union coalition by its "take it or leave it" bargaining policy, OCAW Vice Pres. E. D. Swisher predicted.

Claude Ramsey Heads Rights Advisory Panel

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany has announced the appointment of Pres. Claude Ramsay of the Mississippi AFL-CIO as chairman of the AFL-CIO Southern Advisory Committee on Civil Rights.

Roofers Pledge Support To U.S. Viet Nam Effort

San Francisco—The 17th triennial convention of the Roofers pledged full support to the nation's global commitments and paid tribute to American troops in Viet Nam.

A special resolution hailed "the position taken and the efforts put forth by our country in Viet Nam and other areas of the world where the inhabitants are being threatened with political and economic slavery."

The resolution was introduced by Robert Hall of Louisville, who told the convention that "we are keenly aware of our responsibilities to our fighting men in Viet Nam and other places in the world" and praised the American stand "to keep free those who want to be a part of the free world."

The convention, largest in the union's history, re-elected Pres. Charles D. Aquadro, Sec.-Treas. John A. McConaty and nine of 10 vice presidents without opposition. Tenth Vice Pres. James A. Price won re-election over John Critchey of Local 4, Newark, N.J., in the convention's only election contest.

Several resolutions dealing with internal union operations were referred to the executive board. One proposal urged the board to implement safety measures by recommending to suppliers and manufacturers that "when feasible and permissible" they follow certain material specifications.

Others proposed establishment of a department of research and industry and efforts to set up a pension plan for local officers.

The officers reported that membership is continuing to rise despite some job losses due to automation.

The delegates voted salary increases for the officers and organizers and chose Pittsburgh as the site of the union's 50th anniversary convention in 1969.

They also voted full support of the three-year-old Kingsport, Tenn., Press strike and called on all locals to request that Boards of Education buy no educational materials published by the struck firm. Nearly 1,000 members of five unions have been on strike against Kingsport Press for a fair contract. The big book-publishing plant is operating with strikebreakers.

Executive Sec.-Treas. Thomas L. Pitts of the California AFL-CIO told the delegates that success for Gov. Edmund G. Brown against the challenge of Actor Ronald Reagan in the Nov. 8 election is vital to the continuation of a whole series of progressive measures.

CREDIT UNION AUDIT

A complete verification of accounts of all members of the AFL-CIO Employees Federal Credit Union was made as of Sept. 30, 1966. Members who do not receive statements by Oct. 31, are asked to notify the Chairman, Supervisory Committee, Room 711, 815 Sixteenth St., N. W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

'Economic Landscape' Changing:

New Monopoly Curbs Urged As Merger Trend Speeds Up

Vigorous enforcement of existing anti-monopoly laws and a wide range of new steps to deal with problems rising from the "massive" merger movement in industry are proposed by Irving Beller, AFL-CIO Dept. of Research economist, in an article in the current issue of the American Federationist.

Mergers, coupled with rapid internal growth, are producing a "fundamental change in the American economic landscape," Beller writes. And the change is taking place not only on the national scene as a whole, but in specific regions and industries as well.

If the present pace of mergers continues, he warns, "America will be faced with a condition of super-concentration within little more than a decade. By 1977, the 100 largest manufacturing corporations will control more than two-thirds of the nation's net manufacturing assets."

While not all mergers are against the public interest, Beller observes, "mountains of testimony" before congressional committees, administrative agencies and the courts indicate that this "enormous power of big business has frequently been abused," he notes.

Concern over its concentration in private hands led to enactment of the Sherman Anti-Trust Act in 1890, the Clayton Act of 1914 and the Celler-Kefauver Act of 1950, he pointed out.

Problem Persists

"Some of the cruder abuses, such as agreements to fix prices or divide markets, were either curtailed or driven underground," he observes. "But the basic problem was still with us."

Most commonly, he continues, executives in industries dominated by a few powerful firms are able to "get around" the law by "administering" prices through a system of price leadership under which one of the larger producers in an industry sets a figure and everybody else follows suit.

Despite occasional court decisions, mergers have "clearly enhanced" corporate power to set prices, "bulldoze" competition by selling at a loss in one area and recouping in another, interfere in the operations of suppliers and "influence other aspects of American life," Beller points out.

"In the process," he adds, "thousands of jobs have been merged out of existence as well—often with little or no provision for cushioning the impact upon those who have been displaced."

His suggestions for action to meet the difficulties created by the accelerating merger trend include:

- Requirement of advance notice to the government by the parties to proposed mergers. "This would avoid unnecessary litigation and provide an opportunity for making arrangements which would preserve healthy competitive conditions."
- Authority to government anti-trust agencies to temporarily delay, subject to court appeal, mergers they feel may violate the law.
- A requirement that corporations disclose sales, expenses and profits for each field of operation as well as in total—to tell "not only how much money they made but where they made it."

"Actually, the Securities & Exchange Commission is now in the process of formulating requirements for information by division and in some cases by product. This should be completed and put into effect without unnecessary delay."

- Lifting of "the cloak of secrecy" surrounding efforts to take over firms through stock purchases. "Legal loopholes make it possible for a corporation or a group of individuals to purchase controlling blocks of shares of other firms without the latter's management or stockholders knowing about it."
- An increase in capital gains tax rates to "dampen some of the present ardor for mergers" that have little justification in terms of efficiency. . . . This would encourage stepped-up dividend payments and "compel corporations, to a greater extent than otherwise, to meet the tests of the money markets for additional funds for mergers and other purposes."

Beller concedes that some mergers have "genuine social value," such as the rescue of a failing firm from extinction, and that they may result in "real gains" in efficiency that can be translated under some circumstances into lower prices, higher wages and improved working conditions.

No Assurance

"However increased size via mergers or internal growth does not invariably result in genuine increases in the efficiency of production or distribution," he declares.

"Numerous studies have shown that medium-sized plants are often at least as efficient and in some cases more efficient than the largest establishments in an industry. They have also shown that the operation of many plants by a single company doesn't necessarily result in significant cost reductions."

This is particularly true, Beller notes, of the "giant conglomerates" that result from mergers of companies making diversified rather than related products. The possibilities for "genuine savings" by highly-diversified conglomerates, he maintains, are "minimal."

"In fact," he adds, "the effort to coordinate a far-flung industrial empire embracing parking lots, undertaking establishments and countless other unrelated activities may even lead to inefficiency and to added costs."

The incentive to merge, he says, "is often purely financial" and "frequently has little or nothing to do with the introduction of new or improved products or to more efficient methods of production."

The most important factor, he suggests is the accumulation of "hoards of cash" which corporations prefer to use to buy other companies rather than pay higher dividends, purchase securities with fixed returns or build new plants or equipment.

Shortcut to Profits

"The merger route provides a shortcut to more rapid growth and higher profits," Beller continues, "manpower, production facilities and a market for the goods produced by such resources can be acquired overnight in one fell swoop . . . a merger is a way to enter a new market without increasing the number of competitors. . . . A soaring stock market offers another inducement."

Tax angles also are a frequent factor, he says, citing the advantages of paying at the lower capital gains rate rather than the normal income tax rate.

"The fact that relatively large-scale operations can yield genuine social benefits does not mean that they automatically will," Beller says.

"Presumably, competition would compel firms to produce better products at lower prices. But in industries dominated by a handful of large firms, competition is weak and almost non-existent. Instead of being regulated by the marketplace, the dominant firms in such industries regulate the marketplace."

In calling for more vigorous enforcement of anti-trust laws already on the statute books, Beller suggests that "increasing attention" be given to conglomerate mergers.

Judgments, he says, cannot rest solely on shares of the market they control, adding that "enforcement agencies must be more vigilant in rooting out anti-competitive practices in such situations."

He also suggests:

- Stronger deterrents to anti-trust violations. "Jail sentences where justified are obviously more effective than fines."
- Govenment procurement policies that "support rather than undermine government anti-trust policies."
- Special financial aid to encourage new competition in industries dominated by a few firms but which are difficult to enter because of large investment requirements or other barriers.

"Determined action along the lines suggested thus far," Beller says "can do much in the longer run to deal with the kind of pricing power which has imposed a heavy burden during the past year upon families with limited incomes and inhibited the government from taking more vigorous steps towards full employment. . . ."

Strong Action Sought

"Such action could take the form of direct congressional investigations of the price-profit-investment policies of dominant firms in important industries. Or it could result in the establishment of a special board which could hold hearings and publish findings and recommendations concerning intended price increases by dominant firms in key industries." However, he concludes:

"No combination of measures can ever be fully effective without a much greater appreciation of the dimensions of corporate power in the American economy today, the freedom with which that power is currently exercised and the danger of allowing it to continue to reside in the hands of the officials of a few private corporations.

"Hopefully, such appreciation will ultimately lead to a new and greater respect for the positive role which a democratically-elected government can and must play in the creation of a better life for all Americans."

Florida Labor Supports High For Governor

Daytona Beach, Fla.—Delegates to the 10th annual convention of the Florida AFL-CIO voted a unanimous endorsement to the Democratic gubernatorial candidate, Miami Mayor Robert King High.

High, who is battling a conservative Republican, was given an ovation when he addressed the convention and the session was recessed after his speech so he could mingle informally with the delegates.

At the state level, the 400 delegates reiterated their support for a state minimum wage law — now lacking—and for improved unemployment and workmen's compensation.

It was an "off-year" for elections for offices in the state federation, but one post was filled. Noah Richards was chosen vice president from the new 10th Congressional District, encompassing the Fort Lauderdale area.

Medicare...Schools...Wages...Cities...

By David L. Perlman

Books, not pages, would be needed to tell the full story of the 89th Congress, its massive accomplishments and its areas of inaction.

On these pages, therefore, are mere highlights of the 89th's record on issues of importance to union members.

Health and Security

MEDICARE: Thanks to the 89th Congress, millions of elderly Americans no longer live in fear that a single costly illness will wipe out a lifetime's savings and burden their children with debts.

Medicare is not "socialized medicine," to use the hackneyed scare phrase of the American Medical Association. Neither is it public charity. Medicare is an earned right, financed along with the basic social security system through a payroll tax paid equally by workers and employers. And it is as unlikely to be repealed by future congresses as social security itself.

The three-layer social security medicare package was passed by the House, 313-115, and by the Senate, 68-21. It included a social insurance program of hospital and nursing home care for everyone over 65, a low-cost voluntary insurance plan to cover additional medical expenses, and a 7 percent increase in social security cash benefits.

Its passage in July of 1965 was a sweet victory for the labor movement and its senior citizens allies—and for the voters who in 1964 elected candidates pledged to support medicare legislation.

Pres. Johnson has already served notice that he will ask Congress next year to extend medicare to more than 1 million persons under 65 who are receiving social security disability benefits, coupled with an average 10 percent raise in all social security cash benefits.

MEDICAL TRAINING: Both sessions voted federal funds to help overcome the grave shortage of doctors, dentists, nurses and other professionals and technicians in the health fields. The programs include both grants to training schools to improve their facilities and scholarships and loans for needy students in the health professions. Other major legislation set up regional medical centers for research and treatment of "killer" diseases, provided funds to staff community centers to treat the mentally ill and stepped up aid to state health programs.

Education

ELEMENTARY & HIGH SCHOOLS: For 30 years, Congress had backed away from the obvious need for federal aid to education. Each time action appeared near, some controversy would loom—the problem of aid without federal controls, the battle over school integration, the sharp differences over assistance to children attending church-operated schools.

The breakthrough came just three months after the 89th Congress convened. The controversies were not insoluble. A carefully-drafted bill was put together, and endorsed by the leading groups on both sides of the church-state debate. Administration supporters held the line against any amendment. The House passed the bill, 263-153, and the Senate concurred, 73-18.

In that historic legislation, Congress authorized more than $1 billion in federal grants to enrich the education of children from low-income families—through programs such as reduction of class sizes, remedial reading instruction and summer classes. Additional funds were earmarked for textbooks and library books, and for community educational centers—all open to children from private as well as public schools.

The first big step having been taken, the second session voted a major expansion of the program, going beyond the President's budget to pass a two-year $6.1 billion authorization. Suddenly everyone was for aid to schools, even Republicans who had fought a federal program for years.

COLLEGE AID: The breakthrough on federal aid to colleges came in 1963, during the 88th Congress, when federal grants and loans were approved to help build college classrooms, laboratories and libraries. But both sessions of the 89th Congress vastly expanded this program.

The first session doubled the level of construction aid, provided for the first time a system of federal scholarships of $200 to $1,000, based on need. It also set up a new government-subsidized loan program to provide interest-free loans to youngsters from low and modest-income families, and low-interest, insured loans for those in higher income brackets.

The second session bill authorizes nearly $4 billion over three years to expand construction grants and loans for colleges, junior colleges and graduate schools. It also carries new money for loans to students.

TEACHER CORPS: This proposal, close to the heart of an ex-teacher named Lyndon Johnson, had rough going in Congress. The goal was to train teams of experienced and novice teachers and send them to school districts where the teacher shortage and the educational problems were the greatest. By the closest of votes, Congress appropriated barely enough money to get the program started on a small scale and its future remained uncertain.

COLD WAR GI BILL: The AFL-CIO was at first almost alone in supporting legislation proposed by Sen. Ralph W. Yarborough (D-Tex.) to give present-day veterans education and housing benefits comparable to those given veterans of World War II and Korea.

This year Congress enacted a permanent GI bill, with eligibility retroactive to 1955. All who serve in the armed forces, in peace as in war, will be entitled to living allowances of $100 a month for full-time students, with up to $50 additional for dependents.

LIBRARY AID: A four-year extension of the library aid program goes beyond the Administration's budget request and includes programs for interlibrary cooperation and services for state institutions and the handicapped.

Labor

WAGE-HOUR: The biggest package of improvements in the 30-year history of the Fair Labor Standards Act ranks as a major accomplishment of the second session of Congress.

Coverage was extended to more than 8 million additional workers, including for the first time a large group of farm workers.

The minimum wage advances in steps to $1.60 an hour, with a $1.30 cutoff for farm workers.

Starting Feb. 1, the 29.5 million persons already covered by the Fair Labor Standards Act will be guaranteed a $1.40 an hour minimum. Their minimum will go up to $1.60 a year later.

Newly-covered workers will begin at $1 and advance 15 cents on Feb. 1 of each year until they catch up to the $1.60 level.

The first-year impact alone will add $1 billion to the purchasing power of America's lowest-paid workers. The second-year impact is estimated at an additional $2 billion. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's prediction is that the legislation will prove to be "the most potent single weapon in the war on poverty."

Opponents sought to cut back the coverage and delay the effective date of the $1.60 rate. On the key votes, the Senate approved the final version of the bill, 55-38, and the House rejected a Republican attempt to send the bill back to conference committee to "stretch out" the minimum wage hike, 183-163.

14(b) REPEAL: Failure to repeal the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act was a galling disappointment of the 89th Congress.

It was galling because a majority of both the House and Senate clearly supported repeal.

The House demonstrated its support last year when it voted 221-203 to close the loophole in national labor law which allows states to ban the union shop. Voting for repeal of 14(b) were 200 Democrats and 21 Republicans; opposed were 117 Republicans and 86 Democrats.

The Senate never had a chance to vote on the merits of the bill. Twice, at the close of the first session and early in the second session, Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen led a filibuster which kept the Senate from taking up the House-passed legislation.

While 51 senators voted to limit the debate and bring up the repeal bill, this was short of the two-thirds needed to break a filibuster. Some observers viewed Dirksen's adamancy as retaliation for labor's opposition to his constitutional amendment to change the Supreme Court's one man-one vote doctrine.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION: A big disappointment to labor and the Administration was the failure of Congress to set effective federal standards on amount and duration of state unemployment benefits. The Senate approved a labor-supported bill, with federal standards included by a 45-36 vote. The House passed a bill chiefly expanding coverage but lacking any requirement on the amount of benefits. House-Senate conferees sought to reach a compromise in the final days of Congress, but the effort failed and no further action was taken.

A renewed fight on the issue is high on labor's priority list for the 90th Congress.

SITUS PICKETING: The labor movement was united in support of a bill to give building trades unions picketing rights at construction projects comparable to those available to unions in other industries. The legislation had considerable bipartisan support, Administration endorsement, the approval of the House Labor Committee, and clearance from the Rules Committee. It was scheduled for floor action in May.

The bill never reached the House floor. Labor Committee Chairman Adam C. Powell abruptly announced that he would refuse to call the bill up despite an earlier promise to do so. The AFL-CIO Executive Council said Powell "constituted himself a one-man roadblock" in a "mockery of the democratic process." Later in the session, the Labor Committee changed its rules to strip the chairman of such power. But the legislation died with the adjournment of Congress.

BONDING: Some muddled language in the Landrum-Griffin Act had boosted the cost of bonding union officers and employes by requiring coverage for a vague "faithful performance of duties" as well as the customary "honesty" protection. Congress agreed with the AFL-CIO that the added expense merely drained away union funds the law was supposed to safeguard. The House voted overwhelmingly, the Senate unanimously to drop the requirement.

SERVICE CONTRACTS: Companies bidding for government service contracts—such as cleaning federal buildings, providing laundry and cafeteria service—had been at a disadvantage if they paid union wages. The contractor who paid lower wages could bid lower.

At labor's urging, Congress passed a prevailing wage law for service contracts, including fringe benefits, comparable to the Davis-Bacon Act in construction.

Housing & Cities

DEPT. OF HOUSING: A new cabinet Dept. of Housing & Urban Development was established to coordinate the government's housing and mass transit programs and provide leadership in helping to meet the problems of the nation's cities. Two previous congresses had rejected Pres. Kennedy's attempt to establish the department. The 89th approved it, 217-184 in the House and 57-33 in the Senate.

HOUSING ACT—Congress last year expanded virtually every phase of the government's housing program, authorizing 60,000 new public housing units a year as part of a $2.9 billion, four-year extension of the urban renewal program. Low-income home owners in rehabilitation areas were made eligible for grants to improve their homes and save them from the bulldozer. The VA and FHA can pay up to one year's mortgage payments for homeowners unemployed because of the closing of a federal installation.

DEMONSTRATION CITIES—This labor-backed program was the major new Great Society program advanced by Pres. Johnson in the second session. It promises stepped-up federal aid to cities that develop imaginative plans to rehabilitate entire neighborhoods through improved housing, better schools, recreation facilities, health centers, social services and improved transit service. Federal funds could be used to pay up to 80 percent of the local cost of existing federal programs involving matching grants.

The bill also includes labor-urged FHA mortgage insurance for group medical facilities, additional funds for urban renewal, and mortgage insurance for developers of "new towns."

RENT SUPPLEMENTS: The 1965 Housing Act authorizes a new program of rent supplements to help low-income families by paying the difference between 25 percent of their income and the rent in privately-built, non-profit housing. But the House in the first session refused to vote any money to start the program. The funding battle was renewed this year and Congress finally appropriated $32 million of the $65 million sought by the Administration, and that by extremely close votes.

Civil Rights

VOTING RIGHTS: In its first session, Congress acted to end a century of disfranchisement for large numbers of Negroes in the South. The peaceful demonstrations at Selma, Ala., the obvious subterfuges used by southern officials to keep Negroes from registering, brought public opinion behind Johnson when he appealed to Congress for a strong voting rights bill, declaring: "We have already waited a hundred years . . . and the time for waiting is gone . . . we shall overcome."

With bipartisan support, the Senate broke a filibuster and passed the legislation, 77-19. The House concurred, 333-85.

Literacy tests were suspended in counties where they had been used to keep Negroes from voting and federal examiners were sent in to register thousands of new voters. The legislation set the stage for court tests which resulted in eliminating poll taxes imposed by four states as a condition for voting in state and local elections.

JUSTICE, HOUSING: The 1966 civil rights bill met with a different fate in a year of "backlash" political problems and a spotlight of publicity on an extremist fringe of the Negro movement.

The Administration's bill included a forthright ban on discrimination in the sale or rental of housing, along with provisions for anti-discrimination safeguards in jury selection and stronger protection against interference by force or threats with the exercise of constitutional rights.

After modifying the housing section so that it would not apply to resale of individual homes, the House passed the bill, 259-157. It ran into a filibuster in the Senate. But this time Dirksen was on the side of the civil rights opponents. The Senate voted 52-41 to limit debate, but could not muster the two-thirds needed and the legislation died.

To mark the occasion, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany used the same words he had applied to the filibuster tactics that killed 14(b) repeal: "The AFL-CIO is, of course, deeply disappointed that the democratic process in the Senate has been thwarted by the shabby parliamentary tactics of Sen. Dirksen and a minority of senators."

Railroad Workers

GRIEVANCE PROCEDURE: Congress unanimously approved labor-sought legislation to speed grievance procedures on railroads and end a double standard of court review. It amended the Railway Labor Act to make adjustment board decision final and binding on grievances involving wages, hours and work rules. Previously employers, but not workers, could appeal adverse decisions involving money. The legislation also requires special adjustment boards to be named at the request of either party when there is a backlog of grievances.

SUPPLEMENTAL PENSIONS: Rail labor and management negotiated an agreement for management-paid supplemental pensions of $45 to $70 a month, in addition to regular retirement benefits, for workers who retire after at least 25 years of service. Congress passed the legislation needed to incorporate this agreement into the Railroad Retirement Act. In the first session, in separate legislation, it enacted labor-supported adjustments in regular railroad retirement benefits resulting in higher payments to many pensioners.

FLORIDA EAST COAST: In an area of interest to labor because of the union-busting efforts of the Florida East Coast Railway, Congress plugged a loophole in the Bank Holding Company Act. The Alfred I. du Pont Trust, which controls the struck railway, a vast industrial empire in Florida and a chain of banks, will have to get rid of either its banking or non-banking properties.

Federal Employes

PAY RAISES: Salaried federal employes were voted pay raises in both 1965 and 1966, but in both years the amount fell short of the labor-backed goal of full comparability with private industry.

Administration budget pressures and insistence on a "guideline" formula kept the amount of the raise down to 3.6 percent in 1965 and 2.9 percent in 1966, plus additional fringe benefits. Among the fringes were the first severance pay system for workers whose jobs are abolished, liberalized overtime payments, relocation allowances, and higher health and retirement benefits.

LIFE INSURANCE: Johnson vetoed as "inflationary" a bill increasing life insurance coverage for federal employes. It is expected to be reintroduced next year.

HATCH ACT: Labor's complaints over restrictions on political activity by federal workers helped bring passage of a bill establishing a bipartisan commission to study the Hatch Act and make recommendations to the President and Congress within a year.

PRIVACY: Complaints by government employe unions over invasion of privacy and use of lie detectors were aired at House and Senate hearings. While they did not result in immediate legislation, they did bring administrative action to curb the use of polygraph tests by government agencies.

Immigration

Presidents Truman, Eisenhower and Kennedy had all sought to change the national origin quota system which, since 1924, had told the world that this nation considered some countries a more desirable source of new Americans than others.

The first session of the 89th Congress voted 318-95 in the House and 76-18 in the Senate to end the discriminatory admission of immigrants. At the base of the Statue of Liberty, the President signed the bill which will admit immigrants on the basis of what they can do for America, and which opens the door to reuniting of families.

Consumers & Safety

TRUTH - IN - PACKAGING: The legislation that emerged from the 89th Congress was a half-loaf, more appropriately called truth-in-labeling. The Senate voted for a bill designed to clear up some of the confusion and deception in the supermarket by allowing the government to set standards on package sizes and weights. The House passed a bill designed to regulate package labels and make price comparisons easier for the shopper, but left packaging regulation to voluntary action by manufacturers. House conferees refused to compromise and the Senate took the House bill as better than nothing. A companion truth-in-lending bill remained bottled up in committee.

AUTO SAFETY: Congress directed the secretary of commerce to set safety standards for all new cars and eventually for used cars as well. The first interim, new car standards would apply to 1968 models, with stronger, permanent standards to take effect a year later. The bill also authorizes federal safety standards and a uniform quality grading system for tires.

HIGHWAY SAFETY: The Highway Safety Act provides extra funds for states that adopt federally-approved highway safety programs and a cut in federal highway funds for states that do not.

MINE SAFETY: Federal mine inspection, previously limited largely to coal mines, was extended this year to all types of mining. Labor strongly backed the expansion.

National Economy

TAXES: A sharp change in the economy under the spur of Viet Nam military expansion is reflected in the contrasting intent of the 1965 and 1966 tax bills.

The first session saw quick passage of a $4.7 billion cut in excise taxes to pump new purchasing power into the economy.

Early in the second session part of the excise tax cut was suspended and later in the session Congress acted against "profit inflation" by suspending a 7 percent investment tax credit passed in 1964 to encourage business and industry to spend more on new equipment.

APPALACHIA REDEVELOPMENT: Early in the first session, Congress approved a $1.1 billion program to break through the economic isolation of the 12-state Appalachian mountain region, with emphasis on road-building and construction of area vocational schools and junior colleges. The Appalachian Regional Commission was set up for a joint federal-state program of economic development, and major projects are under way. Budget pressures have resulted in a cutback in funds and a stretchout of the program.

MANPOWER TRAINING: In both sessions, Congress liberalized and expanded the 1962 Manpower Development & Training Act. During this year's debate, the point was made that more than half the money spent on the program during its first four years has been recovered through taxes paid by trainees who successfully found employment.

POVERTY: Despite Republican attacks on the anti-poverty program, Congress expanded its scope in the first session and continued it at close to the same level this year.

Conservation

ANTI-POLLUTION: Big steps were taken in 1965 and 1966 to establish federal standards and federally-financed programs to curb water and air pollution. "No one has a right to use America's rivers and waterways as a sewer," Johnson said bluntly. The second session boosted anti-pollution spending authority above the budget request.

RECREATION: Five major national parks and recreation areas were authorized by Congress this year, including the Indiana Dunes National Lakeshore long sought by Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.).

HIGHWAY BEAUTY: The first session saw a big step to get rid of unsightly billboards and junkyards along highways. The "carrot-and-stick" approach provided federal funds to pay most of the cost of beautification and cut highway funds to states that don't cooperate.

PUBLIC POWER: After a series of cliff-hanging votes, the Dickey-Lincoln School public power project on the St. John River in Maine appears assured. It will provide low-cost public power in an area where power rates are among the highest in the nation.

Reapportionment

DIRKSEN AMENDMENT: The Senate's Republican leader used every strategem to win passage of his proposed constitutional amendment to allow one house of a state legislature to be set up on a basis other than population. Labor helped rally public opinion against the amendment and Senators Douglas, Tydings and Proxmire led the legislative attack.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany described the two-time rebuff by the Senate of the Dirksen Amendment as "perhaps the most important single victory of the 89th."

Transportation

DEPT. OF TRANSPORTATION: Congress this year approved creation of a Cabinet Dept. of Transportation, bringing together functions scattered in some 30 separate agencies. It voted, however, to exclude the Maritime Administration from the new department. The AFL-CIO has urged an independent Maritime Administration with authority and prestige to reverse the sharp decline in the nation's commercial sea power.

HIGH-SPEED TRAINS: Congress last year voted funds to help develop high speed rail transportation, particularly in the Washington-to-Boston corridor, with the intent of relieving crowded highways and airways. It also approved plans for a 25-mile rapid transit system for the national capital area.

District of Columbia

HOME RULE: Congress came closer than it ever had to granting self-government to the 760,000 residents of the nation's capital, but the labor-supported drive fell short.

The Senate passed a D.C. Home Rule bill, 63-29. In the House, strong Administration support brought the needed 218 signatures to a discharge petition to bring a home rule bill to the House floor. On the showdown vote, however, the House substituted a bill setting up a charter commission to prepare a home rule plan subject to voter referendum and congressional veto. The House never appointed conferees and a Senate attempt late in the second session to revive the legislation was blocked by the threat of a southern filibuster. An attempt to limit debate fell short of the needed two-thirds.

D.C. MINIMUM WAGE—A major accomplishment of the second session was passage of a minimum wage law for Washington, D.C., starting at $1.25 an hour and moving up to the $1.60 level in 1969. It will help some 70,000 workers not covered by federal law. Minimum wages for women and children have been set by industry wage boards under a 1918 law, but there has been no wage floor for men.

World Affairs

FOREIGN AID: Over the years, Congress has traditionally cut foreign aid budget requests in two steps, first reducing the spending authority and then further cutting the actual appropriations. Johnson, following a "bare bones" policy of holding his budget request to a minimum, escaped with a low 6.9 percent cut last year, the smallest reduction in the history of the program. This year, however, the cut was 13.3 percent and the final $2.9 billion figure was the lowest in 10 years.

In other areas, the Administration fared better, winning approval of the labor-indorsed bill for U.S. participation in the Asian Development Bank and passage of a large-scale Food for Peace program to let American farmers grow crops to feed the hungry of poorer nations.

Congress backed the President solidly on appropriations to meet the costs of the Viet Nam war.

Elections

CAMPAIGN FINANCING: In a surprise move before adjournment, Congress approved an amendment to a tax bill that could lead to federal financing of the cost of presidential election campaigns. It permits each taxpayer to earmark $1 of his federal income tax payment into a fund to be divided equally between the major parties up to a ceiling based on the total vote in the last presidential election. Minor parties could tap the fund only if they polled more than five million votes in the previous election. The plan was sponsored by Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.) and endorsed by the AFL-CIO.

No action was taken, however, on the President's proposals for tightened campaign spending report laws and tax deductions for political contributions. Neither did Congress go beyond House hearings on the President's proposal for four-year terms for House members.

Hails 'Best' Congress:

Meany Spurs Labor To Re-Elect Liberals

gress passed "the greatest volume of progressive social and economic legislation of any Congress in the history of the country."

Meany said labor's legislative victories in the 89th Congress stemmed from COPE's 1964 election effort. He added:

"The liberals of both parties in both houses, whom we helped to elect, operating under the leadership of a President dedicated to building a better America, wrote this box score.

"It is now up to us to protect it and expand upon it in the next Congress. While we praise the record of the 89th Congress, we cannot be satisfied or smug. We still must achieve the legislation that didn't pass this time."

If union members follow labor's traditional policy, "support your friends and defeat your enemies," Meany declared, "the box score of the 90th Congress will be even better." (Text of Meany editorial, Page 1.)

Marring the record of the 89th was the failure to repeal the "right-to-work" Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, establish federal standards for unemployment compensation, enact the bill to permit on-site picketing by construction trades, pass the 1966 civil rights bill and give self-government to the District of Columbia.

Two of the bills that passed the House and had majority support in the Senate—14(b) repeal and civil rights—were killed by what Meany has termed the "shabby" filibuster tactics of Senate Republican Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen.

It was the defeat of a Dirksen bill, however, that brought about what Meany and Biemiller termed "the most important single victory" in the 89th Congress.

What Dirksen sought to do—through a constitutional amendment—was to scrap the Supreme Court's one-man, one-vote directive which has led to reapportionment and majority rule in virtually every legislature, ending generations of rural control.

If the Dirksen Amendment had gone through, states could set up one house of a legislature on a basis other than population. This, the AFL-CIO charged, would have meant stalemated government and continued stagnation.

The vast sums spent to drum up support for the Dirksen Amendment were wasted. The Senate twice rejected his plan to rewrite the Constitution.

Many observers saw Dirksen's 14(b) filibuster as retaliation for labor's leadership in opposing his constitutional amendment, and perhaps as an invitation to a "deal."

Meany told the AFL-CIO's 1965 convention that he had "no doubt" that the two issues "are solidly and inescapably intertwined." But he served blunt notice that "the Senate minority leader and all his anti-labor stooges can filibuster until Hell freezes over before I will agree to sell the people short for that kind of deal."

Biemiller predicted a strong effort in the opening days of the 90th Congress to change the Senate rules to make it easier to cut off a filibuster.

Fight to Go On

"As long as Sen. Dirksen and the Dixiecrats want to stage a filibuster, they can kill almost any bill," Biemiller stressed. Labor and civil rights groups, he said, "will be fighting with everything we have" to modify the Senate rules.

A major overhaul of the social security system will be high on the agenda of the 90th Congress, Biemiller said, to meet the "obvious" need for higher social security payments and extension of medicare "to all beneficiaries of the social security system." Labor's social security goals go even further than the Administration proposals, he said.

A top-heavy loss of Democratic and liberal Republican seats in the November election could result in "a stalemated Congress" in January, Biemiller acknowledged, adding: "I don't believe the American people are going to allow it to happen."

MASSIVE legislative output of the 89th Congress is illustrated by House Speaker John W. McCormack, who posed between stacks of bills passed during the past two years.

LBJ Veto Says Guam Needs Strong Unions

Pres. Johnson vetoed the "right-to-work" law passed by the territorial legislature of Guam because it would "inhibit development of free collective bargaining" and prevent the growth of the "strong, responsible and self-reliant labor movement" needed for a prosperous economy.

The President voiced strong disapproval of the Guam legislature's action in a letter to Gov. Manuel F. L. Guerrero. Guerrero had vetoed the bill outlawing the union shop but the legislature, dominated by conservative business interests, overrode the veto. This left the final decision up to the President. He could either sign the legislation, let it become law without his signature—or veto it.

In the letter explaining his veto, the President noted that private business has flourished on the 209-square-mile island, a major military base in the Pacific with a population of 80,000.

"Yet one feature which is universally found in the rest of the United States is absent in Guam," he added. "That feature is a strong, responsible and self-reliant labor movement. For more than 30 years it has been the expressed national policy of the United States government to encourage free collective bargaining between employers and organizations of their employes. Such free collective bargaining has helped to raise wage and employment standards, lower working hours, improve safety practices, and in many ways assist the advancement of the economic condition of working men and women. It is fair to say that one of the strong foundations of the prosperity which has been enjoyed by working men and women and their employers in the United States over the past 30 years is the existence of an effective labor movement.

"In my opinion, the bill before me will inhibit development of the free collective bargaining which our national policy seeks to encourage. The development of free collective bargaining in Guam will tend to protect and advance the economy of Guam and the welfare of working men and women in Guam."

Strike Ties Up Codfish Fleet In Gloucester

Gloucester, Mass.—Four hundred deep-sea fishermen picketed the wharves here and tied up the Gloucester codfish fleet in a strike for contract parity with other East Coast ports.

Members of the Atlantic Fishermen's Union struck after negotiating three months for a pension plan, improved health and welfare benefits, an increase from $1 an hour to $2.50 for work performed in port, and reduction or elimination of payroll deductions for oil, radar and sounding machines.

The union is affiliated with the Seafarers. Since the strike began, two-year agreements have been reached with owners of four of the 30 trawlers represented by the Gloucester Boat Owners Association. They provide for payment of one half of 1 percent of the ship's gross stock valuation into a pension fund to be jointly administered by union and management trustees; and another 1 percent for the welfare fund.

In negotiations still going on here with the assistance of Federal Mediator John Sullivan and State Conciliator David Grodsky, the union is asking family hospitalization and medical coverage and extension of insurance for crewmen when the fleet operates out of other fishing grounds.

A major issue is the price of oil traditionally deducted from fishermen's income. Union Pres. James Ackert and Port Agent Mike Orlando said the owners charge 16 to 17.3 cents a gallon for oil sold to Boston fishermen for 12.8 cents. They seek parity with fishermen covered by union contracts in New Bedford, Boston and New York.

State Employe Unions Backed For Georgia

Savannah, Ga. — A resolution urging that state employes be authorized to form unions of their own choosing and to bargain collectively on their wages, hours and working conditions highlighted the largest convention in the history of the Georgia AFL-CIO.

A total of 488 delegates was registered for the sessions and adopted a series of clarifying amendments to the constitution.

Other resolutions called for repeal of Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which permits states to ban the union shop; enactment of situs picketing legislation and a state minimum wage of $1.25 an hour.

Speakers included E. T. Kehrer, southern area director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Civil Rights; Michael Botelho, of the State, County & Municipal Employes, and Robert Shadix of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Pres. W. H. Montague was re-elected by approximately a 3-1 margin over Leonard Hull. Sec. J. O. Moore, Executive Vice Pres. M. J. Counihan and Mrs. Louise Dean, treasurer, were re-elected without opposition.

Retired President Of ITU Dies at 74

Colorado Springs — Woodruff Randolph, former president of the Typographical Union, died of a heart ailment at the Union Printers' Home Hospital here. He was 74.

Randolph served as president of the ITU from 1944 to his retirement in 1958. Previously he had been secretary-treasurer for 16 years, and earlier had headed the Chicago local.

Although he went to work as a printer after leaving high school, Randolph obtained a law degree by studying at night.

Quebec Increases Minimum Wage

Quebec, Que.—A two-stage increase in provincial minimum wages has been announced by the Quebec Minimum Wage Commission.

The base rate for the Montreal area goes from 85 cents an hour to $1 effective Nov. 1 and to $1.05 next April 1. For the rest of the province, the minimum goes from 80 cents to 90 cents on Nov. 1 and to $1 in April.

For workers under age 18, the minimum is raised 10 cents to 75 cents an hour in the Montreal area and to 70 cents elsewhere on Nov. 1, with additional 10-cent increases April 1.

Taxpayers Get Chance to Earmark $1 into Bipartisan Campaign Kitty

Government funds, earmarked by taxpayers, will be used to finance presidential campaigns under legislation passed in the final hours of the 89th C ongress.

It would give the Democratic and Republican p arties a kitty of about $30 million each to pay the expenses of presidential campaigns. Its sponsor, S en. Russell B. Long (D-La.), claimed the plan will assure that presidential candidates are obligated to "all citizens . . . not just to the big contributors."

Here's how it would work:

Starting in 1968, taxpayers could check a box on their federal income tax forms which would allocate $1 of their tax payments for the campaign fund.

The money would be evenly divided between the two parties up to a ceiling based on the vote cast in the previous presidential election. Each vote above 10 million cast for a major party's presidential candidate would be worth $1. Thus on the basis of the 1964 vote, where 70 million ballots were cast, $60 million would be available for the next presidential election if enough taxpayers made the checkoff. Each party would be given $30 million for actual campaign expenses, to be verified by the General Accounting Office.

Minor parties could tap the fund only if they received more than 5 million votes in the previous presidential election—a figure no third party in American politics has reached. (Robert M. LaFollette, running as a Progressive in 1924, came closest with 4.8 million). The third party allotment would be $1 for each vote over 5 million.

At Senate hearings in August, the AFL-CIO commented favorably on the Long bill, declaring "it would substantially aid the national committees in their almost impossible job of financing presidential campaigns."

Associate General Counsel Thomas E. Harris noted that AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany had "endorsed the idea 10 years ago." Harris also urged a tax credit for small contributors to political candidates, parties or independent political committees in all elections.

The Senate first adopted the plan as a "rider" or unrelated amendment to a bill dealing with taxation of foreign investors. Somewhat to the surprise of observers, House conferees accepted the proposal and the House then adopted the conference report, 174-46, after rejecting by a 127-95 vote a motion to send it back to conference.

Adjournment, expected Friday, Oct. 21, was delayed another day as Sen. Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) denounced the plan as unconstitutional and threatened a filibuster. Gore relented the next day, however; the Senate passed the bill by a 31-22 vote, and Congress adjourned.

In other actions in the traditionally hectic windup of the session, approval was given to a $5 billion, two-year expansion of the Food for Peace aid program, a three-year $3.6 billion college aid bill was sent to the White House and a controversial section allowing doctors to "prescribe" segregated hospital accommodations was dropped from an appropriations bill. The final money bill of the year was passed, including a $1.6 billion appropriation for the anti-poverty program. This was about $133 million less than the Administration's budget request but slightly above last year's spending.

Meany Spurs Labor Drive To Get Out the Vote Nov. 8

A VIGOROUS FIGHT by the nation's elders to win long overdue modernization of the social security program was urged by Pres. John W. Edelman (speaking) of the National Council of Senior Citizens at the annual convention of the organization's Connecticut units in Bridgeport. (Story on Page 7.)

Turnout 'Crucial' To Elect Liberals

By Willard Shelton

A basic "get-out-the-vote" drive was urged on AFL-CIO affiliates and state and local central bodies by Federation Pres. George Meany as the country moved close to the Nov. 8 midterm elections.

In telegrams sent to the affiliates and central bodies, Meany warned that there is an effort by "certain groups" to shut off labor's gains from the 89th Congress and to defeat the candidates endorsed by COPE.

"Labor's get-out-the-vote drive is of crucial importance this year," his telegram said.

"Certain groups are trying to divide and confuse the voters by substituting emotion appeals for sound judgment. Their intent is to destroy the gains we made in the 89th Congress and defeat the pro-labor candidates endorsed by COPE.

"Urge you to do everything humanly possible on Election Day to get out the vote for labor's friends. They need and deserve our wholehearted support."

The people will elect 35 governors, 35 members of the Senate and 435 members of the House when they go to the polls Nov. 8.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany will make a three-network radio address to union members this weekend on how organized labor views the so-called "white backlash."

The broadcast schedule:
12:35 p.m. EST Saturday, CBS
5:30 p.m. EST Sunday, ABC
Time on the NBC network had not been confirmed as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Local stations should be checked for local broadcast times.

Trainmen Accept 5% Wage Hike

Chicago—The Railroad Trainmen, largest of the rail operating unions, have accepted a retroactive 5 percent pay raise plus vacation improvements in a contract settlement for 145,000 members.

BRT Pres. Charles Luna said the contract proposal presented by management negotiators representing virtually all of the nation's railroads was approved at a meeting of the union's 150 general chairmen with only two dissenting votes.

"This settlement puts us in a current situation in relation to a rising economy," Luna declared.

Similar offers are reported to have been made to 15 other unions involved in three separate sets of negotiations. There was no immediate indication whether the BRT settlement will become a pattern for similar agreements with the other unions.

Under the BRT agreement, the pay hike would be retroactive to Aug. 12 and would run until next

National Agreement Is Key Goal:

Westinghouse Unions Pledge Full Support in IBEW Strike

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and leaders of 10 unions representing the bulk of Westinghouse Electric Corp. workers pledged "full support in every way possible" to striking locals of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

The IBEW strike, rapidly expanding as local contracts expire, has brought out nearly 10,000 workers at 32 Westinghouse plants and shops throughout the nation. The union offered to call off the strike if Westinghouse management agrees to arbitrate all issues in dispute.

A key goal is a national agreement, which Westinghouse has with several other unions but has denied to the IBEW except for a contract covering a scattered group of repair shops. The big electric equipment chain has also balked at IBEW proposals for a common expiration date for local contracts and a narrowing of geographical wage differentials.

The telegram, made public by Meany, was addressed to IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman. Joining the AFL-CIO president in sending the telegram were the coalition unions which this year put an end to the "divide and rule" policy of General Electric and coordinated bargaining approaches to Westinghouse.

Besides the IBEW, the AFL-CIO National Committee on Collective Bargaining coalition includes the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, which recently reached a national agreement covering 40,000 Westinghouse employes; and the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

Freeman wrote Dir. William Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service that the IBEW is willing to call off the strike if Westinghouse agrees to any of three plans for final and binding arbitration of all issues in dispute.

Listed in the union's order of preference were these arbitration proposals:

- Submission of the disputed issues to the Council on Industrial Relations, the permanent union-management panel of the IBEW and the electrical contracting industry, or to
- A panel appointed by either the Mediation & Conciliation Serv-

Textile, Garment Unions Form Hemisphere Unit

Cuernavaca, Mexico—A new Inter-American Federation of Textile & Garment Workers was organized here by representatives of unions in a dozen countries and as one of its first acts called for a hemisphere-wide organizing campaign.

Sessions were held in the Inter-American Labor College of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers, the Western Hemisphere arm of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Pres. Oscar Estrado of the Venezuelan Federation of Workers in the Textile, Garment & Related Industries was elected president; Castulo Fernandez of Peru was chosen general secretary and Pres. William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America was named treasurer.

The executive committee includes Pres. George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers and Vice Pres. Charles Zimmerman of the Ladies' Garment Workers. Headquarters will be in Lima, Peru.

Building Trades Warn Of Tight Money Crisis

The construction industry is being "maneuvered into a depression" by the current tight money policy but will not go into it alone, the executive council of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Dept. charged in a statement attacking high interest rates.

"We know," the council declared, "that every segment and sector of industry after industry will go with us. . . . It is ridiculous to talk about a housing program and then allow money mismanagement to stop the construction of 400,000 houses.

"It is equally ridiculous to talk about schools, highways, sewers, hospitals, clinics and then make their construction impossible because of the high cost of inflated money."

The council said it will call on the incoming Congress to give leadership in helping to solve the problem, and specifically will ask the Banking & Currency Committees of both the House and Senate to seek methods "to correct inequities in our monetary program which are now uncontrolled by the representatives of the people."

The study of the detrimental effects of tight money should cover all facets of the economy, not just the construction industry, the statement said. The aid of the AFL-CIO state and local building trades councils will be sought, it added.

The executive council blamed the

2 Shoe Unions Win Key Pacts For 27,000

St. Louis—Approximately 27,- members of two AFL-CIO unions will receive comparable benefits amounting to 25.5 cents an hour under new two-year contracts with two of the country's largest shoe manufacturers.

The United Shoe Workers and the Boot & Shoe Workers bargained jointly in reaching the separate settlements. They affect about 15,000 employes of the Intl. Shoe Co. in Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas, and some 12,000 employes of the Brown Shoe Co. in the same states, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee and Mississippi.

Increases Spelled Out

The Intl. Shoe agreement was dated Oct. 1. A wage increase of 9.75 cents an hour takes effect Jan. 2, 1967, and another of 14.5 cents a year later.

Fringe benefits worth a total of 1.25 cents over the two years include substantial improvements in the hospitalization program for workers and their families; two days paid leave in case of a death in the immediate family, and an increase in pension benefits from $1.75 to $2 per month per year of service.

The Brown Shoe pact, carrying a Nov. 1 date, pays benefits under a somewhat different formula.

Wage increases of 6 percent for pieceworkers and 9 cents an hour for day workers go into effect Jan. 1, 1967, followed a year later by boosts of 7 percent and 12 cents, respectively.

In addition, on Feb. 1, 1967, piece rates will be raised on jobs where investigation shows the old rates are too low to yield an average of $1.54 an hour. A year later the average will rise to $1.70 an hour.

Improvements were written into the contract clauses dealing with machine breakdowns and the hospitalization insurance program. Pension benefits were hiked from $1.75 to $2 per month per years of service.

Negotiating committees for the unions were headed by the respective presidents—Pres. George O. Fecteau of the United Shoe Workers and Pres. John E. Mara of the Boot & Shoe Workers.

TWO NEW BUILDINGS were dedicated by Portland, Ore., union members on the same day: At top, the Portland Labor Center, a $2.5 million successor to the 45-year-old Labor Temple; below, the S-shaped Union Manor Apartments, a retirement project for union members and others 62 years of age and older. The Labor Center is on a five-acre urban renewal site, has 86,000 square feet of floor space and provides parking for 300 cars. The apartment project, built with a federal loan, has 300 units, is 10 minutes by bus from downtown and occupies a seven-acre tract with a duck-filled creek running through it. AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Richard F. Walsh represented Pres. George Meany at the ceremonies.

$500,000 in Union Aid Given Hurricane Victims

The AFL-CIO and its affiliates contributed more than $500,000 in cash, goods and services for relief of victims of Hurricane Betsy, which hit New Orleans early this year, Dir. Leo Perlis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services reported.

"But in a sense there never can be a full report," Perlis said. "It is simply impossible to estimate the dollar value of the hours of volunteer labor, food, clothing and shelter which AFL-CIO affiliates and members provided."

Much of the cash raised went to the Red Cross—including $25,- 000 each from the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers.

The United Fund of New Orleans received $5,000 from Longshoremen's Local 1419; $3,000 from ILA Local 854; $1,000 from Local 130 of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and $1,000 from Laborers Local 689.

Several unions gave direct assistance to members whose homes had been damaged or destroyed in the blow. ILA Local 1419 gave 754 members a total of $35,000, while the Communications Workers gave more than $30,000 to 208 members.

Women's auxiliaries played a major role in raising $36,000 collected from the Postal Clerks, Letter Carriers and other post office employes.

Employers joined unions in raising relief funds in some instances. The American Radiator & Standard Sanitary Corp. contributed $15,- 000 of a $38,000 fund raised by the Operative Potters, and a contractor and IBEW Local 130 together collected more than $25,000 for the homeless.

Other major contributions Perlis listed included $35,000 from the Operating Engineers; more than $20,000 from the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers; more than $18,- 000 from the Machinists; $15,500 from the Railroad Trainmen; $12,- 000 from the Fire Fighters; $7,000 from the Steelworkers; $5,000 from the Seafarers and $3,000 from the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Automation Plan Urged On Textile Employers

Charlotte, N.C.—Action by the textile industry to "face up to its responsibilities in this age of automation" was demanded by the executive council of the Textile Workers Union of America at a meeting here.

The union council met during the 24th Southern Textile Exposition in Greenville, S.C., and said the "glittering exhibition" again emphasized technical progress, "with no concern about the impact these revolutionary changes are making . . . upon the lives of the men and women who man the machines."

It called upon the industry to:

- Offer workers displaced by automation equivalent jobs or the training, education and assistance needed to obtain them.

- Establish and finance a Textile Automation Fund, formalized by act of Congress, to provide severance pay and the training and relocation assistance needed by workers displaced by technological change.

The resolution pointed out that the federal government has drafted a program to meet "this ominous challenge" which has been approved by "enlightened employers in other industries where collective bargaining is an integral part of the American way of industrial life."

But the council said that the textile industry, "which argues that its workers do not need collective bargaining and makes a practice of thwarting every effort of workers to join unions, has yet to take its first step to meet its clear obligation to ease the heavy burden of adjustment facing workers affected by technological change."

Import Curbs Sought

In another resolution the TWUA council cited the threat to employment posed by rapidly-increasing textile imports and urged extension of the Long-Term Arrangement for the cotton textile international trade for five years beyond its expiration on Sept. 30, 1967.

In addition it asked the President for stronger administration of the arrangement so as to prevent further disruption of markets and employment, and urged immediate steps by the Administration and Congress to set up restrictions on imports of wool and man-made textiles to safeguard jobs in other branches of the U.S. textile industry.

Hospital Planning Unit Re-Elects Labor Official

Farm Union Drive Set in New York

Kiamesha Lake, N. Y.—A program to bring union organization to New York farm workers was approved by the more than 1,700 delegates and alternates—a record attendance—at the 9th convention of the New York State AFL-CIO.

Acting on a request of Pres. Raymond R. Corbett, the state central body's executive council appropriated $10,000 and authorized formation of a special committee to carry out the intent of the resolution.

It cited "inhuman living conditions" and "exploitation" of workers in the state's agricultural industry, many of them migrants and minor children, and called for action to end these conditions through union organization.

In late September, the resolution noted, two migrant workers were killed and a third seriously injured when a stove exploded in a chicken coop assigned them as living quarters while they were employed on a farm at Brockton, N.Y.

Meany a Speaker

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in his first address to a New York state convention since he presented the charter at merger in 1958, reminded the delegates of the importance of state labor organizations, citing the more than 100-year history of a state labor body in New York, established in 1864 as the result of anti-union action in the legislature.

Calling the 89th Congress "the best" for labor since he has been in Washington, Meany told the delegates they should not be too disappointed at those setbacks encountered. "Dirksens come and Dirksens go," he observed, while labor keeps on fighting until it succeeds.

At its opening session, the convention went on record as taking no stand on candidates for statewide office in the Nov. 8 election. This was in line with action taken in late September by the State AFL-CIO executive council. However, Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller; Frank D. O'Connor, Democratic gubernatorial candidate, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., Liberal Party candidate for that office, addressed the delegates.

Another major resolution called for repeal of the so-called Blaine amendment to the New York State Constitution barring even indirect aid to church-related education. The delegates urged new language similar to that in the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

The Blaine amendment, added in 1894 in an era of bigotry and "know-nothingism," shapes up as one of the more controversial items expected to come before the New York State Constitutional Convention, the first since 1938, when it convenes in Albany next Apr. 4. The State AFL-CIO had earlier cited it as "discriminatory" and therefore against principles long held by labor.

Prior to the biennial election of officers, Mrs. Betty Hawley Donnelly, who had served as a vice president of the merged body and the predecessor State Federation of Labor for 44 years, announced her retirement. She was named a vice-president emeritus and a permanent delegate to future State AFL-CIO conventions.

Elected without opposition were Corbett; Sec-Treas. Louis Hollander and the 25 incumbent vice presidents, along with John J. Coleman of the Stage Employes and Joseph J. Collins of the State, County & Municipal Employes.

Molders Defeat UE Raid Effort

Blossburg, Pa.—Workers at the J. P. Ward Foundries voted overwhelmingly to keep Local 304 of the Molders as their bargaining representative, rebuffing an attempted raid by the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers.

The vote was 238 for the Molders to 121 for UE, with seven no union ballots.

Directing the Molders' campaign were Int. Vice Pres. Mike Kogut, Organizer Ben Musser and District Rep. Levi Collette.

Carolina Labor Assails Klan State Fair Booth

Charlotte, N.C.—Delegates to the North Carolina State AFL-CIO convention protested the leasing of a booth at this year's State Fair for a "propaganda exhibit" by the Ku Klux Klan—and assignment of 12 police officers for a day and night guard for the exhibit.

The convention resolution affirmed the right of free speech and peaceful assembly for all groups, "however much we may disagree with them." But it said the public interest does not justify a state exhibit by the Klan, a group so inflammatory that a large force of police is needed "either to protect the Klan against others or to protect others against the Klan."

In other resolutions, the State AFL-CIO:

- Strongly endorsed two labor education programs, the Southern Labor School for training of state and local central body officers and the Tri-State Labor School, which holds annual week-long programs sponsored by the state central bodies of North Carolina, South Carolina and Virginia.

- Called for repeal of a 1965 amendment to the state's Workmen's Compensation Act which reduced protection to workers subjected to silicosis and asbestosis.

- Urged all central bodies to set up active Community Services Committees if they have not already done so. A separate resolution called on central bodies to take the lead in developing pre-retirement information programs and establishment of senior citizen centers for retired workers, "either on a union or community basis."

It said such centers should "include opportunities for their members to exercise all rights of citizens, including political education and activities."

- Voiced support of anti-poverty programs.

- Called for programs of veneral disease education in all schools.

- Urged a renewed fight, "notwithstanding any filibuster," for repeal of Section 14(b) of Taft-Hartley.

ACWA Staffer Joins Detroit Transport Body

Detroit — National Rep. Willie Baxter of the Clothing Workers, formerly a member of the city's Commission on Community Relations, has been named secretary of the Transport Commission by Mayor Jerome P. Cavanaugh.

By Presidential Panel:

Airline Pay Pattern Proposed at Pan Am

A Presidential Emergency Board said contract patterns set through "free collective bargaining" rather than anti-inflation "guideposts" should govern negotiations between Pan American World Airways and the Transport Workers.

The presidential board recommended wage increases totaling 15 percent over a 32-month contract, plus additional benefits, which it claimed would produce a package equal to the TWU settlement with American Airlines last month.

It suggested further negotiations between the parties on "the question of whether wages should be subject to reopening during the life of the contract based on cost of living considerations."

The TWU represents some 12,000 Pan Am employes—primarily mechanics, ground service employes and stewardesses. The three-member emergency board, headed by David H. Stowe, a member of the Missile Sites Labor Commission, was appointed by Pres. Johnson under Railway Labor Act procedures after the union had set a strike date.

The other members were Charles M. Rehmus, co-director of the University of Michigan's School of Labor & Industrial Relations, and University of Texas Law Professor Jerre S. Williams.

Under the Railway Labor Act, a strike or lockout is barred for 30 days after an emergency board reports.

The board's report drew considerable attention since it was patterned after the American Airlines settlement which Gardner Ackley, the President's chief economic adviser, had attacked as "clearly inflationary."

The emergency board said it was "deeply conscious of its responsibility to the public interest," adding:

"That interest will not be served by the further disruption of airline operations which would occur if this dispute continues unsettled. Moreover, there has been no evidence of pressures for rate increases resulting from any of the prior settlements in this industry. The high rate of productivity over the past several years in air transportation creates an economic environment in which wage increases may be above average but price increases need not result."

Besides, the board said, "as a practical matter" it would be "unrealistic" to assume that a settlement could be reached for less than what the union had obtained from another major airline.

The board's recommendations called on the union to withdraw a long list of demands for various improvements and to compromise on others. Among the improvements it did recommend was an increase in the employer contribution—and a cut in the worker's contribution—to the company's pension program. The TWU had asked that the company pay the full amount.

GREATER EMPHASIS must be placed on the economic, social and educational dimensions of the problems that confront organized labor and the civil rights movement, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman (seated, left) told the 12th Labor Conference on Civil Rights sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee of Chicago. Seated with Slaiman are Joseph Minsky (center), Chicago attorney, and Theodore Robinson, technical advisor to the Illinois Bureau of Employment Security. Standing are Assistant AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Walter G. Davis (left) and Assistant U.S. Atty. Gerald M. Werksman.

BRT Accepts 5% Pay Raise From Rails

September. A third week of vacation would be provided after 10 years of service, instead of the present 15 years.

Other operating unions currently considering the offer are the Firemen & Enginemen and the Switchmen, both AFL-CIO affiliates as is the BRT, and the unaffiliated Conductors & Brakemen. The unaffiliated Locomotive Engineers currently are bargaining with individual railroads.

The non-operating unions, all affiliates, are negotiating in two groups.

One set includes the Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation-Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen and Hotel & Restaurant Employes.

Six shopcraft unions are negotiating through the AFL-CIO Railway Employes Dept. This group includes the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Boilermakers, Sheet Metal Workers and Firemen & Oilers.

The early "serious offer" by the nation's railroads took a number of observers by surprise. Rail negotiations more often than not are long, drawn-out affairs, usually culminating in strike notices and appointment of presidential emergency boards under the Railway Labor Act before agreements are finally hammered out.

High Joblessness Areas Drop to All-Time Low

The number of major job areas with substantial unemployment—6 per cent or more—hit an all-time low of eight in September, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz announced in releasing the September report on employment trends in 150 major manpower centers.

Atlantic City, N.J., moved out of the labor surplus categories it has been in since 1951 thanks to "significant" long-term employment gains in trade and service industries spurred by the opening of new department stores, restaurants and large motels catering to the tourist trade, and to sustained growth in manufacturing jobs.

New Bedford, Mass., which had been listed in the substantial unemployment group since 1958, showed improvement because of more jobs in the apparel, electrical machinery, rubber products and ordnance industries.

The major areas still with substantial unemployment were listed as Fresno, San Bernardino-Riverside-Ontario and Stockton, Calif.; Fall River and Lowell, Mass., Altoona, Pa., and Mayaguez and Ponce, Puerto Rico.

"This is a gratifying improvement over a year ago when 19 major areas were classified in the substantial unemployment category," said Wirtz. "This is a dramatic improvement over early 1961 when 101 areas had substantial unemployment."

A record 59 areas now have less than 3 percent of the work force jobless, compared with 46 such manpower centers a year earlier.

"These changes in the past year show that we are continuing to make real progress in attacking the problem of unemployment," he said.

Labor Force Of 100 Million Seen in 1980

The country will have to find jobs for a labor force of more than 100 million workers in 1980, Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz disclosed, with the West expected to show the greatest gains.

Between 1960 and 1970, the work force is expected to increase by 22 percent—from 69.9 million to 85.3 million. In the following decade, it is expected to grow by 18 percent, or from 85.3 million to 100.7 million.

The projections, meaning labor force increases of about 15 million in each decade, are based on a report, "Labor Force Projections by States, 1970 and 1980," in the October issue of the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review.

The study shows that:

- The labor force in the West will rise by 26 percent in the 1970-80 decade; that of the South 19 percent, about 17 percent in the North Central section and less than 16 percent in the Northeast.
- The increase in the number of workers 14 to 24 years old will be less in the 1970s than it has been in the 1960s.
- The non-white labor force will rise by 31 percent in the 1960s and 26 percent in the 1970s, compared with jumps of 22 percent and 18 percent, respectively, in the over-all work force.

Rights Parley Hails Labor's Commitment

Chicago—Organized labor's commitment to stay with the civil rights movement was hailed by Ely M. Aaron, chairman of the Chicago Commission on Human Relations, in the major speech at the 12th Labor Conference on Civil Rights.

Aaron called the recent statement of principles by seven major Negro leaders and AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany's endorsement of it a "high point" in the struggle for equal rights.

The conference is sponsored by the Jewish Labor Committee of Chicago and is endorsed by the Chicago AFL-CIO and the Illinois AFL-CIO.

AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dir. Donald Slaiman led a panel session that discussed the relationship between the labor and civil rights movements.

"While we still have many problems to work on in eliminating discrimination in this country—even some within the labor movement—both labor and civil rights organizations must look more to the economic, social and educational dimensions of these problems," he said.

Serving with him on the panel was Legislative Rep. Norman Hill of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. Charles Chiakulas, IUD coordinator in Chicago, was reporter.

Darrell Smith, area director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, led a panel discussion on the radical right wing. Walter G. Davis, assistant AFL-CIO civil rights director, led another on civil rights legislation.

Panels on education were led by Pres. Charles Cogen of the Teachers and on the anti-poverty program by Paul Iaccino, assistant to the president of the Chicago AFL-CIO.

Emanuel Muravchik, JLC national director, in opening the conference listed the Negro leaders' condemnation of "black power" and violence among the most important recent developments in civil rights.

Others he specified were the Chicago agreement on open housing, and the civil rights movement's adoption of the social goals of the labor movement.

RETIRING Jan. 1 after 30 years as secretary-treasurer of the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers and its forerunner, the National Council of United Cement Workers is Toney Gallo. He helped set up the AFL-CIO Secretary-Treasurers' Conference, served as its co-chairman for three years, as chairman for six.

Union-Backed Housing Co-op Set in Chicago

Chicago—The Clothing Workers have announced plans to build middle-income cooperative housing in Chicago, patterned after the union's successful programs in the New York area.

The program will be developed by the non-profit United Dwellings Foundation of Metropolitan Chicago, headed by Murray H. Finley, manager of the ACWA's Chicago Joint Board.

Its first project will be construction of some 1,000 apartment units in a Chicago urban renewal area, combining low rises, high rises and town houses, with ample space for parking, playgrounds and landscaping.

Announcement of the new program was made by ACWA Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky at a news conference in the office of Chicago Mayor Richard J. Daley.

IBEW Canadian Leader Named to Industry Unit

Ottawa, Ont.—Vice Pres. William Ladyman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers has been appointed to the board of directors of the Polymer Corp., Canadian government-owned synthetic rubber complex with its main operations at Sarnia, Ont.

Westinghouse Unions Rally Behind IBEW

ice or the White House, or to

- A single arbitrator appointed by either the Mediation & Conciliation Service or the President.

The wire to Freeman from Meany and the 10 union leaders said:

"We wish you to know that you have our full support in every way possible in the thoroughly justified strike of your Westinghouse membership against that corporation.

"Your demands for a national agreement to cover all the IBEW Westinghouse plants, for reducing the difference in wages between your high paid and low paid Westinghouse plants, for a common expiration date for all your Westinghouse locations, and for other improvements, are thoroughly justified and should be met by the Westinghouse Corp. We hope you will call upon us for whatever you may need to bring the dispute to a successful conclusion."

Some 4,000 IBEW members struck Nov. 1 and thousands others joined them as local contracts expired or temporary extensions of agreements failed to produce settlements. The IBEW represents some 14,000 workers at Westinghouse, but some of the contracts do not expire until December. There was also a scattering of strikes by other unions, including more than 650 members of the Flint Glass Workers at Westinghouse's Bath, N. Y., electronic tube plant.

A brief, token appearance of IBEW pickets at the big East Pittsburgh plant of Westinghouse shut down one shift there as the 7,000 IUE members refused to cross the line.

In another area of electrical industry bargaining, several local issue strikes continued at GE plants, despite conclusion of the national agreement.

The biggest of these was at GE's Schenectady, N. Y., plant, where 10,000 members of the IUE and the Technical Engineers remained out on strike.

Opportunity at the Polls

THE ARITHMETIC of the Nov. 8 election adds up to the not very encouraging conclusion that, despite a projected increase in the total vote, a minority of the U.S. population of voting age will turn out at the polls.

If the trend of the past 20 years holds up, an estimated 47 percent of those of voting age will cast ballots in the mid-term elections. This means that about 54 million of the 115.8 million of voting-age Americans will go to the polls to elect a new House of Representatives, 35 senators, 35 governors and part or all of the membership of 45 state legislatures.

In addition thousands of local offices will be filled and scores of referendum questions and constitutional amendments will be passed on by the electorate.

The vote turnout this year, if it holds up to expectations, will be part of a continuing improvement. The low point of 32.7 percent was reached in the 1942 war-year election and the figure has climbed steadily to 46.5 percent in 1962.

In contrast, the voting in presidential election years, while topping 50 percent of the voting-age population, has moved up and down, reaching a high of 63.8 percent in 1960 but dropping back to 62 percent in 1964, somewhat less than the 62.2 percent of 1952.

The improved voting participation in the off-year elections is pointed up also by figures showing that from 1950 to 1962 the voting-age population increased 13.7 percent while the total vote cast in the non-presidential years was up 27.5 percent.

But the fact remains that in the off years a minority of the potential number of voters cast ballots for men who shape policies on the national, state and local level.

LABOR, liberal groups and a wide variety of organizations interested in maintaining representative democracy as a live and vital institution have hammered away incessantly at the theme of a large voter turnout.

Registration and get-out-the vote campaigns have spread across the land, but the increase in participation is small compared to the scope of the problem.

Much of the trouble lies with antiquated registration and voting laws, seemingly designed to erect barriers to registering and voting. Some of these have been removed by federal action—literacy tests and other discriminatory requirements. More remains to be done.

While the right not to vote must be recognized as part of the right and privilege of voting, the interest of the electorate must be stimulated so that every eligible voter makes his voice heard in one way or another in selecting the men and women elected to public office.

THE NOV. 8 elections are likely to produce an exceedingly large number of close contests where a shift of a few hundred votes will make the difference between progress or stalemate.

Every vote will be needed to assure that the direction of government at all levels properly represents the needs and thinking of the people.

This is the year, if past voting turnout trends continue, when the nation has at least the opportunity to strengthen the democratic process by trooping to the polls to mark their choices for public office, to try and knock out once and for all the statistic that less than a majority of the voting-age population cares enough about off-year elections to vote.

A Story of Growth:

Account of President's Cabinet Mirrors the Country's History

THE 89TH CONGRESS will go down in the history books for many achievements but one of the most intriguing is that it is the only Congress, since the founding of the Republic, to create two cabinet-level departments.

During the first session it established the Dept. of Housing & Urban Affairs and during the second session it set up the Dept. of Transportation.

How far we have come since George Washington presided over his first Cabinet which consisted of Thomas Jefferson as secretary of state, Alexander Hamilton as secretary of the treasury and Henry Knox as secretary of war!

The attorney general did not enter the cabinet until 1814 and the Dept. of Justice was not established under him until 1870.

The office of postmaster general has a long and fascinating history. Benjamin Franklin became postmaster general in 1775 and created the postal service. However, he held the office for only one year because he was made ambassador to France. The postmaster general did not enter the Cabinet until 1829. The Post Office was a part of Treasury until 1872.

The State Dept. was and is the senior department in the executive branch.

Prior to 1789 the country's foreign affairs were conducted under the direction of the Continental Congress, first by the Committee of Secret Correspondence, later by the Committee of Foreign Affairs and from 1781 to 1789 by the Dept. of Foreign Affairs.

The vital role of the secretary of state in the early days of the republic is seen in the fact that many men who later became President held the post. They included Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, and Van Buren.

Until the Presidential Succession Act of 1947, the secretary of state was in direct line to succession to the presidency following the Vice President. Under the 1947 law, the speaker of the House and president pro tem of the Senate are given priority to the secretary of state in succession.

The growth of the President's Cabinet through the years reflects the needs of a growing and developing nation. Originally it was a small group of presidential advisers but today its members administer vast areas of government.

The War Dept. was the third most important department in our original government. Today, the Dept. of Defense, established in 1947, is still the third highest cabinet department.

The original War Dept. included the Navy. The separate Dept. of the Navy and office of secretary of the navy was created in 1798 on a Cabinet level. Pres. John Adams offered the post to George Cabot of the Massachusetts Cabots but he turned it down. Benjamin Stoddert of Maryland was appointed the same day.

In the National Security Act of 1947 the Army, Navy and Air Force were all given sub-Cabinet status under the cabinet-level secretary of defense.

The Dept. of the Interior was created in 1849. Originally it was a kind of federal housekeeper. Its original bureaus included the General Land Office, Office of Indian Affairs, Pension Office and Patent Office. However, with the rising concern over our natural resources, one of its main responsibilities today is that of custodian of these vital resources.

IN THE LATTER part of the 19th Century ours was a growing industrial nation but agriculture was still dominant. Congress established the Dept. of Agriculture in 1862 headed by a commissioner, but it was not until 1889 that the commissioner was renamed secretary and admitted to the Cabinet.

Business and industry were becoming more and more a powerful factor in this country. The Dept. of Commerce & Labor was established in 1903 for the purpose of fostering, promoting and developing foreign and domestic commerce.

The department, however, was largely a business department and labor was getting limited help from it. Originally, the Labor Bureau was in the Interior Dept. but being in Commerce did not resolve the problems, either.

Organized labor and many others pushed hard for a separate Dept. of Labor and this was set up in 1913 with William B. Wilson, a member of the Mine Workers, as its first secretary.

It was 40 years later in 1953 that the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare was established. For years such a department was urged because the nation had developed a deeping concern for problems in these areas.

Indeed, these problems have grown so acute that pressure is now being exerted to establish a separate Dept. of Education.

The two new departments set up by the 89th Congress—HUD and Transportation—reflect the serious concern over what is happening to our central cities and the complexities of movement in the modern age.

The history of the President's Cabinet, indeed, mirrors the history of the country. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Old Political Lines Crumbling In Maryland, Virginia Elections

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

WHILE THE CREAM of the Washington press corps, not to mention this rather curdled member, is dashing about the country covering the "key" contests in this year's elections, some significant races are being run right under their figurative noses in the neighborhood of the nation's capital, in Maryland and Virginia.

Morgan

In Maryland, which has the dubious distinction of tolerating, through the years, one of the worst and most irresponsible state legislatures in the union, there is a dandy choice for governor between a total-segregationist building contractor on the Democratic ticket named George P. Mahoney, who is also totally inexperienced in politics except that he has run unsuccessfully for various offices half a dozen times, and a virtually unknown but apparently moderate Republican, Spiro T. Agnew, who has a creditable if uninspiring record as Baltimore County executive.

A maverick Democrat, Hyman C. Pressman, who has served as city comptroller of Baltimore, is running as an independent. He cites numerous taxpayer's suits he has filed over the years to support his claim to being a "friend of the little man."

But the headlines have inevitably gone to Mahoney, who won the Democratic primary against two major and professional opponents by campaigning on one issue: keep the Negroes in their place, he said, in effect, and out of white neighborhoods. His actual slogan, prettied up a little, was transparently racist: "Your home is your castle," it said, "Protect it." He continues to use that motto as his central theme.

But housing is not the only issue in Maryland—there is a growing number of Negro voters anyway—and there is some indication that the state's Democratic organization is rather appalled with the narrowly-based political virtues of its unexpected candidate.

In any event the GOP's Agnew has won strong support from the AFL-CIO over Mahoney and Americans for Democratic Action endorsed the Republican nominee as well.

Maryland has finally redistricted to give urban and suburban areas a more even break in representation with the rural and often reactionary Eastern Shore counties.

As a result the liveliest congressional race appears to be going on in a new congressional district, the 8th, in Washington's fast-growing suburbs, between an American University political science professor, Royce Hanson, a Democrat, and State Sen. Gilbert Gude, a Republican. This race is rated very close by the experts. Both candidates support open housing.

Interestingly enough, racial bigotry shows less of a jagged cutting edge in Virginia, but the issue is there just the same and some moderate Democrats could get hurt by it.

ONE OF THE MOST ironic equations emerges in the former fiefdom of Judge Howard W. Smith, the courtly but 19th century chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee. Last July a moderate member of the legislature, George C. Rawlings, Jr., 45, scored a sensational upset by winning the Democratic nomination for the seat that Smith had held for 33 years.

Smith conceded in a close race but then he wrote a letter to a friend saying he had been the victim of a "vicious" campaign and somehow the letter got into print. This and the so-called backlash are hurting Rawlings badly in his race against Republican William Scott, an attorney, who, in the paradoxical manner of Virginia politics, is getting the tacit support of what is left of the once-powerful political machine of the late Harry Byrd, one a conservative giant of the U. S. Senate.

Harry, Jr., is running for his father's seat though he is being sharply challenged by another Republican lawyer, Lawrence Traylor, a conservative himself. His strength is being eroded somewhat, however, by the presence of two other candidates including an avowed exponent of the radical right.

Considered safely ahead of Republican candidate James Ould for the other Virginia Senate seat is William B. Spong, a moderate state legislator, who toppled the veteran colleague of the elder Byrd in the primary, Sen. Willis Robertson.

One of the most significant congressional races in Virginia is being run just across the Potomac from the capital in another Washington "bedroom" county, Fairfax.

There Republican Rep. Joel T. Broyhill faces the stiffest challenge of his 14 years in Congress from a former Eisenhower Republican named Clive du Val who, distressed with the Goldwater-orientation of his party—and of Broyhill—won election to the Virginia Legislature as a Democrat.

More of a businessman than a politician, Broyhill has been a molehill as a congressman but a mountain nevertheless hard for moderate Democrats to defeat—partly for the very good reason that he too received tacit support from the Byrd machine. Old political contours are changing in both Maryland and Virginia, but the shape of things to come is not yet clear.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE DEVELOPMENT of visual-audio campaign materials, which then are promptly repudiated by responsible party officials, seems close to becoming a way of life for Republican operators on lower levels.

The latest incident involves a 30-minute campaign film put together by a New York production firm but authorized, apparently, by the House Congressional Campaign Committee headed by Rep. Bob Wilson of California.

The credit lines at the end of the film listed the Republican National Committee, the House Campaign Committee and Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee as sponsors of the enterprise. But as soon as Republican National Chairman Ray C. Bliss attended a "private preview" of the film, he ordered the name of the national committee removed from the credit list.

The inevitable stories then began that Bliss had seen just a "first draft" of the film and that revisions were being made.

But a Republican National Committee spokesman said he doubted that Bliss would agree to sponsor the film regardless of the changes.

Democratic National Committee Chairman John M. Bailey charged that revisions began only after newspaper stories appeared on the nature of the film, which was intended for use on the National Broadcasting Co. network on the Sunday before election. Bailey also asked the Fair Campaign Practices Committee to investigate the use of "highly distorted and misleading material" in the film.

The Fair Campaign Practices Committee earlier in this campaign had been able to persuade Wilson to check the use in local GOP circles of a "dubbed" tape-recording of what was represented to be a recording of Pres. Johnson's voice.

In one portion of the tape an overlay of unexplained noise made the President's remarks indecipherable. And in another portion an unidentified voice added words that were not Johnson's.

Such things, of course, cannot be accidental. And the harm is done before local Republican groups can get the word from Wilson that the tape, after all, is not supposed to be used.

THESE INCIDENTS are reminiscent of the movie prepared in 1964 for use at Republican meetings complete with topless ladies, wild dancing and a general implication that the moral tone of the country had deteriorated and that Lyndon B. Johnson was to blame for it.

Barry Goldwater, the GOP presidential nominee, stopped the use of that film after getting a personal preview—and then, too, after newspaper stories had appeared about it.

The producers of the 1964 film were Hollywood types—and there was at least one additional film which they had prepared and put in cans, but neither was distributed after Goldwater put his veto on the first one.

The difficult thing to understand is why the faked tape and the half-faked films keep on being prepared so that first Goldwater and then Ray Bliss have to repudiate them.

There are perfectly legitimate public issues which Republican candidates can use against the party in power. There are issues that can be discussed in the ordinary manner of American political campaigns.

Speeches by the candidates, forum programs, the distribution of literature may lack the impact of the faked tape recording or of the essentially faked special film production. But they possess one great advantage: They are not spurious, intended to appeal to emotions through eye and ear with the special techniques of producers who obviously must wonder as they work whether they can get by with this one.

The determination of relatively low-ranking GOP staff members to continue the production of visual-audio fakes is a new thing in our country's politics—and it is reprehensible. The GOP should be content to win on the issues—or lose.

As We See It:

West German Unions Seeking Stronger Rank-and-File Ties

GERMAN TRADE UNIONS, which negotiate overall industrial contracts on a national or regional level, are now seeking means of getting closer to the individual member, Hermann Bremer, labor attache for the West German Embassy in Washington, reported in an interview on the AFL-CIO public service program, As We See It, heard on the ABC national radio network.

Traditionally, grievances and other problems of workers have been taken care of by works councils, which represent all the workers in a plant, regardless of union membership. In addition, Bremer explained, many companies make agreements supplementary to the national or regional contract.

"Works councils of a large company are rather powerful and sometimes their intentions and interests run counter to the intentions and interests of the union," Bremer declared. He added that attempts are being made "to over-bridge a certain gap, which has developed between the union and the rank and file and the works council, by getting closer in the company.

"One of these means is the supplementary collective bargaining agreement, and another is that union representatives collect union dues and distribute union papers at the same time. This seeks not only to bring unions closer to the rank and file, but at the same time makes it easier for the union and the works council to understand each other and work out their problems, should there be any."

BREMER EXPLAINED codetermination, which gives trade unionists the right to sit on company boards of directors, by calling it "comanagement . . . an attempt to make the worker an equal citizen not only politically, but also economically."

"The economic angle stems from the experiences of the labor movement before and during the Nazi period. The overwhelming economic power of certain economic giants, which threw their weight behind Hitler, was one of the reasons Hitler was able to preserve power."

The West German labor attache recalled that American labor helped the German workers set up a free trade union movement after World War II, sending several men to Germany to work with the American Military Government.

CHALLENGE of Russian seapower is the greatest the U.S. has ever experienced, Vice Adm. John S. McCain (right), Eastern Sea Frontier commander, told the convention of the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers in Miami Beach. He was congratulated on his address by (from left) Under-Sec. of Labor John F. Henning, IUMSWA Vice Pres. Andrew A. Pettis and Pres. John J. Grogan.

Fall Decline in Livestock Prices Slow to Reach Supermarkets

By Sidney Margolius

YOU WON'T HAVE to pay more again for food this month, but you won't be able to save much on this year's record-high eating bills.

While meat supplies are increasing seasonally and livestock prices have declined, retailers are cutting their prices slowly. There seems little doubt that stores and wholesalers are taking advantage of the supply and price situation.

Some stores are reducing prices more reluctantly than others. One phenomenon that became noticeable as this writer compared prices in several cities with a year ago is that there is a bigger variation in meat prices this year than last.

While the variation among stores usually may be 8 to 16 cents a pound on various cuts, this year you can find some stores charging as much as 16-20 cents more for the same cuts. This is especially true of pork cuts. Pork supplies are larger than a year ago. But some stores are reducing prices only very slowly.

For example, smoked shoulder: While the usual spread among stores is only about 6 cents a pound, this year we found as much as 14 cents. In our survey, prices ranged from as little as 45 cents a pound to as much as 59 cents.

Boneless beef stew usually may vary 10 cents among different stores. This year's variation is as much as 20 cents in some cities, with some stores charging as little as 79 cents, others as much as 99 cents. For boneless chuck, the more usual variation of 16 cents a pound—itself a big spread—now has become as much as 24 cents, with stores charging anywhere from 63 to 87 cents a pound. Even the more usual spread of 8 cents on hamburger has widened to a dime.

What this means is that you do need to do more comparison shopping and rely on specials. Shoe leather is still cheaper than meat. Supermarkets are doing more price juggling than ever.

When you shop for your Thanksgiving turkey you also may notice this wider variation in prices. There seems no question but that some distributors are holding up their prices (and the public) for turkey and poultry this year. Despite the record-breaking production of turkeys—11 percent greater than even last year's huge crop—prices so far are as high or higher than last fall, especially for the medium-size birds. The variation among stores is greater, too—as much as 16 cents a pound compared to the more usual 10 cents.

The best buys this year are the large turkeys over 16 pounds. Not only do they cost less per pound than the smaller birds, but they also yield more meat per pound.

In broilers and eggs supplies are larger than last year but prices still are higher. The variation among stores is greater on poultry than any other item. Some stores are charging as little as 30 cents for broilers and 49 cents for roasters; others, as much as 49 cents and 69 cents.

You can hold down your own costs to some extent, and also help beat down some of the highest prices, by shopping more stores, and very selectively. Some stores are charging up to 20 cents a pound more than others for sliced bacon; 12 cents more for cooked ham; 20 cents more for rib roast, and even 30 cents more for round steak.

CLOTHING PRICES: November is a good month to shop for women's and children's coats, with Veterans Day sales offering reduced prices.

Any man expecting to buy a suit also should take advantage of the November sales. You will save two ways—because of the sale reduction, and because men's suits are scheduled for another price increase this coming year.

But there's good news in clothing too. Prices of polyester fibers widely used in permanent-press and wash-and-wear garments have been reduced. This means even better values in the increasingly-popular permanent-press shirts, girls' blouses, boys' and men's slacks, work clothes, and women's dresses.

We nominate as the buy of the month the permanent-press blouse slips for schoolgirls now available in the simpler styles for as little as $3. They are wrinkle free and can be washed and dried with little or no ironing.

CAR PRICES: The new models are out, with price increases averaging $56 to $68. Manufacturers attributed the boosts to the new safety features. But the Auto Workers union has called the increases exaggerated. The companies based their increases on what the safety items would cost as optional equipment. But installing them as original equipment by mass production costs much less.

Our Magazines Can't Be Read, But They're Filled with Surprises

By Jane Goodsell

MAGAZINES are no longer fit to be read. I guess that's not very important because they're perfectly wonderful in so many other ways.

Who can say what surprises lurk between its covers? Indeed, the cover itself may have a trick up its sleeve and astonish you by unfolding to double—or even triple—size. What will the next page turn out to be? Paper towelling, perhaps? Brown butcher paper? Yellow waffle-weave? Will it pull out to become a double-page advertisement for hair coloring? Or a triple-page spread of 1967 cars?

What to your wondering eyes will appear next? A perforated postcard offering a 10-day free trial examination of a $5.95 book of famous dog stories? A pullout booklet of holiday cookie recipes? A detachable cardboard coupon offering 7 cents off a pound of margarine? A clip-out coupon to be filled in and mailed in order to get a free pamphlet on health insurance?

Yet, fun and exciting as all these surprises are, they do pose problems for anyone foolhardy enough to try to read a magazine. The multiple fold-out pages refuse to stay folded in. They wrap themselves around the magazine like burial shrouds so that it's impossible to turn the pages.

Due to some scientific phenomenon (gravity? pressure? survival of the fittest?) a magazine naturally prefers to open itself to an insert page. Unless you use brute force to hold the magazine open where you want it or, alternatively, weight it down with a heavy object, it will flip itself to where it wants to open.

THERE YOU ARE, reading the second page of a spy story on page 27 and, the next thing you know, you're staring at a cardboard coupon offering 5 cents off a box of detergent, inserted between pages 236 and 237.

After losing your place for the fifth time in 10 minutes, you will probably be ready to accept defeat philosophically and admit that the magazine is stronger-willed than you are.

If you don't feel philosophic, you can rip the magazine to shreds with your bare hands. You'll not only feel better, but you'll end up with a big pile of pretty, home-made confetti.

What America Does In An Average Day

A PICTURE of the average American emerges from findings in a national survey of 2,122 persons conducted by the Survey Research Center of the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research.

SRC Program Dir. Philip E. Converse notes that on an average weekday, an employed man spends about eight hours actually working, plus another three-quarters of an hour on work breaks. He requires about 20 minutes to get to work if he drives, but 40 minutes if he takes bus or subway. Work-related activities thus take up 9.2 hours.

Housewives, on the other hand, spend 5.5 hours on housework—divided into 30 percent cooking and dishes, 40 percent cleaning house, 25 percent laundry, and 5 percent other household tasks. On Sunday, the housewife spends far less time cleaning house and does almost no laundry, but still spends an hour and a half preparing meals.

The employed woman, because of her double duties, spends one hour less at work than the employed man and two hours less on housework than the housewife. The working woman is probably unmarried, or if she is married, has no children under 18.

The married man spends about 15 minutes a day fixing things around the house and 10 minutes a day helping his wife with the housework. Apparently this is adequate for most housewives, Converse points out. Only one wife in four expressed a desire to have her husband help her more with the housework.

The average person gets about 7.6 hours of sleep a night, in addition to 20 minutes rest during the day. Sleeping time goes up an hour on Sunday for men and employed women, but stays the same for housewives. Time on personal care (washing, dressing, etc.), is 60 minutes for men, 72 minutes for married women, and 90 minutes for single women.

HOUSEWIVES have one hour more free time every day than their husbands and almost two hours more than employed women. Free time is divided equally between mass media (radio, TV, reading) and other leisure pursuits such as social life, hobbies, and amusements.

Television time averaged between two and 2.5 hours a day for over 90 percent of Americans who own a TV set—much of it done as a "secondary" activity, especially in the case of housewives. Evening dramatic series, variety-comedy programs, and movies appeared to be the most popular types of TV shows, taking up over two-thirds of viewing time.

Various other leisure pursuits such as hobbies, sewing and writing letters took an average of 33 minutes a day.

Religious activity totaled 10 minutes per day across all days of the week. On a typical Sunday 43 percent of Americans go to church and spend 75 minutes in worship. Women and older men, who attend church most regularly, said they derived greatest satisfaction from religion.

Edelman Cites Opposition:

Senior Citizens Rally For Fight on Benefits

Bridgeport, Conn.—Senior citizens were urged to press for meaningful increases in social security benefits using the same means that proved effective in winning the fight for medicare—"demonstrations, letters, petitions, telegrams, phone calls and visits" to congressmen.

Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens told the annual convention of the affiliated Connecticut Council of Senior Citizens that the elderly are "absolutely ready" for the fight, but warned "the conservative forces in Congress are rallying their traditional opposition to proposed increases in social security."

"Unless the older people themselves take an active role in this fight—just as they did in the fight for medicare—the elderly are not going to win an adequate social security increase from Congress next year," he declared.

Already, Edelman went on, there is "abundant evidence" that powerful business interests are aligning themselves with the conservative to suggest that the cost of the war in Viet Nam or the threat of inflation is enough to delay "our long overdue major increase" in benefits.

Delay Held Unjustified

"There is absolutely no justification for this great nation to delay any further giving our elderly an income which will keep them out of the mire of poverty," he declared. "But Congress is not going to do anything for the elderly unless they hear about the need from the elderly themselves."

Edelman noted that the social security program will have been in operation for 30 years by the end of 1966 and that the time has come for Congress to consider "major substantive changes—a serious overhaul of the system to insure that the nation's elderly get their needed share of improved living standards."

He warmly commended the six-man Democratic Connecticut congressional delegation as "friends of the elderly," and added:

"Even though these men are your friends they should be given ammunition by you—letters which tell about the desperate needs of the elderly. They need evidence to show to their colleagues that the voice of our senior citizens is being hear throughout the land. . . .

"Support the increases in social security which have been suggested by the National Council of Senior Citizens—a minimum of $150 a month for a single person and $250 for couples. Let us demand that Congress face squarely up to the issue with a complete overhaul of the system—no more patchwork."

Edelman charged that the elderly poor "seem to be too invisible" to members of Congress and federal anti-poverty officials. The elderly have been "utterly ignored" in the anti-poverty programs, he declared. Seniors support programs to "change the cycle of poverty" among youths, he said, "but we cannot stand idly by when the elderly poor are being ignored altogether."

AMONG THE THOUSANDS who gathered at Dulles Airport on a rainy night to welcome Pres. Johnson back to Washington after his Far East tour were AFL-CIO Pres. # Job Security Basic Contract Issue In Highly-Automated Oil Refining

There aren't many young men working in the oil industry these days.

Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers says that most of the 85,000 oil workers represented by his union are over 45. They're the survivors of the technological revolution which automated the nation's oil refineries—and displaced thousands of low-seniority younger workers in the past decade.

Unlike other major industries, the big oil producers insist on plant-by-plant negotiations even though in practice a key settlement covering one of the larger units develops into an industry pattern. Contracts covering some 60,000 OCAW members are being negotiated against a Dec. 31 deadline.

Grospiron doesn't think that wages will be a major stumbling block to agreements. The oil industry is one of the nation's most profitable, its unit labor costs have been going steadily down, and the union's pay proposals are easily within the range of current contract settlements elsewhere.

The OCAW demands, drawn up last spring by its rank-and-file oil bargaining policy committee, call for 18 cents an hour in each of the next two years, with 6 cents of the first-year raise applied to a better health insurance program. It also asks higher shift differentials.

End of Inequity Sought

Another major demand is elimination of what the union terms "wage, retirement age, vacation inequities" resulting from 1964 negotiations. In this bargaining round, some companies provided optional retirement at 62 instead of 65 with no actuarial reduction in pensions; others raised wages 2 percent and granted longer vacations.

The union wants to restore uniformity by extending the early retirement feature to contracts lacking it and applying the wage hike and longer vacations to workers who already have early retirement.

The OCAW's No. 1 goal, however, is expressed in this language:

"We propose that each contract provide that all present regular and permanent employes be guaranteed continued employment at present or higher status until retirement on adequate pension."

And that's where the significance of the "middle-aged"-and-over employment pattern comes in.

The men who have survived the automation of oil refineries have spent most of their working lives in a highly-specialized industry and their skills are not easily shifted to other fields. Add to that the extreme difficulty of finding employment at good pay at the age of 50 or 55, and it is easy to see why strong job security has emerged as a major issue in contract negotiations.

Grospiron points out that the union's proposals are modest in many ways. Companies would not be required to fill jobs left open by voluntary quits or retirement. They would be permitted to transfer workers by mutual agreement.

The OCAW is concerned especially with the likelihood of refineries and other plants being closed down and work shifted to more centralized operations, Grospiron stresses. OCAW negotiators want to make sure that in such cases workers will have the right to move with their jobs, unless other satisfactory arrangements are worked out.

It may develop otherwise, but OCAW officials see the job security issue as the crux of negotiations—determining whether for the first time since 1952 a large segment of the industry will have to strike or whether the "over 45s" who have seen jobs vanish year by year can look at their own future with some assurance.

Political Rights Urged For Public Employes

Detroit—The executive board of the State, County & Municipal Employes was called for removal of all restrictions that deny public employes the right to full voluntary participation in the American political process.

The board hailed congressional action setting up a review of the Hatch Act, which restricts political activity by federal employes, and voiced the hope "that this review will result in meaningful action to remove these barriers to first-class citizenship."

Statutes such as the Hatch Act, said the board, hold public employes as hostages of a "half-hearted legalistic approach" alleged to protect them from spoils systems.

Since the Hatch Act was adopted by Congress in 1939, the board noted, there has been an achievement of political maturity at many levels of government which has removed many of the excesses that gave birth to the federal law and related statutes in state and local government.

The board said the union will continue its efforts in courts and legislatures to invalidate or repeal such measures in all levels of government.

The union will also seek a requirement that public employes working on projects financed in whole or part by federal funds be accorded at least those bargaining rights established in Executive Order 10988 that brought collective bargaining to federal employes.

The executive board pointed out that federal grants-in-aid have resulted in giant strides in the areas of education, medical aid, pollution control, the creation of jobs and other progressive measures. They have come about largely because the states have had to raise their operations to reflect reasonable minimum standards, and labor relations should follow suit, the resolution said.

The union will continue to work for the enactment of new bargaining laws covering public employes where none now exist, the board declared.

Mothers Leave Relief Rolls as Children Grow

Mothers who go on relief receive public assistance for an average of three years and as their children get older tend to join the labor force, U. S. Commissioner of Welfare Ellen Winston said in commenting on standards of determining the feasibility of employment for needy mothers.

Mothers who look to public assistance instead of employment "are mainly women who have no other choice," she pointed out, adding that all states require legal and other efforts to get support from the fathers of the children.

The criteria, which have been sent to state public welfare departments by the Welfare Administration, note that mothers should "not necessarily" take jobs rather than go on welfare. Even with training some mothers could not qualify for jobs that would pay enough to support their children.

TV Commercial Dispute Draws SAG Strike Poll

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild is taking a nationwide vote among its 17,000 members to authorize a strike against advertising agencies, advertisers, television networks and other producers of television commercials.

Deadline for the return of ballots is noon on Nov. 15—just 12 hours before the current three-year contract expires.

A walkout, the SAG noted, would not affect the production of theatrical feature films or TV entertainment pictures.

In a letter accompanying the strike ballots, the SAG board of directors said that despite the "enormous growth of the TV advertising industry, negotiators for the employers not only have refused the union's demand for "reasonable increases" and "adjustment of inequities," but have denounced present minimums as "too high" and are demanding that they be "substantially rolled back."

SAG Pres. Charlton Heston, who signed the letter, pointed out that TV network income has increased 40 percent during the life of the contract, and has jumped "an unbelievable 131.5 percent over the past 10 years."

"It is apparent," the letter said, "that they simply feel we should move backwards to further facilitate their forward movement."

Heston warned that if the TV advertisers can cut wages, "all actors' salaries would be rolled back in short order."

The SAG is seeking an increase from $105 to $125 a day for acting in a TV commercial, plus additional fees for use and re-use of the films.

The SAG constitution requires approval by 75 percent of the vote cast before the board can call a walkout. The union struck against commercial film makers for more than two months in 1952.

The Television & Radio Artists (AFTRA), which also is in negotiations with the TV commercial producers, has announced it will seek strike authorization on Nov. 6. Its contract also expires Nov. 15.

SAG Re-Elects Charlton Heston

Hollywood, Calif. — Charlton Heston has been re-elected to a second term as president of the Screen Actors Guild, the union announced.

The entire slate proposed by the official nominating committee was elected without opposition, returns showed.

Other officers chosen were Macdonald Carey, Whit Bissell, Ricardo Montalban and Ron Rawson, vice presidents; Marie Windsor, recording secretary, and Gilbert Perkins, treasurer.

Meany Spurs Drive To Get Out the Vote

There are 48 freshman members of the House, elected in the Johnson landslide of 1964, whose presence in the 89th Congress strengthened liberal causes and furnished the balance of power for passage of major Great Society programs.

Another calculation lists liberal members of the House, of both parties, who are considered to be "in danger" of defeat Nov. 8 because they won election two years ago by the classic definition of "55 percent or less."

In some congressional districts the elections are always "classic," because they are so evenly divided that the winning candidate almost never gets as much as 55 percent of the total vote. They are the districts in which the two major parties, every two years, wage war most vigorously.

These districts are in such states as Ohio, in which Republicans gathered in 49.4 percent of the total congressional vote in 1964 while handing Lyndon B. Johnson a whopping million-plus plurality over the GOP presidential nominee, Barry Goldwater; and Montana, where the Republican candidates for the House collected an actual 50.7 majority of the congressional vote while Johnson carried the state with 50.9 percent of the electorate; and North Dakota, where in 1964, 50.1 percent of the total vote went to Republican congressional nominees while Johnson won 58 percent for the presidency.

Four States to Watch

There are four states to watch particularly on Nov. 8 because they involve nationally celebrated names and presumably will have influence in the 1968 party conventions. They are:

New York—Two-term Republican Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller is seeking a new lease on the statehouse—and a renewed influence on the Republican Party — against Democratic nominee Frank D. O'Connor. The Liberal Party nominee, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., presumably will take some votes from O'Connor but also some from Rockefeller. The Conservative Party's nominee, Paul L. Adams, presumably will take most of his votes from Rockefeller.

Michigan — Gov. George W. Romney, Republican, is running for a third term against Democratic nominee Zoltan A. Ferency, the party's state chairman. Actively anxious for the GOP 1968 presidential nomination, Romney wants to win "big," hoping that his coattails will help pull in GOP Sen. Robert P. Griffin, running against the six-time Democratic governor, G. Mennen Williams, who is trying a political comeback in his home state after six years in the State Dept.

Illinois—The lion of the liberals, Democratic Sen. Paul H. Douglas, is faced with the hardest race of his life against his Republican challenger, onetime business executive Charles H. Percy. Percy is exploiting the difference in ages (47 for him, 74 for Douglas) to imply that the 70-year-old GOP Sen. Everett McKinley Dirksen, who has been ailing a good deal more than Douglas, "needs" another Illinois Republican in Washington to help service the state.

California — Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, seeking a third term, is under severe pressure from his Republican opponent, Ronald Reagan—TV star, onetime Democratic liberal, onetime Goldwater Republican and star speaker at dozens of GOP clambakes in 1965.

INTER-AMERICAN Federation of Textile & Garment Workers, made up of unions in the Western Hemisphere, was organized at a meeting (general view at right) in the Inter-American Labor College of the Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers at Cuernavaca, Mexico. Vice Pres. Charles Zimmerman (left) of the Ladies' Garment Workers and Presidents William Pollock of the Textile Workers Union of America and George Baldanzi of the United Textile Workers were elected to the executive committee.

Move to Hike Interest Hit In Virginia

Richmond, Va.—Inflated interest rates would do more to hamper home-building than a temporary "tight-money" market, the Virginia State AFL-CIO contended at a public hearing here.

Sec.-Treas. Brewster Snow, representing labor at public hearings called by a special state study commission on money and interest, was one of the few witnesses who opposed raising the ceiling on mortgage interest from 6 to 8 percent and objected to proposals for a special legislative session for that purpose.

The higher legal ceiling has been sought by real estate interests and savings and loan associations which claim that needed mortgage money would flow into the state if interest rates were higher.

Snow pointed out that various charges and "points" levied by lending institutions already bring a return well above the 6 percent ceiling. He stressed that while the money market is temporarily tight, the higher debt that buyers would incur if interest rates were raised would burden them for years to come.

"If we want to throw a real deterrent into the home building market," Snow said, "an inflation of financing costs can eventually accomplish that end. The result can be low volume, high cost housing."

Opposing a "stampede toward inflation in the cost of home buying," Snow predicted action at the federal level to make mortgage money available and said: "It would be shameful if residents of Virginia were to become obligated for huge interest costs . . . too few of our people can afford to sacrifice that extra amount."

Textile, Garment Unions Form Hemisphere Unit

called for the establishment of special training courses for organizers and directed the officers of the new trade secretariat "to mobilize all possible support and available resources" to assist in organizing.

In other resolutions the founding convention agreed:

- That in each country the affiliates would seek to mobilize public opinion, governments and parliaments behind a drive for "national minimum wages that guarantee a decent standard of living," with pay floors set for various branches of the textile and garment industries.
- To seek equalization of social benefits between countries.
- To strive for representation of textile and garment workers in all governmental and inter-governmental agencies dealing with the planning and execution of economic development and integration programs.
- That the executive committee, aided by experts, make a study of the technical and economic development of the textile and garment industries throughout the hemisphere with the view of making recommendations that would "protect, strengthen and raise the economic status" of the workers.

In the constitution the delegates spelled out the federation's objectives as:

- Promotion of fraternal cooperation and the spirit of brotherhood among workers in the industries regardless of country.
- Establishment, promotion and maintenance of free democratic trade unions and their unification into a "strong and unbreakable organization."
- Protecting and improving the economic, social and cultural interests of the workers, improving their living standards and working conditions and safeguarding the dignity of individual workers.
- Supporting all national or international action against economic exploitation and political oppression tending to curtail trade union freedom.
- Obtaining the greatest possible protection of workers in the industries against occupational hazards.

Other countries represented at the meeting were Brazil, Bolivia, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Guatemala, Honduras, and Uruguay. Mexico was represented by a group of fraternal delegates, and George Dearing of England was present on behalf of the Intl. Federation of Textile & Garment Workers, the ICFTU-associated world trade secretariat.

The U.S. delegation in addition to Pollock, Baldanzi and Zimmerman included Sec.-Treas. Francis Schaufenbil of the UTW, Vice Pres. Sol Stetin of the TWUA and Saby Nehama, Spanish activities director of ILGWU Local 22, New York.

Building Trades Warn Of Tight Money Crisis

nation's plight on action of the Federal Reserve Board in September 1965 raising the discount rate from 4 to 4.5 percent and boosting the permissable top interest rate on certificates of deposit to 5.5 percent.

The effect, it declared, was "to start an interest spiral throughout every segment of our economy from the cost of the federal debt to the operation of the smallest retail establishment."

"The construction industry, particularly the home building field, has already seriously felt the impact of the drying up of the money supply," the statement said. "Residential housing starts in September 1966 were off on an annual average by 400,000 (about 35 percent) from September 1965—an annual rate of 1,070,000 as contrasted to 1,435,000 starts in 1965. . . .

"This chaotic condition has developed in less than a year. Much of the housing construction listed as statistical starts was planned and funded well in advance of the FRB action. Cancellation of plans and lack of financing should make this picture more bleak in the building season of 1967."

An indication of the effect of tight money on jobs was given in the September employment figures of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics, which showed a "slightly more" than seasonal drop of 116,000 in contract construction employment. The drop was attributed to "the slowdown in private residential construction."

That the drop in homebuilding is playing a serious role in the economy generally was acknowledged by Chairman Gardner Ackley of Pres. Johnson's Council of Economic Advisers. In an address before the National Industrial Conference Board on "Business in 1967," Ackley said:

'Outstanding Soft Spot'

"New homebuilding emerged as the one outstanding soft spot in the economy during the summer months, and it fell sharply enough to restrain the over-all pace of activity significantly. . . . The dollar value of homebuilding activity declined by about $3 billion through August. This nosedive obviously reflected the severe impact of tight mortgage credit."

A nationwide check made by the Associated Press in early October showed that construction of new houses across the country was off sharply and that "homebuilding has all but been shattered by tight money".

Real estate dealers from as widely separated areas as California and New England reported that the tight money market had slowed their business down to a walk. "Money just plain isn't available," one mortgage and loan officer was quoted as saying. "I'm just sitting here twiddling my thumbs."

The BCTD executive council at its meeting elected Pres. Thomas F. Murphy of the Bricklayers as 10th vice president. He succeeds his predecessor in the international union—John Murphy, who resigned.

Retiree Program Set by ILGWU

New York—Establishment of a new program for "cultural enrichment in retirement" to be directed by Honorary Pres. David Dubinsky has been announced by the Ladies' Garment Workers.

The program will be divided into three phases—cultural, recreational and counseling services for retired members; help to retirees in cutting through red tape to utilize the services of social security, medicare and similar programs; and specially-arranged, low-cost theater parties, concerts and neighborhood entertainment for retirees.

Zalman Lichtenstein, one-time city councilman in Warsaw who was rescued in 1940 and brought to this country, was named to develop the programs.

BSEIU Unit Plans Center for Elders

Syracuse, N.Y.—A $1.73 million senior citizens housing loan has been approved for the Building Service Employes Senior Citizens Center to construct a 13-story building here, especially designed for the elderly. It will contain 250 living units.

Top Officers Re-Elected by ClothingUnion

New York—Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky, Sec.-Treas. Frank Rosenblum and 19 vice presidents were re-elected to new two-year terms in a nationwide referendum among members of the Clothing Workers.

Six new vice presidents also were elected—including Thomas R. Marsella, manager of the union's Kentuckiana Joint Board, who died while the balloting was in progress.

The new vice presidents are Sol Brandzel and Val Wertheimer, who have been serving as assistant secretary-treasurers; Howard D. Samuel, assistant president since 1960; Anthony Cortigene, who was elected manager of the Philadelphia Joint Board upon the death of the late Vice Pres. Thomas Di Lauro last winter, and William C. Hall, manager of the Southwest Regional Joint Board since its establishment in 1965.

Brandzel represents the second generation of union activity in his family. His father, the late Beny Brandzel, was an ACWA pioneer who participated in the 1910 Hart, Schaffner & Marks strike in Chicago.

Vote Revives Party From '64 Disaster

By Willard Shelton

Pres. Johnson faced a clear threat of stiffened resistance to his domestic social and reform programs in the 90th Congress as the Republican Party bounced back in the Nov. 8 elections with remarkable vigor from its 1964 disaster.

The GOP emerged with a net gain of 47 members in the House, 3 in the Senate and 8 governorships, substantially beyond advance estimates of most observers.

The Republican gains in the House represented a major loss in liberal strength, including some of the freshman Democrats elected in the crushing victory scored by Johnson over then-Sen. Barry Goldwater of Arizona in 1964.

There were other Democratic losses—among experienced southern, Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain House members with a general record of backing Administration programs—and the GOP picked up scattered new districts resulting from reapportionment within such states as Ohio and Kentucky.

Liberal losses in the Senate appeared to be more limited despite the three-seat GOP pick-up, since the Republican newcomers are generally regarded as modern-minded and moderate.

Control of both the House and Senate remains with the Democrats for the 90th Congress. The new House lineup is 248 Democrats and 187 Republicans. The Senate will be split 64 Democrats, 36 Republicans.

The GOP nevertheless clearly looked forward with more hope to the 1968 presidential year.

One bright spot for the Democrats was success in re-electing 24 of 44 freshman members of the House, who often furnished the balance of power in passage of major legislation and who had replaced Republicans two years ago.

This trend was particularly observable in the Northeast, including all seven in New York, two in New England, two in New Jersey, one in Pennsylvania, and on the West Coast, including two in California and all four in Washington. There were also three in Indiana and Iowa, one in Colorado and two in Texas.

The President, commenting on election results from his ranch in Texas, acknowledged it would be more difficult in the new Congress to obtain approval of "new legislation" on domestic affairs but emphasized that he anticipated no change in "our course of action in obvious security matters."

Democrats Keep Firm Hold Despite GOP Senate Pickup

By David L. Perlman

The Senate remains solidly Democratic and generally liberal despite Republican election gains.

With 35 of the 100 seats at stake, Republicans won 18 for a gain of three. In effect it was a four-seat pickup since the Michigan Senate seat had been filled by a Republican only since last May when Robert P. Griffin was appointed to fill the vacancy left by the death of Democrat Pat McNamara.

The full Senate will have a 64-36 Democratic majority and the newly-elected Republicans are considered middle-of-the-roaders, as a group more liberal than the GOP congressional mainstream.

While the legislative outlook in the Senate is not significantly changed by the election, the ballot results were nevertheless a political setback for the Democrats. They had hoped to unseat at least two conservative Republicans, and possibly a third. The GOP retained all its Senate seats.

Missing from the 90th Congress will be the senior senator from Illinois, Democrat Paul H. Douglas, who at the age of 74 lost out in his bid for a fourth term.

To admirers throughout the nation, Douglas was a giant of the Senate, a voice of liberalism and of a fierce, uncompromising conscience. His defeat by a former student, 47-year-old Charles H. Percy, was not unexpected. Polls and predictions had agreed that age, a white "backlash" in some Democratic strongholds, and sympathy for the tragic murder of Percy's daughter forecast a victory for the Republican. But admirers of Douglas had clung to the hope that Illinois voters would not turn their backs on the veteran senator.

Oregon's popular young Republican governor, Mark Hatfield, had been an early favorite to win the Senate seat vacated by the retirement of Democrat Maurine B. Neuberger. His Democratic opponent, Rep. Robert B. Duncan, came up strongly during the summer campaigning by advocating strong support for American policy in Viet Nam and putting Hatfield on the

10 Shifts to Republicans Mark Governor Races

By Gervase N. Love

Republican gubernatorial candidates captured 10 state houses held by Democrats in this week's balloting, and hung on to another dozen the party already occupied.

In only two states—Maine and Kansas—were Democrats able to turn out GOP incumbents. In nine states they retained governorships they had held.

In Georgia, things were still up in the air as the AFL-CIO News went to press. Former Gov. Ellis Arnall, liberal Democrat, polled enough write-in votes to throw the contest into the courts and perhaps the legislature.

Neither of the party candidates —Democrat Lester G. Maddox and Republican Rep. Howard H. Callaway, both segregationists, was able to pile up more than 50 percent of the votes cast, which Georgia law requires for a winner.

The situation was further complicated by a suit filed by the American Civil Liberties Union challenging the right of the legislature to act in the impasse on the ground that it is not properly constituted on a one man-one vote basis.

When the victors take office, the

House Liberal Forces Suffer Sharp Cutback

There will be fewer liberals and more conservatives in the new House of Representatives. But the balance of power on legislative issues rests with House members who sought to project a moderate image in the election campaign—advocating progress but at a slower pace than the past two years.

Republicans made a net gain of 47 seats. They captured 52 House seats held by Democrats, a turn to the right since most of the GOP winners were more conservative than the congressmen they replaced. Conservative southern Democrats replaced four conservative southern Republicans and one liberal Maine Democrat took a seat which had been held by a liberal Republican who did not seek re-election.

The party breakdown for the 90th Congress leaves the Democrats in firm control of the House, with is the lowest in 10 years and the combination of the conservative minority of Democrats and the conservative majority of Republicans outnumbers the consistent liberals of both parties who won election.

The key to effective control of the new House appears to rest on whether Republicans who campaigned as middle-of-the-roaders choose to become part of the bipartisan conservative coalition that ruled the House for most of the years between the New Deal era and the Johnson landslide of 1964.

GOP Challenge Grows In Once-Solid South

Traditions continued to crack and crumble in the once Solid South as the issue of segregation and a strong Republican challenge highlighted elections in the region.

The Republicans could count among their surprising gains a sizable increase of 9 House seats to a total of 28, the pickup of their third Senate seat, the capture of two governors' chairs and widespread advances in state legislatures.

These were the most noteworthy results:

● In Alabama, Mrs. Lurleen Wallace became the state's first woman governor. She was elected as the Democratic candidate with the recognition she would be a figurehead while her husband, outgoing Gov. George Wallace, runs the state and prepares for his 1968 presidential campaign against, as he puts it, "socialist, communist, beatnik ways."

Lucius Amerson, who served as a paratrooper in the Korean War, easily beat two white opponents in Macon County to become the first Negro sheriff in Alabama since the Reconstruction period.

● In Arkansas, Winthrop Rockefeller became the first Republican governor since Reconstruction. He defeated Democrat James D. Johnson, a fiery segregationist and a founder of the state's White Citizens Council.

● In Florida, investment banker Claude Kirk, a Republican, defeated Miami Mayor Robert King High for the governorship, the first member of his party to win election to the post since 1872. Kirk ran an anti-civil rights and anti-Great Society campaign and had the tacit support of incumbent Gov. Haydon Burns, who had lost to High in the Democratic primary.

● In Tennessee, 40-year-old lawyer Howard Baker beat Democratic Gov. Frank Clement in the Senate race and became the first Republican elected to the Senate by popular vote in this state.

● In Georgia, a gubernatorial race turning mainly on who was most segregationist remained undecided, with millionaire Republican Howard (Bo) Callaway holding a narrow lead over Lester G. Maddox. A write-in vote for moderate Ellis Arnall, who was upset by Maddox in the Democratic primary, denied a clear majority to either of the main contenders.

ACLU Sues

The American Civil Liberties Union filed suit in federal court to prevent the Georgia legislature from deciding the governor's race until it is reapportioned. The state constitution now allows the General Assembly to settle the issue if the winning candidate fails to secure a constitutional majority or over 50 percent of the votes.

In South Carolina, Democrats beat back the first major GOP challenge in this century. Gov. Robert E. McNair was reelected and former Gov. Ernest Hollings won a two-year Senate vacancy left by the death of Sen. Olin Johnston. Sen. Strom Thurmond and Rep. Albert Watson, both running for their first full terms as Republicans after bolting the Democratic Party, were reelected.

The Republicans also mounted a challenge in Mississippi, but Sen. James Eastland won a fifth term easily and aided five Democrats to victory in congressional races.

In Virginia, Democratic Sen. Harry F. Byrd, Jr., was elected to complete the term of his late father, surviving strains which had developed in the long-entrenched Byrd machine. In the second Senate race, William B. Spong, a young moderate Democrat, was elected overwhelmingly to the seat of the conservative he upset in the primary, Sen. A. Willis Robertson.

In Texas, Republican Sen. John Tower won reelection while pulling in two Republican congressmen with him. Gov. John Connally won reelection easily as did most other Democrats, an exception being the first Republican to become a state senator in modern Texas history.

● Gov. George W. Romney won a third term in Michigan—a four-year term during which he can seek the GOP presidential nomination in 1968 without surrendering his home-state power base.

● Six-term former Democratic Gov. G. Mennen Williams of Michigan lost a political comeback bid when he was defeated for the Senate by incumbent Sen. Robert P. Griffin, a Romney appointee, and five Democrats elected as freshmen in the Lyndon B. Johnson landslide victory of 1964 were beaten.

● The liberal incumbent Democratic Sen. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois, for 18 years the "conscience" of the Senate, was beaten by a Republican rising power, Charles W. Percy, Chicago industrialist.

● Republican Gov. James A. Rhodes won a smashing re-election victory over Frazier Reams, Jr., in Ohio, four incumbent Democratic House members were defeated for second terms, and the GOP picked up a new district. Among the GOP House winners was Robert Taft, Jr., of Cincinnati, who scored in a close, tense race against Rep. John J. Gilligan, one of the bright stars of the 1964 Democratic freshmen. Taft had given up a House seat two years ago for an unsuccessful bid to move into the Senate against the Democratic incumbent, Stephen M. Young.

● Democratic incumbent Gov. Harold E. Hughes of Iowa was elected to a third term but four of the five Democratic House members chosen in 1964 were beaten.

● The two parties swapped governorships in two states. Gov. Karl Rolvaag, Democrat, was defeated by Republican Harold E. LeVander in Minnesota, while Democrat Robert Docking, son of a former governor, won over incumbent Republican William H. Avery in Kansas.

Midwest Gains

Voters gave Republicans in the Midwest a gain of 21 House seats—5 in Michigan, 5 in Ohio, 4 in Iowa, 2 in Wisconsin, 1 each in Minnesota, Indiana, Illinois, North Dakota and Nebraska.

If Tennessee, Kentucky and Oklahoma—often midwestern in voting patterns—are added to the tally, the GOP gain reached 25 seats.

Republicans won two new seats in the Senate with Percy in Illinois and Howard Baker over Democratic Gov. Frank Clement, who had beaten incumbent Sen. Ross Bass in a party primary, in Tennessee.

In the huge 15-state midwestern and border area stretching from the Appalachians to the Rocky Mountains, the Republican recovery from the crushing defeat of 1964 appeared substantial.

The GOP will hold 87 House seats from the region to 54 for the Democrats in the 90th Congress. There were 10 contests for the Senate and no GOP incumbent was defeated. Among Democrats, only incumbent Senators Fred B. Harris of Oklahoma and Walter G. Mondale of Minnesota, appointed to fill the vacancy created when Hubert H. Humphrey became Vice President, survived the Republican surge.

Three-term Democratic Gov. Frank B. Morrison of Nebraska tried for the Senate against the veteran GOP Sen. Carl T. Curtis and was beaten. The Republicans regained the statehouse when Norbert T. Tiemann defeated Democratic Lt. Gov. Philip C. Sorensen.

Republican victors included veteran Sen. John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky, rated as a moderate liberal, as well as Romney and Percy who could be expected to resist another takeover of the party convention by Barry Goldwater-type GOP forces in 1968. Both the Michigan governor and the Illinois senator-elect are considered personally available for national-office nominations.

Republican House gains were scored substantially at the expense of Democratic incumbents who first won in 1964 but included also victries in new districts, such as two in the Louisville area and one in Ohio where Democratic Rep. Robert T. Secrest and Republican Rep. John M. Ashbrook were pitted against each other and Ashbrook won.

Notable Gains Scored:

Midwest, Heartland of GOP, Returns to Party Moorings

The Midwest, for generations the Republican heartland, returned to its GOP moorings Nov. 8.

It is the traditional Taft country—the stronghold from which the late Sen. Robert A. Taft launched three bids for the party's presidential nomination, losing each time but remaining a party power.

Midwestern Republicans traditionally have elected candidates ranging from moderate to ultra-conservative as distinct from right-wing extremists familiar recently in some other areas.

They gave the GOP these notable 1966 victories:

Reagan, Hatfield Score Top Victories on Coast

California's voters turned over the state's governorship to the screen actor and television performer, Ronald Reagan, knocking out of office incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown in the West Coast's most dramatic single election Nov. 8.

Reagan's name was instantly projected—at least by news speculators—into discussion of GOP 1968 presidential potentials, along with those of Gov. George Romney of Michigan, Sen.-elect Charles W. Percy of Illinois and former Vice Pres. Nixon.

Two-term Republican Gov. Mark Hatfield of Oregon won his battle for the Senate seat vacated by the retiring incumbent Democratic Sen. Maurine Neuberger, defeating Democratic Rep. Robert B. Duncan.

Republican gains also were scored in Alaska where the GOP, after years of trying, defeated Democratic Gov. William A. Egan and Rep. Ralph J. Rivers but failed in its challenge to incumbent Sen. E. L. Bartlett. The Republican governor-elect is Walter J. Hickel, a hotelman, and Howard W. Pollack will replace Rivers in the House.

In the five-state Pacific area including Hawaii and Washington, party changes otherwise were few.

Three Democratic House members, all Administration supporters, were swept out in the course of Reagan's big-vote victory in California, but other Democratic liberals were re-elected despite the GOP statewide margin. Duncan's 4th Congressional District seat in Oregon was lost when former Rep. Charles O. Porter failed in a comeback bid.

Washington re-elected all incumbent members of the House, including four 1964 freshman Democrats, in an election showing remarkable voter stability and handing Republican Gov. Dan Evans a total triumph on state and local levels in his battle with right-wingers.

Hawaii also demonstrated voter stability by re-electing Democratic Gov. John A. Burns and both incumbent House members, Representatives Patsy Mink and Spark Matsunaga.

The sun-tanned, glamorous Reagan, once a distinctly liberal Democrat, later a remarkable success as a fund-raiser for Barry Goldwater, scored a Republican victory over Brown that had been beyond the grasp of two formidable GOP professionals — former Vice Pres. Nixon in 1962 and then-Sen. William F. Knowland, his party's floor leader, in 1958.

Brown, unglamorous and plodding but acknowledged to have been an excellent administrator in producing creative answers to California's explosive state problems, found no ground on which he could force Reagan to discuss these problems.

The two-term governor made speeches on expansion of the state's university and state college system, its freeway and highway programs, the growth of its population by 600,000 a year, his determination to allow student "new left" demonstrations to be handled by the University of California Board of Regents.

Reagan on Crime

Reagan touched the raw nerve-ends of other audiences in speeches mentioning city crime rates, suggesting an investigation of the University of California and appealing to the tax-resentful by demanding that the able-bodied be taken off relief and sent out to hunt jobs.

Brown failed in attempts to tag Reagan as a right-wing extremist. The politically-sophisticated public relations firm of Spencer-Roberts produced material in which Reagan appeared as a moderate—declaring that he had "always" supported the "principle" of social security and health security for the aged, although in speeches he assailed "big government" in Sacramento.

Hatfield in Oregon, once considered a virtually sure winner of Mrs. Neuberger's Senate seat, had a scare several months before the election when public opinion polls showed that his attacks on Pres. Johnson's Viet Nam policy had gained him no votes and Duncan, an able, progressive Democrat, directly challenged him on the issue.

Hatfield moderated his comments, claimed credit for Administration efforts for a disengagement in Viet Nam, and broadened his campaign for the Senate by discussing other issues.

Federal Grant Aids Project to Place Disabled

The New York City AFL-CIO has been awarded a grant of $56,185 by the Vocational Rehabilitation Administration to develop a selective placement program for disabled union members and their families.

The grant will help finance the first year of a three-year research project. The central body as sponsor will put up $21,250 as its share of the cost.

Workers referred to the project will be interviewed for information about their disability and, if ready to go to work, will be given immediate help in finding jobs.

Rehabilitation if needed will be provided by the Labor Rehabilitation Liaison Service, another VRA-supported project sponsored by the New York City AFL-CIO. If further placement evaluation is necessary, medical, psychiatric or psychological tests will be arranged with community agencies.

State Union Leaders Sign Up for Seminar

New York—Thirty-five metropolitan area union leaders have enrolled in a 10-week seminar to acquaint them with the State Labor Dept.'s programs and goals.

'Work' Party Routed In Guam Elections

Guam voters threw out the party which rammed a "right-to-work" bill through the legislature in an effort to block the growth of unions in the U. S. island territory.

Pres. Johnson vetoed the "work" law, warning that it would hurt the welfare of Guam's workers and inhibit prosperity.

The island's Democratic Party, which opposes "work" laws, swept all 21 seats in the one-house legislature. The Territorial Party, foe of the union shop, previously had a 13-8 majority.

House Liberal Forces Suffer Cutback

47-Seat GOP Gain Seen Turn to Right

A first test of the strength of the two-party conservatives may come in the opening days of the 90th Congress if an effort is made to abolish the 21-day rule that removed the power of the Rules Committee to keep legislation permanently from the House floor.

Considering the extent of the Republican pickup, the freshman "Class of 1964" elected in the Johnson landslide did not fare too badly, except in the Democratic "disaster areas" of Michigan, Ohio and Iowa.

Of the 44 freshmen who captured Republican seats in 1964 and ran for re-election, 24 won second terms.

All seven Democratic first-termers in New York were re-elected, including some whose 1964 victories were considered major upsets. Across the continent in Washington state, the GOP failed to retake any of the four seats captured by the Democrats two years ago. But the general pattern was a one or two seat GOP gain in states all across the nation.

Liberals Beaten

In the process, some veteran Democratic liberals were upset. Down to defeat went Ralph J. Rivers, Alaska's lone congressman since statehood was achieved, who had a 100 percent COPE record for his four terms. Beaten in Arkansas was James W. Trimble, with the best COPE voting record in his state's congressional delegation. Five-term veteran Harris B. McDowell, Jr., was unseated in Delaware. The most liberal of Virginia congressmen, W. Pat Jennings, was an election casualty.

Although North Carolina's Rep. Harold D. Cooley couldn't be considered a liberal and would be rated a moderate only in southern terms, his defeat ousted a senior member of the House establishment. Cooley, the chairman of the House Agriculture Committee, had served continuously in Congress since 1934.

The GOP wave washed away the beachhead of Democratic liberalism in the Atlanta area. James A. Mackay lost his seat and the Republicans also won the district which had been represented by Rep. Charles L. Weltner, who withdrew as a candidate rather than support the segregationist Lester G. Maddox as his party's gubernatorial candidate.

One new liberal southern Democrat will enter the House. Labor-backed Nick Galifianakis won in North Carolina.

While conservative southern Democrats took back some of the seats lost to Goldwater Republicans two years ago, the only GOP incumbent who ran for re-election and was defeated was Glenn Andrews in Alabama.

It would take a deep probe of voting patterns, down to the precinct level, to determine if the white backlash had any appreciable effect on the House contests. In the Chicago area district where backlash sentiment was obvious, Roman C. Pucinski won re-election but by a much narrower margin than customary. In other northern metropolitan areas, the backlash issue did not appear to have been a major factor in the outcome of congressional elections.

Missing from the House will be most of the bright, young crop of Midwest freshmen Democrats who contributed mightily to the impressive record of the 89th Congress. Many of them ran impressively in their districts, receiving more votes than Democrats normally expect in the Republican heartland.

The conservative coalition will be without its chief strategist in the 90th Congress, however. Rules Committee Chairman Howard W. Smith was defeated in his expanded Virginia district in the primary. Conservative Democrats retaliated by helping to elect a Republican over the moderate Democratic nominee. But there is no natural successor in prestige and power to Smith. However another extreme conservative, William M. Colmer (Miss.), moves up to the chairmanship of the powerful Rules Committee. Replacing Cooley as Agriculture Committee chairman will be W. R. Poage of Texas.

More significant in terms of legislative control will be the expected realignment of House committees to reflect the increased Republican strength.

After the 1964 Democratic sweep, the number of Democrats on each committee was increased and the Republican representation cut. The process is expected to be reversed and effective control of some important committees may switch to a conservative coalition.

Some Committees 'Vulnerable'

The important Appropriations and Ways & Means Committees are particularly vulnerable to a switch to the right. The Education & Labor Committee, however, will continue to have a liberal majority even after a realignment.

The Republican House leadership will also have an important voice in the shaping of legislative committees by its appointments of freshmen Republicans. It can give the choicest assignments to the most conservative of the newly-elected Republicans. Or it can acknowledge the political effectiveness of a moderate image by putting freshmen who campaigned as middle-of-the-roaders on important committees.

In relation to earlier congresses, the 248 House Democrats compare with 259 elected in 1962, 263 elected in 1960, 283 after the 1958 Democratic off-year victory, 234 in 1956 and 232 in 1954. In 1952, the year of Eisenhower's first election, Republicans gained narrow control of the House.

Six New Senators Still in Forties

Six of the seven newly-elected senators are still in their forties—mere youngsters by standards of past elections.

The graybeard of the group is Wyoming's Republican Gov. Clifford P. Hansen at 54. The youngest is the new Tennessee Republican senator, Howard Baker, Jr., 41.

In between are Republicans Mark O. Hatfield of Oregon, 44; Edward W. Brooke, Massachusetts, 46; Charles H. Percy, Illinois, 47; and Democrats Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina, 44, and William B. Spong of Virginia, 46.

Ages of incumbent senators range from 34-year-old Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts to 89-year-old Carl Hayden of Arizona.

Negro Brooke's Election New England Highlight

Massachusetts voters made history with the first popular-vote election of a Negro, Republican Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke, to a seat in the U.S. Senate.

Brooke, a member of the GOP moderate wing, will be the first Negro senator since the post-Civil War period when some members of his race were elected by legislatures in the South.

A feared "white backlash" vote failed to develop as the 46-year-old attorney general overwhelmed his Democratic opponent, former Gov. Endicott Peabody, for the seat being vacated by the veteran Republican, Sen. Leverett Saltonstall.

The drama of the Brooke election aside, voters in the six-state New England area voted on balance to keep things pretty much as they are.

Brooke's running mate, Gov. John A. Volpe, easily won re-election over Edward J. McCormack, Jr., a former state attorney general who is a nephew of House Speaker John W. McCormack. The state's congressional delegation — seven Democrats and five Republicans—remained unchanged.

In Maine, Sec. of State Kenneth M. Curtis, a 35-year-old Democrat, defeated the GOP incumbent, John H. Reed, by a substantial margin. In the 1st Congressional District, Democrat Peter N. Kyros defeated former Rep. Peter A. Garland for the seat being vacated by GOP Rep. Stanley R. Tupper.

Sen. Margaret Chase Smith (R) and Rep. William D. Hathaway (D) easily won re-election.

Incumbent governors all won re-election without trouble in the remaining four states — Democrats John N. Dempsey in Connecticut, John W. King in New Hampshire and Philip H. Hoff in Vermont and Republican John H. Chafee in Rhode Island.

Democratic Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre of New Hampshire, seeking his first full term, won a 16,000 vote margin over Harrison R. Thyng, a retired Air Force general with heavy right-wing support.

The only other Senate contest in the region saw Rhode Island Democrat Claiborne Pell re-elected 2 to 1 over Ruth M. Briggs.

Other House shifts occurred in New Hampshire where freshman Democrat J. Oliva Huot was defeated by ultra-conservative Louis Wyman, who formerly held the normally Republican seat, and in Connecticut, where Republican Thomas J. Meskill unseated two-term Rep. Bernard F. Grabowski.

States Where House Seats Shifted Party

The complexion of the House was altered substantially in the mid-term elections as 57 seats changed hands. Widespread Republican gains left the GOP with a net advance of 47 seats.

With 435 House contests decided by the voters, Republicans captured 52 seats held by Democrats; the latter took five Republican seats.

While the Republican Party scored single-seat gains state by state around the nation, it enjoyed a spectacular bounceback in the traditional GOP heartland of the Midwest. It took five seats each in Michigan and Ohio and four seats in Iowa. In California, it captured three seats from Democrats.

The Democrats picked up five seats held by Republicans, four of them in traditionally Democratic strongholds in the South.

After the smoke cleared from the congressional warfare, the Democrats still held a wide margin by party breakdown although it was evident that the coalition of conservatives of both parties had been greatly strengthened.

In the 89th Congress, there were 294 Democrats and 139 Republicans, with a vacant seat on each side. In the new 90th Congress, the Democratic margin will be 248-187.

Democratic Gains Small

The Democrats gained a total of five seats in the following states: Alabama, 2; Georgia, 1; Maine, 1 and Mississippi, 1.

The Republicans gained 52 seats as follows: Alaska, 1; Arizona, 1; Arkansas, 1; California, 3, Colorado, 1; Connecticut, 1; Delaware, 1; Florida, 1; Georgia, 2; Idaho, 1; Illinois, 1; Indiana, 1 and Iowa, 4.

Also, Kentucky, 2; Maryland, 1; Michigan, 5; Minnesota, 1; Nebraska, 1; New Hampshire, 1; New Jersey, 2; New York 1; North Carolina, 1; North Dakota, 1; Ohio, 5; Oklahoma, 1; Oregon, 1; Pennsylvania, 1; Tennessee, 1; Texas, 2; Utah, 1; Virginia, 2; Wisconsin, 2 and Wyoming, 1.

Mid-Atlantic Incumbents Fare Well; Maryland Voters Reject 'Backlash'

Incumbents fared well in the populous mid-Atlantic states, where a strong two-party system and a tradition of ticket-splitting make the region a major political battleground in every election.

Democrats won 58 of the 97 House seats in New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, West Virginia and Delaware. The GOP gained six seats in the region, not enough to recoup a 13-seat loss in 1964. And only three of the GOP victories were in districts where Democratic incumbents were seeking re-election.

Republicans showed their muscle by retaining the politically important governorships of New York and Pennsylvania. The GOP added a governor in Maryland, aided by a flood of Democratic "frontlash" votes withheld from a segregationist-backed candidate.

In three Senate races, the incumbents — two Republicans and one Democratic—won easily.

National attention was focused on the New York gubernatorial race where Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller defeated his Democractic challenger, Frank D. O'Connor, by more than 400,000 votes. Rockefeller, however, received only a minority of the total vote. The Liberal Party's Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., and the Conservative Party candidate, Paul L. Adams, each polled more than 500,000 votes.

New York Democrats actually held all of the seven congressional seats captured from the Republicans two years ago. Their one-seat loss was a GOP victory in an Albany seat vacated by the retirement of Democratic Rep. Leo W. O'Brien.

Republicans held on to the Pennsylvania governorship, electing Raymond P. Shafer, took control of the legislature, but were only able to retake one of the two House seats lost to the Democrats in 1964.

Case Wins Easily

In New Jersey, liberal GOP Sen. Clifford P. Case swept to a massive re-election victory. His party made a partial congressional comeback, picking up two seats after a four-seat loss in 1964.

Maryland gubernatorial races are often lackluster affairs, but this year's contest drew national attion after George P. Mahoney won a close three-way Democratic primary with a direct appeal for backlash votes.

The State AFL-CIO and leading liberal Democrats strongly supported Republican Spiro T. Agnew, who won by an unexpectedly large margin in a state with a three-to-one Democratic registration edge. The GOP picked up a newly-created congressional district in a Washington, D. C., suburb for a one-seat gain.

There was no change in West Virginia's election, with Democratic Sen. Jennings Randolph an easy winner and all congressmen re-elected.

Tiny Delaware was a Republican sweep, however. One victim was the state's only congressman, Harris B. McDowell, Jr., a liberal who had served five terms in the House. The GOP also captured the lower house of the legislature, won a tie in the state senate, and easily re-elected Sen. J. Caleb Boggs.

Democrats Lose 10, Take 2 From GOP

Republicans will hold at least 25 gubernatorial posts and the Democrats 24, excluding Georgia.

Except for Texas and Illinois, the governorships of all the major industrial states are now held by the Republicans—California, which they took from the Democrats; and Michigan, New York, Ohio and Pennsylvania, which they retained. In Texas Gov. John B. Connally (D) easily won another term and in Illinois the governorship, held by Otto Kerner (D), was not at stake.

A spectacular GOP victory was in California where Movie Actor Ronald Reagan snowed under Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown (D) and the moderates and liberals who supported him. Reagan's election also was regarded as a victory for the Goldwater wing of the GOP.

Only one of the governorships the Republicans gained was in the East. In Maryland, Spiro T. Agnew, Baltimore County executive, defeated George P. Mahoney (D), whose campaign slogan of "Your home is your castle—protect it" cost him liberal and some moderate support.

Other GOP Gains

The other Republican gains were chalked up in:

Alaska, where Walter J. Hickel edged out Gov. William A. Egan in a cliff-hanging finish.

Arizona, where Mayor John R. Williams of Phoenix turned back Gov. Samuel P. Goddard's bid for another term.

Arkansas, where Winthrop Rockefeller defeated Judge Jim Johnson and gave the state its first Republican governor since 1872. Rockefeller was regarded as a moderate and Johnson as a segregationist.

Florida, which also got its first Republican governor since 1872 when Claude Kirk, Jr., Jacksonville investment banker and a conservative, defeated the liberal three-term Mayor Robert King High of Miami.

Minnesota, where Gov. Karl Rolvaag (D), who survived a bitter primary fight, lost out to Republican Harold E. LeVander.

Nebraska, where Norbert T. Tiemann defeated Lt. Gov. Philip C. Sorensen, brother of Theodore Sorensen, a top aide to the late Pres. John F. Kennedy.

Nevada, where Lt. Gov. Paul Laxalt, son of a Basque sheep-herder, ended Gov. Grant Sawyer's bid for an unprecedented third term.

New Mexico, where David F. Cargo pulled a surprise by defeating T. E. Lusk.

Sec. of State Kenneth M. Curtis, Democratic candidate in Maine, ended the record-breaking tenure of Gov. John H. Reed, who had held the office since 1958.

Banker George Docking turned out incumbent Gov. William H. Avery in Kansas and became the first Democrat to hold the post since his late father, George Docking.

Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, regarded by many as Republican presidential timber, easily defeated Democratic State Chairman Zolton A. Ferency (D) to win a third term. In Massachusetts Gov. John A. Volpe (R) was re-elected over Edward J. McCormack, nephew of Speaker of the House John W. McCormack.

In what was once the rockbound Republican state of Vermont, Democrat Philip H. Hoff became the first governor in history to win a third term by defeating Richard A. Snelling.

2 Rockefellers Win

Gov. Nelson Rockefeller (R) won a third term in New York State by piling up an unexpectedly large majority over Democrat Frank D. O'Connor. His twin victory with his brother Winthrop in Arkansas marked the first time two brothers were elected governors of different states on the same day since 1851, when the feat was performed by John Bigler in Pennsylvania and William Bigler in California.

This year in Pennsylvania Lt. Gov. Raymond P. Shafer (R) showed unexpected strength in usually Democratic Philadelphia to defeat Milton J. Shapp, who bucked the Democratic organization to win the nomination.

The country got a woman governor for the first time in 42 years as Lurleen Wallace (D) routed Rep. James P. Martin in a battle of segregationists in Alabama. Mrs. Wallace will take over from her equally segregationist husband, George C. Wallace, who was not eligible to succeed himself but who, most people believe, will be governor in fact if not in name.

One of the easiest victories was scored by Buford Ellington (D) in Tennessee. The Republicans failed to field a candidate against him and his chief opponent was a virtually unknown independent, Charles R. Moffett.

Sheriff Clark Loses Selma Write-in Bid

Selma, Ala. — Sheriff James G. Clark, Jr., lost his write-in campaign for the post he held eight years to Wilson Baker, moderate former safety director of Selma. Unofficial Dallas County election returns gave Baker 7,249 votes to Clark's 6,742.

Clark and Baker were major figures in 1965 demonstrations by civil rights groups here climaxed by the killing of the Rev. James J. Reeb, Boston minister. Clark was accused of handling demonstrators roughly and making mass arrests to break up marches led by the Rev. Martin Luther King and others.

U.S. District Court Judge Daniel H. Thomas fined Clark $1,500 for violating an order not to interfere with orderly voter registrations or voting rights protests. The court faulted Clark for arresting some 200 Negroes and taking them on a forced march of four miles.

Baker took the position as city safety director that peaceful demonstrations should not be interfered with. He defeated Clark for nomination in the Democratic primary.

Elsewhere in Alabama elections:

● Seven Negro candidates, running in neighboring Lowndes County under the "Black Panther" emblem, were defeated in races for posts ranging from sheriff to coroner and school board member. They lost by margins of from 200 to 600 votes although Negro voters outnumber whites in the county.

● In Macon County, Lucius Amerson won over Sheriff Harvey Sadler. Amerson, a Negro, repeated his Democratic primary victory over Sadler, who ran again as a write-in candidate.

Schlossberg Named Counsel for UAW

Detroit—The Auto Workers have announced the appointment of Stephen I. Schlossberg as the union's general counsel.

Schlossberg, who has been assistant general counsel for the past three years, succeeds Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., who three years ago agreed to fill the post for a limited period. Rauh will continue as the union's Washington counsel.

The new general counsel was an organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers, assistant director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and a professor of law at Georgetown University before joining the UAW.

His post as assistant general counsel will be filled by John Fillion, who has been on the union's legal staff since 1959.

Geneva—The new Republic of Botswana, formerly the British protectorate of Bechuanaland in southern Africa, has become the 117th member of the Intl. Labor Organization, Dir.-Gen. David A. Morse announced.

Botswana has agreed formally to accept the obligations of the ILO constitution, Minister of State for External Affairs M. P. K. Nwako advised Morse by letter.

defensive for his expressed dissent on the issue.

In the closing weeks of the campaign, however, Hatfield backtracked somewhat and largely succeeded in avoiding making the election a referendum on Viet Nam.

A middle-of-the-road Republican beat a middle-of-the-road Democrat in Tennessee to replace liberal Democratic Sen. Ross Bass. Former Gov. Frank G. Clement had beaten Bass in the Democratic primary. But he lost in the general election to Howard Baker, Jr., who will be the first Republican Tennessee has ever sent to the Senate. Baker's final position in the GOP spectrum will depend on whether he follows the political footsteps of his late father, a moderate Republican congressman, or his father-in-law, Senate GOP Leader Everett McKinley Dirksen. Two years ago, Baker had run unsuccessfully against Bass for the Senate seat.

New Republican Faces

New Republican faces in the Senate will include the first Negro senator since the Reconstruction era after the Civil War. Edward W. Brooke, 46-year-old Massachusetts state attorney general, handily beat former Gov. Endicott Peabody. Republican Sen. Leverett Saltonstall did not seek re-election. Neither candidate provided an outlet for conservative votes. Brooke was an outspoken opponent of Barry Goldwater in 1964, and Peabody was if anything more strongly identified with civil rights causes than Brooke.

There aren't many voters in Wyoming but most of them picked Republican Gov. Clifford P. Hansen to succeed a retiring Republican senator, Milward Simpson. The outcome was a blow to Democrats who had high hopes of electing Rep. Teno Roncalio to the Senate.

Another Democratic setback came in Idaho, where conservative Republican Len B. Jordan won re-election to the Senate. Most observers had given former Rep. Ralph Harding, the Democratic candidate, a good chance of unseating Jordan.

In Michigan, former Gov. G. Mennen Williams was unable to make the transition from the State Dept. post he held for six years to the political supremacy he once held in Michigan. Gov. George W. Romney, eager to prove to Republican presidential-pickers that his coattails have real carrying power, campaigned hard for Griffin—the man he had appointed to the Senate. Griffin had been favored, but his victory margin was bigger than expected.

The new faces aren't all Republican and two Democratic newcomers from the South are considered, by liberal standards, improvements over the Democrats they replace.

Both Virginia's William B. Spong, Jr., and South Carolina's Ernest F. Hollings would be conservative Democrats by northern definition. But in the context of southern politics they rank as moderates.

Spong defeated veteran Sen. A. Willis Robertson in the Democratic primary and went on to win an easy victory in the general election, despite a strong Republican effort in the state. Hollings, a former governor opposed by bitter-end segregationists, defeated Sen. Donald Russell in the primary and won election to a two-year term Nov. 8.

In a clearcut test of liberal-conservative sentiment, Democrat Lee Metcalf won re-election in Montana by a bigger-than-predicted margin over Republican Gov. Tim Babcock.

Trend to GOP Marks Mountain State Voting

The Rocky Mountain states moved toward Republicanism on Nov. 8 with the notable exception of re-electing Democratic Sen. Lee Metcalf to a second term in Montana and freshman liberal Rep. Frank E. Evans in Colorado.

In five Mountain States and three additional southwestern states, the GOP scored a net gain of five seats in the House of Representatives and three governorships.

The Republican trend was toward traditionally moderate to conservative candidates, however, rather than the open right-wingers who took over the machinery of the GOP in several Mountain States prior to 1964.

The most clearly identified regional supporter of Barry Goldwater for the 1964 presidential nomination, Republican Gov. Tim Babcock of Montana, lost to Metcalf, a Democrat with an established liberal reputation.

Two Democrats Win

Evans won a second term in Colorado's 3rd Congressional District, long a GOP stronghold, after a solid record in the 89th Congress.

The veteran Democratic Sen. Clinton D. Anderson, sponsor of the medicare program, was re-elected in New Mexico.

Otherwise the trend generally was to the GOP.

Democrats held a 14-3 House of Representatives regional margin in the 89th Congress which will be reduced in the 90th Congress to 9-8.

Among the Democratic incumbent House members beaten were Representatives Compton I. White (Ida.), David S. King (Utah) and Roy H. McVicker (Colo.), all rated as supporters of Johnson Administration programs.

A Republican sweep in Wyoming resulted in the election of conservative GOP Gov. Clifford Hansen to the Senate over Rep. Teno Roncalio, a freshman Democrat, while Roncalio's House place was lost to former Rep. William Henry Harrison III.

A similar Republican sweep in Idaho produced the rejection of former Rep. Ralph Harding's bid for the Senate against incumbent GOP Sen. Len B. Jordan. Conservative State Sen. Don Samuelson, who defeated incumbent liberal Robert E. Smylie for nomination for the governorship, won against two opponents — Democrat Cecil Andrus and independent State Sen. Perry Swisher.

In New Mexico, Arizona and Nevada, Democratic governors were replaced by Republicans, apparently on largely local issues.

Lt. Gov. Paul Laxalt, generally rated as a moderate, defeated incumbent Democratic Gov. Grant Sawyer in Nevada in a contest involving discussion of alleged criminal activities of gambling-casino personalities and FBI tapping of telephones.

David F. Cargo, also rated as a GOP moderate, defeated Democrat Thomas E. Lusk in New Mexico, replacing Democratic incumbent Gov. Jack M. Campbell.

Democratic incumbent Gov. Samuel P. Goddard of Arizona was defeated by Republican Jack Williams.

The doctrinal overtones were further mixed with such results as the re-election in Colorado of both Republican Sen. Gordon Allott, a conservative, and Gov. John A. Love, who supported the presidential bid of the anti-Goldwaterite Gov. William W. Scranton of Pennsylvania in the 1964 GOP convention.

The three Republican victories for governorships left the entire area from the Great Plains to the Far West with only one Democratic incumbent, Gov. Calvin L. Rampton of Utah, in the eight-state region.

Majority With Labor Backing Win Contests

Candidates supported by organized labor for the U.S. Senate, the House and governor won a majority of their races in the Nov. 8 election.

The endorsements include those of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, the political action groups of federation-affiliated unions and the United Mine Workers.

In the 35 Senate races, these groups supported a total of 28 candidates of whom 14, or 50 percent, won. There were 22 candidates supported by COPE alone, of whom 9 were victorious. There were no labor endorsements in Senate races in a number of southern states.

In the 435 House races, there was a total of 333 COPE-endorsed candidates of whom 181 or 54 percent were victorious. There were a few additional endorsements by individual unions, but not enough to change the percentage. In the House races, also, there were no endorsements in some southern states.

In the gubernatorial elections, there were 29 labor-endorsed candidates in the 35 contests of whom nine, or 31 percent were victorious.

In all, there were 203 labor-backed candidates who were elected out of 390 endorsed, for an overall batting average of .520.

COPE endorsements, and those of other political action groups, are made at the state and congressional district levels by state AFL-CIO and other state labor groups.

Endorsements are based primarily on the records or the espoused programs of the candidates in terms of a wide number of economic, welfare and labor issues.

The 90th Congress

THE 1966 ELECTIONS produced a crazy-quilt pattern of results that will have the political analysts puzzling for months. But amidst the cross-currents and contradictions from section to section of the country, some basic facts emerge.

Perhaps the most important is that the make-up of the 90th Congress represents neither a major upheaval nor a critical change in direction from the course the country has followed in the past six years.

Over 80 percent of the members of the 89th Congress—one of the most productive in the nation's history—has been returned to office. Only one incumbent senator was defeated and about 50 House members lost their seats.

The liberal majority of the Senate remains to all effects unchanged. The number of liberals in the House has been reduced, and it may be more difficult than in the past to put together a working majority on issues of national concern.

THERE IS a growing concern, however, that the election results will revive an attempt to put back together the conservative Republican-southern Democratic coalition in the House that for decades proved a barrier to passage of legislation in the national interest. This coalition was built on the axis of opposition to civil rights and support of economic conservatism and succeeded in frustrating programs aimed at dealing effectively with national problems in both areas.

The coalition came somewhat unstuck in 1962 and was further weakened in 1964 when the Johnson landslide brought in enough votes in the House to override the coalition's legislative ploys.

The possibility that the coalition will be rebuilt in the House in the 90th Congress is present, but the Republicans would do well to scan the election returns carefully. By and large the majority of Republicans to win office last week were moderates on civil rights questions. In the South, hardnosed GOP segregationists—nearly all former Democrats—lost ground to even more hardnosed Democratic racists.

There were few, if any, attacks during the campaigning on programs such as medicare, aid to education, minimum wage, consumer protection, and a host of other measures adopted by the 89th Congress—a sure indication that these and other programs for helping solve the problems of a modern society have wide popular support.

WHETHER the coalition reforms in any effective way or not, the continuing need for progressive and liberal legislation must be reaffirmed, the case presented to the new Congress and support rallied from the citizenry.

For those who have labored long and hard to win a measure of progress in the Sixties, this is a time for careful inquiry and study as the prologue to an intensified effort to make certain that the country stays on the move. The nation cannot afford two years of stalemate.

A New Chapter Unfolds:

Demonstration Cities Act Seen Restoring Quality of Urban Life

ALL OVER the United States the complaint is rising that our core cities are collapsing.

Great cities such as New York, Chicago, Los Angeles have become the center of bitter slum riots while thousands of their residents flee to the suburbs to escape the sometimes overwhelming problems that have faced the mayors of every great city in the nation.

For some years slum clearance, low-income housing and the rehabilitation of long-outdated areas have been slowing down. Added to these woes is the current depression in the construction of private residential housing due largely to "tight money" which has made it difficult to finance mortgages.

Nor are their problems only the physical ones such as slums, transportation needs, water and air pollution and health problems. In addition, there are the problems of adequate education for their children, training workers for productive jobs in an age of automation, bringing beauty and culture into the lives of their citizens.

Finally—and hopefully not too late—Congress has adopted the "Demonstration Cities" program proposed by the Johnson Administration and warmly supported by organized labor to meet many of these needs.

Calling for funds amounting to $1.3 billion, the program is far from answering the immense needs—Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York, for example, estimated that his city would need $50 billion to do the job—but it represents a beginning that is of the utmost importance to every worker in the country.

The new program offers two major helps for hard-hit cities:

- It provides for special grants to revitalize the center city and the people who live there.
- It provides special grants to encourage metropolitan planning.

THE DEMONSTRATION CITIES Act of 1966 is designed to give new hope to cities—not merely in terms of their physical development, but in the quality of the life they can give their residents.

Basically, it seeks to encourage cities, both large and small, to plan for the future and to carry out those plans with the aid of the federal government.

Here are some of the vital facts that emphasize the importance of this step:

- From a largely rural country of fewer than 36 million people less than a century ago, the United States is now a nation of 195 million people.
- Approximately 70 percent of all Americans now live in 212 metropolitan areas that occupy less than 10 percent of the country's surface. By 1985, the population is expected to reach 250 million—and about 80 percent will live in metropolitan areas.
- To meet the housing needs of today's population alone, residential construction should be maintained at a minimum of 2.5 million units a year over 10 years.
- Yet in the first six years of the 1960s, the total of public and private housing starts (including farm) has been far below this minimum.
- Latest statistics show a worsening of the situation with housing starts declining to an alarming degree. In September starts dropped to their lowest level of the year. At 1,102,000 starts they were 21 percent lower than during the previous six months.

Modest as is the Demonstration Cities Act at this point, it nevertheless must hold hope that it will help provide many thousands of jobs in the construction and other industries that will be affected by it. In fact, one of the announced purposes of the act is "to expand job and income opportunities."

Of great importance is the provision that all laborers and mechanics employed by contractors or subcontractors in federally financed projects, whether in whole or in part, must be paid prevailing wage rates as determined by the secretary of labor under the Davis-Bacon Act.

All in all, the act opens a new chapter in the battle of the people to restore their cities to the place that they should occupy in the nation's life and, above all, give the people who live in them a chance for a decent and fulfilling life. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Shortage of Health Personnel Threatens Strain on Medicare

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

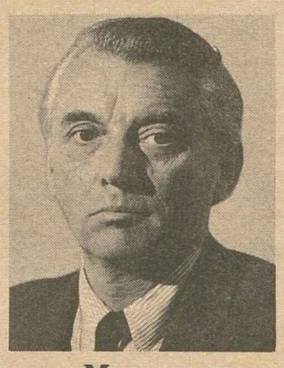
MEDICARE is going to be more in the headlines this winter in what threatens to be a sharply controversial way. Already the Administration is bracing for complaints and criticism.

Indeed it was keen apprehension about the problem and a determination months ago to take steps that would keep it from getting out of hand which led up to the joint appearance at the President's "surprise" news conference in Texas of the secretary of health, education and welfare, John Gardner, with Johnson. Oddly, their respective remarks about nursing homes, a manpower shortage in the health field and the major reorganization of HEW to make its vast operations more wieldy got comparatively little attention in the press.



Morgan

They didn't discuss medicare but a whole lot of things are going to happen almost simultaneously to strain the administration of that program. Thanks to the foresight, organizational efficiency and capacity to deal with unexpected emergencies, the HEW crew, steered by Gardner who, as the President took some pains to point out, is a Republican, got medicare off to a virtually unfaltering start last July.

Even the crisis feared in southern hospitals over the desegregation of wards—as a price for eligibility—did not cause more than transitory hitches. Things are by no means perfect on that point yet and the summer's racial disorders did not help blunt the problem. It seemed almost as if Mississippi's Sen. Stennis was using that chaos to punish HEW with narrow legislative restrictions on its desegregation guidelines. For some curious reasons, however, southern and other regional resentment over such guidelines has not run so deep in hospitals as in schools.

But medicare's honeymoon, if any, is over. In the first place, winter is the time when more people get sick, so the shortage of hospital beds for the eligible elderly will be more acute than during the summer and fall. In the second place, medicare's coverage extends to nursing homes in January and this polyglot collection of institutions, whose standards and services vary widely, will inevitably give rise to a new spate of problems.

Some high HEW officials make no secret of their professional contempt for the quality of some of these places, which they would be happy to see abolished. Johnson himself implied concern when he told reporters yesterday that some time ago he had created a special task force on nursing homes, asking Gardner to "develop a radical new program for care of the elderly and to call on the best architects available in America to create designs for these homes."

But one of the most serious problems affecting not only medicare but the whole broad and neglected spectrum of health is the desperate lack of trained personnel. For this the American public is largely indebted to the American Medical Association, whose lobby in protection of the closed union of doctors has—until recently—been able to limit the scope of public health programs to a figurative wiping of the public's nose against the common cold.

IT MAY TAKE the public a long time to realize how damaging the selfish policies of the AMA hierarchy—as distinguished from the sometimes heroic selfless dedication of individual doctors—have been to the health of the American population. If the AMA, for instance, were as concerned about hospital wages as doctors' fees, hospitals wouldn't be so short-handed. The situation was uncomfortably dramatized last month by strikes of practical nurses in Chicago and the exposure of shocking conditions in municipal hospitals in New York.

Practical nurses, licensed, earn $1.57 an hour; unlicensed, $1.22 an hour; nurses' aides $1 an hour. The American Nurses Association's figures for 1963 and 1964 show that general duty nurses earned $4,700 a year—less than $100 a month—compared to an average yearly salary for teachers of $6,235; secretaries, $5,170 and factory workers, $5,075. No wonder there is an edge of anger in Gardner's voice when he declares that, except for farm hands and migrant crop workers, hospital employes are the most underpaid lot in America.

The secretary said no problem is a higher barrier to the country's health goals than the serious shortages in health manpower. Perhaps the most acute shortage of all shows up in "sub-professional" help—nurses' aides and the like—the kind of technicians particularly needed on the nursing home level for the elderly. Gardner and Labor Sec. Wirtz are putting their heads together to double the supply of these health workers. They may borrow a leaf from the Army's book which allows the military to turn out a first class medical corpsman after a few months' training. But the situation is not healthy. You might even go so far as to say it is sick.

400 Pacts Near Termination:

Automation's Job Toll Creates Key Issue for Refinery Talks

JOB SECURITY to offset "depression day" employment conditions in the oil industry is a key union goal as nearly 400 contracts near termination, Pres. A. F. Grospiron of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers declared in a radio interview.

Plant relocations, centralized operations and automation are taking a heavy toll of oil workers, Grospiron said. Many long-seniority workers are being terminated with little hope of finding similar jobs, he asserted. His statements came on Labor News Conference, carried by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Grospiron said the union is proposing that regular employes be allowed to continue with the company at their present rate "or at a higher rate, which allows them to advance if the opportunities are there, until retirement on adequate pensions."

He said that both state and federal commissions have taken the position that there is "an obligation on the part of industries and government" to develop plans to ease the human problems created by technological advances.

But employers in the oil industry "have completely failed during the past seven or eight years to do anything about this," he said.

THE UNION is also seeking 18-cent hourly wage increases effective Jan. 1, 1967, and Jan. 1, 1968, and the correction of inequities existing since 1964, the union president said.

He noted that the OCAW represents about 75 percent of the petroleum refinery workers in the United States and that contract talks will involve "all of the major oil companies," covering some 60,000 oil workers.

Reporters questioning Grospiron on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Murray Seeger of Newsweek magazine.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

INTELLECTUALLY and physically as well as ethically the veteran Sen. Paul H. Douglas of Illinois has been a giant in the Senate in his 18 years. He is now beaten, defeated in his effort for a fourth straight term at the age of 74 years, but he went down with all banners flying gallantly.

He went down, moreover, to a Republican opponent, Charles W. Percy, who long ago had been one of his economics students at the University of Chicago, and between the two—representing different generations—there is well-known mutual respect and personal affection that were admirably expressed in their victory-and-defeat statements on election night.

Affection is a word that comes very easily to mind in regard to Sen. Douglas.

There were other liberal Democrats during the 1950s who had a superior knack and tactical skill in securing the passage of legislation, which is a special applied art.

There have been others better able to hold together the essentially individualistic urgencies of the great group of liberals who began moving into the Senate in 1948, year of the Truman victory, and finally won vindication with passage of a great mass of progressive legislation in the Kennedy and Johnson years.

None of them was personally kinder than Douglas—to friends, to students, to professional associates.

None of them was more deeply respected for qualities of mind and character that eventually became deeply etched into the lines of the crag-faced lion from Illinois.

None surpassed him in the quality of evoking a warm personal glow among those who met him from time to time.

HE IS A HERO, an authentic hero, who enlisted as a combat infantryman in the Marines at the age of 50 because he had favored U.S. participation in World War II and believed he had an obligation to fight the war as well as urge it. His left arm was stitched by a Japanese machine gun during an island landing, and an arduous series of operations was required to restore its partial use.

He did not exploit the experience, but he was likely to be very attentive and courteous to a fellow veteran who had won, for example, a Silver Star, if the colleague came up before a committee on which he served.

He has had a long political career—longer than most people remember, for he served before the war as an anti-machine Democrat on the Chicago Board of Aldermen, and he ran unsuccessfully against the Chicago organization for Democratic nomination for governor in 1940 because he feared dissipation of gains achieved under a fine Democratic predecessor, Henry Horner.

The organization had changed after the war, and it helped send him to the Senate. Douglas learned how to get legislation passed, also, during his three terms—social security improvements of major importance, the area redevelopment plan that became broadened into regional attacks on chronically undeveloped sections, and many others.

ALL OF THIS without self-righteousness or the curse of intellectual arrogance that hampers some other intellectuals.

All of this with a growing wryness of humor as he realized that he could not accomplish all he wanted to accomplish but an absolute, total commitment that he would fight as long as he could for any cause in which he deeply believed.

There was a charm in what he said a year or two ago, when he was battling against what looked like impossible odds to establish the Indiana Dunes as a nationally protected recreational area. It ran something like this: "I used to think I should seek to save the world; then that I should seek to save the nation. Now all I want to do is save the Dunes."

He saved the Dunes. Weekend before the election Pres. Johnson signed into law the authorizing bill.

Affection—that's what Paul H. Douglas carries with him as he retires to private life, beaten politically but as firm in his courage and personal integrity as ever.

PLANT RELOCATIONS, centralized operations and automation have created "depression days" employment conditions in the oil industry, Pres. A. F. Grospiron (center) of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers told Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Murray Seeger of Newsweek on Labor News Conference over the Mutual Radio Network.

How to Buy:

More Food and Fewer Games Sought by Supermarket Pickets

By Sidney Margolius

ALMOST EVERY major city and many smaller towns now have seen spontaneously-organized groups of housewives parading in front of supermarkets.

The protests and letters from working people show anger especially towards trading stamps, supermarket lottery games, the fantastic prices of some processed foods, and concealed price increases effected by reductions in contents of packages. At least some working people are getting wise to what's happening, and are beginning to figure out how much they really pay for processed foods. "My daughter bought a six-ounce box of Puffed Rice for 45 cents," writes Thomas Lundy. "That's 7.5 cents an ounce, or $1.20 a pound. This label I'm sending you shows what they are charging for four sugar buns—69 cents. I have seen bread for 59 cents a loaf."

The public also is angry about the current tendency of many food manufacturers to hide price rises simply by giving you less.

"In September I purchased two packages of M.C.P. Jam and Jelly Pectin at two for 35 cents," reader Bert Halpin writes. "My wife still had a package bought in June at two for 33 cents. If not for that, we might not have noticed that the old package was three ounces, and the new one two. This is an increase of more than 54 per cent!"

This kind of concealed price rise, in fact, is one of the main reasons why consumers wanted the "truth in packaging" bill to include some provision for standardized weights. But this provision was eliminated by Congress. So now you have to be on your guard and not depend on the same brand providing the same net weight as the last time you bought it.

Among many examples cited by consumer spokesmen, one brand of instant mashed potatoes kept the same price but reduced its contents three times; manufacturers of paper goods have reduced the count of towels and tissues without announcement; manufacturers of cooking oils reduced contents from a quart (16 ounces) to 14 ounces; contents of frozen vegetables in packages, originally a pound, gradually were cut to 14 ounces, 10 ounces, and now even 9 ounces.

Much of the anger has been directed toward supermarkets, and especially towards such highly visible factors that raise prices as trading stamps, "bonus bingo" and other lottery games, night openings, carryout and other services.

In reality, the food manufacturers are even more responsible than the stores. But the supermarkets are trying hard to dodge their share of the responsibility. If extra services such as check-cashing, carryout boys and night openings were discontinued, retail prices could be brought down 6 to 9 percent, the president of the National Association of Food Chains commented. But, he said, the public wants these services. Furthermore, he pointed out that supermarket profits are only about 1.3 cents of the dollar you pay for food.

THIS IS WHERE they're dodging. It's not their percentage that hurts as much as the money they waste—your money—to achieve their dollar profits.

The fact is, supermarkets have joined in the food manufacturers' modern game of pushing at you a host of highly-advertised processed food products whose prices have little relation to their actual value.

Cutting down some services, including trading stamps and bingo games which together can take 2.5 cents of your food dollar, could cut prices. Some stores already have cut out stamps as the result of the recent boycotts and picket lines.

But the best boycott you can make is to refuse to buy the processed and ready-to-eat foods priced out of all proportion to their value. Kellogg's already has had to discontinue the costly "Corn Flakes with Bananas" because the public turned thumbs down after a first rush to buy.

Time Turned Back By Commerce Dept.

IF YOU WANT to talk about "the good old days" the Dept. of Commerce has just turned out an impressive, 250-page document that provides all the facts and figures you'll need.

In fact, some of the facts and figures go back to 1860 which is admittedly a period in which none of our contemporaries have had any personal experience. More than anything else, though, the document dispels a lot of myths.

The publication is called "Long Term Economic Growth." It is not exactly bedtime reading since many of its pages are filled with complex tables and charts, but it does tell an important story.

For example, it shows that the nation's economy has multiplied 25-fold in a little more than 90 years, providing the average American with six times as much goods and services as his great-grandfather had.

From 1874 through 1965 the Gross National Product (that's the total value of all goods and services produced) increased from $27 billion to $681 billion, measured in 1965 dollars.

The annual GNP per person, during this same period, increased from $600 to $3,500.

Over this 91-year period the U.S. economy grew at an annual average rate of 3.6 percent compared with 3 percent in 1929-65 and 4.7 percent in 1960-65.

THE DOCUMENT was prepared by the Bureau of the Census and for the first time brings under one cover all the statistical series bearing on the nation's economic growth.

The charts provide various alternatives.

If you don't believe a chart based on 1958 dollars is accurate, you may use a chart based on 1929 dollars.

It doesn't take a top-notch specialist to ascertain the basic facts about our economic history as shown in the charts and tables.

Here are a few:

- In 1935 and 1936, 42.2 percent of all family units had personal incomes of $2,000 or less. In 1960-63 this dropped to the lowest point in history, 14.3 percent.
- On the other end, only 3.2 percent of the family units earned $10,000 or more during the earlier period, while in the 1960-63 period it leaped to 14.6 percent, the highest in history.
- In 1900 to 1909, 55 percent of all income came through employe compensation. From 1960 to 1965 this had risen to 70.7 percent.
- During the same earlier period, store owners—many of them with small stores—produced 23.6 percent of the income; this has now dropped to 10.6 percent.
- Corporation profits, as a percentage of income, rose between 1900 and 1965 from 6.8 percent to 12.4.

The sum total of all this data is worthy of additional note:

More people have better living standards today than ever before in our history. Yet, the percentage of the very poor and very rich has not greatly altered in the last three decades. (PAI)

O Tempora! O Mores! O MGM! Life Just Isn't What It Used to Be

By Jane Goodsell

NOT LONG AGO I came across a portrait of Disraeli and was surprised to see what a poor likeness it was. The nose wasn't as high-bridge as it should have been, and the expression around the eyes was all wrong. "It doesn't look a bit like him," I remarked to a friend.

She looked at me curiously. "How do you know what Disraeli looked like?" she asked.

"Because I saw him in a movie," I answered without thinking.

When I did think, I realized with some astonishment that I hadn't seen Disraeli. I'd seen George Arliss play the role of Disraeli. But back then, when the movies and I were younger, it was the same to me. George Arliss was Disraeli, just as Paul Muni was Emile Zola and Robert Donat was Mr. Chips and Mickey Rooney was Andy Hardy.

Movies were real, more real than life. Life was peopled with shadowy characters who played their roles unconvincingly and seldom looked right for their parts. I never quite trusted Dr. S———, our family physician, because he was neither crusty like Lionel Barrymore (Dr. Gillespie) nor homespun like Jean Hersholt (Dr. Christian).

Then, too, real people had a disconcerting way of switching moods and changing personality, but movie actors stayed dependably in character. Fred Estaire was invariably gay and charming, and Myrna Loy and William Powell (as Nick and Nora Charles in The Thin Man series) were unflaggingly witty and sophisticated. Ronald Colman could be counted on to die nobly and W. C. Fields to keep on tippling.

I LEARNED from the movies how life was lived outside my own limited range of experience. Oh, I know, I know. It was a hoked-up version of life as it never was, but knowing this changes nothing. To this day I carry in my head a kaleidescope of old film clips. They're tattered, faded in spots and absurdly old-fashioned, but I'd be lost without them.

Mention China to me, and my first mental image—is a sequence from "Dragon Seed" of coolies wearing picturesque pajamas and speaking pidgin English as they toil in the rice fields.

I know perfectly well that my mind's eye China is really California—and painted scenery at that. Nonetheless, I have to blink it away before I can focus on the real China of Mao and Chou-En-lai and the Red Guard.

See what you did to me, Warner Brothers? Look at me now, Paramount Pictures and RKO-Radio! Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, I'm your baby! You bewitched me many long years ago, and I haven't been quite right since.

After 16 Months:

Electricians Strike At Coast Shipyards

San Francisco—Shipyard electricians, frustrated by 16 months of unsuccessful effort to get new wage agreements, called a strike that has affected 11,000 workers in yards from the Golden Gate to Seattle and may spread to 4,000 others.

The walkout was begun Nov. 3 by 1,400 members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers who do ship repair work in 13 yards represented in contract bargaining by the Pacific Coast Shipbuilders Association. An additional 450 IBEW members are ready, the union reported, to walk out at 112 other "independent" yards employing about 4,000 union workers.

A spokesman for IBEW Vice Pres. W. L. Vinson said the strike, if it spreads to all yards, would affect repairs on merchant ships in the Viet Nam trade. He added: "We regret having to take this action but the shipbuilders have left us no alternative. We have waited 16 months while costs continue to go up and our members take an economic beating."

No negotiations with the association have been conducted since the walkout started. Regional Dir. Edwin W. Scott of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service named a three-man panel to meet with the disputants, but the talks broke off after a short session Nov. 2.

Union negotiators have been meeting with representatives of the "independent" yards here and in Seattle and Portland, Ore. They said no agreement seems in sight there, either.

The IBEW, reporting that the major employers have "refused adamantly to move" from the wage offer they made 16 months ago to other unions, said wages of shipyard electricians are "far below" those paid by non-shipyard employers, notably in building construction.

"We want a coastwide agreement with the association keyed to today's prices, not those of 16 months ago," the IBEW representative said. "We want a similar agreement with the independents."

He said the union had notified the employers nearly a year ago that it desired to bargain individually, and not with other unions, as had been the practice. The employers challenged its right to bargain separately, but on Mar. 4 the National Labor Relations Board upheld the IBEW position, according to its spokesman.

Meanwhile, the IBEW said, the major employers reached agreement on a three-year pact with other unions providing hourly wage hikes of 10 cents each year, plus welfare benefits, with the first wage increase retroactive to July 1, 1965.

The electricians have refused to accept that settlement on the ground that it does not meet today's living cost needs.

Members of the IBEW operate all electrical equipment in West Coast shipyards, including communications and fire control, they said.

ADDRESS OF WELCOME is read by Gen. Sec. Jose Mora (middle, back to camera) of the Organization of American States at opening session of a meeting of the Trade Union Technical Advisory Committee to the OAS in Washington. Facing him are five of the delegates, each representing the dominant free trade union body of his country: left to right, Joao Wagner, Brazil; AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan, U.S.A.; Alvaro Jimenez Zavaleta, Costa Rica; Jesus Elias Pina, Mexico, and Julio Cruzado, Peru, with Gen. Sec. Arturo Jauregui of the Inter-American Organization of Workers. With Mora are Leo Suslow (left) and Theodore Crevenna of the OAS.

Membership At New Peak In Canada

Ottawa, Ont. — Union membership in Canada reached an all-time high of 1,736,000 at the beginning of 1966, according to a Labor Dept. study.

The total reflected a rise of 147,000 since the start of 1965—or 9.3 percent, the largest percentage increase since the 11.4 percent of 1952.

The Canadian Labor Congress had as affiliates unions with 1,282,000 members, or 74 percent of all union membership. This was an increase of 101,000, or 8.5 percent, over the previous year.

International unions represented 1,220,000 members, or just over 70 percent of the total union membership, the report showed.

The Steelworkers retained their place as the country's largest union with 120,000 members of whom 10,000, or 9 percent, were added during the previous year.

The largest numerical gain was chalked up by the Auto Workers, who had 96,800 members or 19,300 more than a year earlier. The UAW has kept up the same pace this year and recently announced average membership of 102,300 for the first half of 1966.

Third largest was another CLC affiliate, the Canadian Union of Public Employes, which had 89,400 members at the start of the year and has since passed 100,000.

The Confederation of National Trade Unions reported 188,000 members, or an increase of 38,000.

OAS Labor Advisers Set Up 'Watchdog' Unit

A tripartite watchdog committee charged with overseeing compliance in the Americas with the Intl. Labor Organization's covenants on labor rights was set up at a meeting in Washington of the Trade Union Technical Advisory Committee (COSATE) to the Organization of American States.

The committee was charged specifically with keeping an eye on observance of the ILO conventions on freedom of association and collective bargaining.

It was authorized to conduct direct inquiries into charges of violations filed with it, and to publish annually a report of its activities with special reference to the extent to which the conventions are being fulfilled.

Action of COSATE in setting up the committee provides the first machinery for helping legitimate trade union bodies resist repression by political or military dictators in many of the OAS member-states.

The membership will include three representatives each of labor, employers and government, with a government appointee to serve as chairman.

It is expected to work closely with another new committee intended to insure trade union participation in the planning and execution of national development plans.

Duties include regular discussions with planning bodies about "the bases on which development plans are oriented and carried out." There will also be consultation with labor ministries in matters that most affect workers, such as wages, fringe benefits and the utilization of human resources.

McLellan Named

The OAS established COSATE on recommendation of the first Inter-American Conference of Ministers of Labor and of the Inter-American Economic & Social Council. Its function is to offer opinions and suggestions on labor projects of concern to the trade union movements of Latin America. AFL-CIO Inter-American Rep. Andrew C. McLellan represents U.S. workers.

Defiant Pork Packer Ordered to Bargain

Harlan, Ia.—A U. S. District Court judge ordered the struck Western Iowa Pork Co. here to bargain with Local 1225 of the Packinghouse Workers on a first contract and end its defiance of the union's certification. The firm then exchanged contract proposals with the union but filed notice of intent to appeal the court decision.

Federal Judge Roy L. Stephenson ruled after a hearing in Council Bluffs, Ia., that the pork company violated the labor act by refusing to meet with the union, which won bargaining rights in a National Labor Relations Board election last April.

A strike by the more than 200 employes of the company, Harlan's largest industry, started Aug. 18 in protest against management's refusal to bargain.

When the employer brought in strikebreakers Oct. 2 and 3, the strikers countered so effectively that the intended employes gave up the effort and left town. For a brief period, Iowa Gov. Harold Hughes was under Republican attack for failing to mobilize the National Guard against the strikers, the UPWA reported.

But management continued to refuse to bargain, and the union urged the NLRB to act. The board's general counsel concurred and filed a petition that led to the injunction order.

NLRB Counsel David Hols, Minneapolis, told Judge Stephenson that the company conceded Local 1225 was the certified bargaining agent but still refused to bargain. Another year might elapse before usual labor board procedures would force the company to the bargaining table, he said, adding:

"If the matter drags through the courts, it would result in the destruction of the union as the bargaining representative. It would allow the employer to profit from his own wrongdoing."

The NLRB subpoenaed Fred F. Claxton of Denison, Ia., as a witness. He is president of the Associated Employes Organization, unaffiliated, representing 800 to 2,000 Midwest packing plant workers.

Claxton testified that Plant Manager Edward Hannan called him, asking that he protest the election won by the UPWA. Claxton said he replied there were no grounds for a protest since his group received no votes in the four-way contest.

Another union later filed a protest which the NLRB dismissed as without merit, the court was told.

Unions Co-sponsor Housing for Seniors

San Antonio, Tex.—The Building & Construction Trades Council of San Antonio, the city's Housing Authority, and Senior Community Services, Inc., are joint sponsors of a senior citizens housing project involving conversion of the Granada Hotel into a high-rise structure.

The building will contain 250 living units, with monthly rentals starting at $58. A loan from the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development is financing purchase of the hotel.

Office Union President Gets United Fund Post

Detroit — Thelma O'Dell, president of Office & Professional Workers Local 10, has been appointed to the Labor Participation Committee of the United Foundation and at her first meeting was elected its recording secretary.

Eternal Light Film To Be Aired Dec. 11

The fifth annual television drama produced under the auspices of the George Meany Foundation will be broadcast over the NBC-TV network at 1:30 p.m. (EST) Dec. 11, it was announced by Joseph D. Keenan, treasurer of the foundation.

This year's play, "The Liquid Fire," by John Vlahos, dramatizes the efforts of Samuel Gompers, founding president of the former AFL, in behalf of Latin American workers and international labor relations, Keenan said.

The George Meany Foundation is an arm of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America. Its annual TV programs are incorporated into the "Eternal Light" series, presented weekly by NBC and the seminary. Local station listings give the time of broadcast on each NBC outlet.

Food and Housing Costs Found Higher for Poor

The poor pay more for food and housing than their higher-income counterparts, according to the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review.

They pay higher prices for food because few supermarkets are found in poor areas and independent stores—where they are forced to do their buying—charge more whether they are in poor or better-off neighborhoods, according to the survey by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

In the low-income areas, the study found, the meat and produce in the stores tend to be less fresh than in other neighborhoods, and the stores themselves usually are less clean and orderly.

The survey covered New York, Washington, Chicago, Los Angeles, Atlanta and Houston, Tex. It led to the conclusion that "for equivalent rents, poor families get poorer housing than families with higher incomes," the article noted.

In 1960, it points out, housing that was dilapidated or lacked plumbing was the lot of 25 percent of urban families with incomes under $3,000 a year. But only 6 percent of the home owners and 13 percent of the renters were forced to occupy such quarters, it says.

The survey made these points:

- In Houston, nearly 80 percent of the $40-$60 a month apartments occupied by lowest-income families were deteriorated or dilapidated, but only 21 percent of those in the same range occupied by families with incomes in the $3,000-$6,000 bracket were in comparable condition.
- In New York, nearly 12 percent of the $80-$100 a month apartments housing families with less than $3,000 income didn't have complete bathroom facilities; for the $3,000-$6,000 range, the rate was less than 7 percent. All apartments had hot and cold running water.
- In Atlanta, hot water was lacking in half the apartments costing less than $40 a month and occupied by residents earning less than $3,000; among families earning $3,000 to $6,000, only 20 percent of such apartments had no hot water.

3 Union Leaders Join Refugee Group's Board

New York—The presidents of three AFL-CIO affiliates have been elected to the board of directors of the Intl. Rescue Committee.

Named for three-year terms were Pres. David Sullivan of the Building Service Employes, Pres. Paul Jennings of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, and Pres. Paul Hall of the Seafarers.

BACKLOG OF BILLS was signed by Pres. Johnson upon his return from Asia, with the pens he used presented to union leaders active in securing enactment of some of them. At top, he gives AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany one of the pens he used on Aid to Education legislation; center, Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the Communications Workers receives a pen used on the Demonstration Cities bill, and at bottom, Pres. John W. Edelman of the National Council of Senior Citizens gets a souvenir of the Truth-in-Packaging bill signing.

Meetings Moved to Washington:

Westinghouse Strike Widens, Mediators Spur New Talks

Federal mediators got negotiators for the Westinghouse Corp. and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers back to the bargaining table for the first time since IBEW members struck the big electrical manufacturing chain Nov. 1 over contract issues.

The talks moved to Washington, D.C., at the request of Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. This followed company rejection of IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman's offer to call off the strike if management would agree to final and binding arbitration of all unsettled issues.

The IBEW, one of 11 unions that coordinated their 1966 negotiations through the AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining at General Electric & Westinghouse, seeks a national agreement like those granted other unions; a common expiration date for local plant contracts, and narrowing of geographic wage differentials, among other key objectives.

As IBEW contracts expired and additional picket lines went up before Westinghouse plants, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany released a statement adopted by the 11-union committee in support of the strikers and their union.

Pointing out that the committee was established in March to bring about "more genuine and effective bargaining" with GE and Westinghouse on behalf of union workers, the statement said that "in the main that objective has been accomplished" at GE, though important local issues remain unresolved at some locations. It added:

"Westinghouse, however, continues to refuse a just settlement of basic contract issues with the IBEW, one of the founding members of this coalition. . . .

"The IBEW has, therefore, found it necessary to pursue its only remaining recourse by calling a strike of the Westinghouse employes it represents.

'Our Fight as Well'

"We want to make it crystal clear that, individually and collectively, we consider the IBEW's fight our fight as well."

Declaring that the IBEW proposals are "completely justified and eminently fair," the statement emphasized that "IBEW members are entitled to a fair and just contract and we intend to do everything in our power to help them win it."

Besides the IBEW, the AFL-CIO national committee includes the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, which recently reached a national Westinghouse agreement covering 40,000 members; and the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Technical Engineers, Plumbers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers.

The IBEW represents some 14,000 Westinghouse workers but only about one-fourth are covered by a national contract. The others fall under local agreements, which must be negotiated locally.

Other unions in the coalition are on strike over local issues at scattered locations. The biggest was at the Schenectady, N. Y., plant of GE, where more than 10,000 members of the IUE, the Technical Engineers and Plumbers have stopped work.

GE Pact Reached

A national agreement with GE, reached in bargaining Oct. 15, was the first fruit of union cooperation. It shattered GE's "take-it-or-leave-it" approach and was followed by a similar offer from Westinghouse. The IBEW turned it down because it fell short of achieving the key goal of a nationwide contract.

The 11-union coalition was formed at a March "unity" meeting chaired by Meany. The participating unions agreed to coordinate their bargaining efforts this year but separate contract proposals were presented to GE and Westinghouse under their then current contracts.

When IUE held its first meeting with GE, representatives from the other 10 unions were present as observers. Management representatives staged a walkout, but returned to bargain "under protest" while challenging in court the right of the unions to engage in coordinated bargaining.

Meetings continued while GE took its protest to the Supreme Court. When contract expiration dates grew near without a settlement, IUE and the other unions agreed to a two-week contract extension at the request of Pres. Johnson, who cited the national interest.

The 11 unions then reached a settlement with GE on terms of a national pact but some local strikes broke out when plant managers failed to move rapidly enough. Westinghouse then offered national terms which some unions accepted.

The coordinated approach will remain in effect until all contracts are settled, and will be strengthened in the future, the unions agreed. They kept each other informed of daily developments through message centers at 17 key points.

Union bargaining efforts were spurred by reports in late October of profits breaking all previous GE and Westinghouse records.

Board Crackdown Hits Firm's Union-Busting

The Louisville Chair Co. Inc., target of a nationwide "Don't Buy" campaign, has been ordered by the National Labor Relations Board to bargain with the Furniture Workers and reimburse employes for pay losses they suffered in a long strike caused by the firm's union-smashing attempt.

In a 3-0 decision the board sustained a trial examiner's ruling that the company had illegally refused to recognize and bargain with UFWA Local 236, the certified bargaining representative of nearly 300 workers at the Louisville, Ky., plant.

The board found that a strike starting Aug. 17, 1965, was caused by the employer's refusal to bargain, and therefore was an unfair labor practice strike instead of for economic reasons. It ruled also that the employer violated the law by threatening economic reprisals against workers who tried to exercise their right to engage in union activity.

The company was ordered to reinstate all the strikers, stop its unlawful conduct and begin bargaining with Local 236 on the terms of a first contract. Named specifically for rehiring was a union backer who was offered his job back during the strike but declined to cross the picket line.

During the winter and spring of 1965, the union started its third organizational campaign among employes of the Louisville firm, which makes dinette sets. Two other campaigns had been frustrated, the UFWA said, by management opposition.

The union won and was certified by the NLRB on July 16, 1965. Its members walked out when negotiations brought no acceptable settlement, and stayed out until need forced a return to work the following spring.

Meanwhile management hired strikebreakers to keep the plant operating. Such workers must be laid off, if necessary, to make room for discriminated-against employes, the board ordered.

UFWA leaders said the strikers had the strong backing of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., which conducted the "Don't Buy" drive, and the Louisville Central Labor Council.

IUE Wins Vote At Texas Plant

Mineral Wells, Tex.—Workers at the Electric Mfg. Co. here rejected anti-union arguments and voted decisively for representation by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. The tally was 168 for IUE to 116 no union votes.

W. A. Ford, president of IUE Dist. 10, said the union's organizers received "excellent help" from AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Nicholas Kurko and Staff Rep. I. R. Gray.

Meany Defines Role Of American Labor

The role of American trade unions and the part they have played in building a better nation and a better world are defined by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a new leaflet, "Labor's Role in a Free Society."

Single copies are available free. They can be ordered in quantity from the AFL-CIO Pamphlet Division, 815 Sixteenth St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006. Prices, 2 cents each; $1.75 per 100 copies and $14 per 1,000 copies. Checks should be made out to William F. Schnitzler, secretary-treasurer, AFL-CIO.

CWA Pacts Ratified By More Bell Units

New three-year contracts with the Bell telephone system have been ratified by Communications Workers units with more than 124,000 members and an additional 41,000 members are balloting on new pacts, the union announced.

All the agreements adhere to the "pattern" the CWA sought for its members in bargaining that began in June between Bell companies and the CWA. They provide wage hikes of about 7 percent, wage reopening provisions after 18 months, retroactivity for the first time in any CWA-Bell pacts, plus better life, health and hospital insurance programs and improved vacation and pension plans, according to the union.

Ratification has been voted in contracts covering 35,000 employes of Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. in California and Nevada; 5,100 who work for Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of Maryland; and 3,000 workers in Illinois Bell's Chicago traffic department. Another 81,000 Bell system employes are covered under previously ratified pacts, CWA said.

Four other contracts are in various stages of ratification. They cover C & P of Virginia, 7,700; C & P of West Virginia, 4,000; Indiana Bell, 6,900, and Western Electric Co., 23,000 installers whose votes on a second contract proposal will be counted Nov. 16. The installers turned down a first offer in September.

Nearly 18,000 plant, traffic and accounting employes of Michigan Bell also rejected a company offer. That contract is being renegotiated.

Two other Bell contracts have expired but negotiations are continuing. These are for 62,500 Southern Bell employes in nine states, and 13,400 Mountain States workers in seven states.

The union will negotiate for more than 100,000 other Bell workers when their contracts expire this fall and winter.

Maryland Unit Joins Insurance Workers

An unaffiliated union which bargains for the 350 Metropolitan Life Insurance agents in Maryland has voted to come into the AFL-CIO Insurance Workers.

The unity move was announced by Insurance Workers Pres. William A. Gillen and Louis B. Hall, president of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Agents Union of Maryland. Hall's group had at one time been a directly-affiliated local of the AFL-CIO.

Cabinet Post On Transport Goes to Boyd

Pres. Johnson filled out his Cabinet by appointing Alan S. Boyd, currently Undersecretary of Commerce, to head the newly-created Dept. of Transportation.

The appointment of Boyd, 44, is subject to confirmation by the Senate when the 90th Congress convenes in January. The new department brings under single management 31 government agencies and bureaus employing nearly 100,000 persons and spending almost $6 billion in federal funds.

In announcing Boyd's selection, Johnson noted that transportation is "the nation's biggest industry." He described Boyd as the best-qualified person to deal with the problems of "untangling, coordinating and building a national transportation system."

The Maritime Administration remains outside of the new department. It is currently in the Dept. of Commerce and the AFL-CIO has urged that it be made an independent agency.

October Report:

Jobless Rate at 3.9% Shows Little Change

The 1966 pattern of high but not yet full employment continued in October, the Labor Dept. reported. The seasonally adjusted unemployment rate was 3.9 percent. It has hovered about that figure all year, and the change from September's 3.8 percent rate is not considered statistically significant.

Most of the job shifts reflected seasonal patterns. One exception was construction, hard-hit by the tight-money squeeze, where employment was down 80,000 over the month, about 30,000 more than seasonal. It was the fourth successive month of downturn in construction work.

Unemployment normally is lowest in October and this year was no exception. The number of persons out of work dropped 50,000 to 2.5 million, the lowest it has been in nine years and 250,000 below a year ago. Despite a drop in farm jobs, total employment rose over the month by 500,000 to 74.7 million—following the seasonal pattern.

The Negro unemployment rate in October was 7.6 percent, a slight improvement from September's 7.9 percent but more than double the 3.4 percent rate for whites.

Of the persons looking for jobs in October, 840,000 were adult men, all but 80,000 of them seeking full-time jobs. Of the 970,000 unemployed women, over one-fifth were looking for part-time employment. About half the 715,000 teenage jobseekers were in school and seeking only part-time work.

Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics saw the employment statistics and other economic indicators reflecting a tapering off of the rapid economic growth the nation experienced last year. He emphasized that it was not a downturn in the economy, but a less rapid expansion that has brought with it "relaxed pressure" on the job market. There are fewer shortages of skilled labor than several months ago, Ross noted. The length of the average workweek has declined slightly as has the rate of labor turnover.

Most of the October job increase was in retail trade, services and state and local government. Manufacturing employment, which usually declines seasonally by 100,000 from September to October, dropped only 25,000 over the month to 19.5 million. This is one million more than a year ago, with the biggest job gains in electrical equipment (up 240,000), transportation equipment (175,000) and machinery (150,000).

The factory workweek at 41.4 hours was fractionally less than September. Average hourly earnings of factory production workers were $2.75 in October, up 1 cent over the month and 11 cents over the year. Weekly earnings averaged $113.85, a new high and $4.82 above a year ago.

There was no significant change over the month in the 2.4 percent unemployment rate for men, the 4 percent rate for women or the 11.9 percent rate for teenagers.

About two-thirds of the reduction in unemployment over a year ago—from 4.3 percent in October 1965 to 3.9 percent—occurred among those out of work 15 weeks or longer.

During the past 12 months, more than 1 million women entered the job market as compared with only 100,000 men and 150,000 teenagers. Over this period, the armed forces rose 500,000 to nearly 3.3 million, while the civilian labor force increased 1.3 million.

The Labor Dept. estimated that 97 percent of all men aged 25 to 54 are in the labor force and only 2.1 percent of this group is unemployed.

Codfish Fleet Wins Contract, Member Gains

Gloucester, Mass.—A 42-day strike of 400 deep-sea fishermen ended here in a greatly improved contract for members of the port's codfish fleet.

Pres. James Ackert of the Atlantic Fishermen's Union, affiliated with the Seafarers, said that the union not only won most of its contract objectives from the Gloucester Boat Owners Association but also succeeded in bringing 18 formerly non-union boats under contract.

The new pact provides that one half of 1 percent of the proceeds of each fishing trip will be set aside for pension purposes. Trawler crews will be relieved of payments for radar fish-finding equipment after this year, and of payments for sounding equipment after 1967.

The union also won an increase of $1 an hour for work performed in port, and better conditions.

Ackert and Port Agent Mike Orlando, who assisted the union negotiating committee, said the strikers were strongly backed by the SIU's New Bedford Fishermen's Union, the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., and former codfishermen who rallied to the union's support when boat owners refused to agree on terms.

Job Bias Studies Find Negroes Still Making Only Token Gains

Only token job gains have been made by Negroes despite efforts by federal, state and local agencies to put an end to employment discrimination, according to studies made for the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

The studies were directed by Wayne State University and were made by state or local fair employment commissions. Job opportunities studied varied with the locality and covered a diversity of fields. Banking, retail stores, manufacturing, transportation and hospitals were among the industries covered.

Commenting on the studies EEOC Chairman Stephen N. Shulman said:

"Although it is true that many companies have advanced during recent years, from a policy of outright discrimination against non-whites to one of token hiring, it is disconcerting to note the scarcity of employers who have progressed beyond this point."

He said the findings confirm the view "that the federal law's stated purpose of achieving equal employment opportunity for all Americans will not be realized without affirmative efforts by federal, state and municipal commissions in cooperation with employers and community groups."

One study, conducted by California's Fair Employment Practice Commission, concerned the use of tests by industry.

This study rated most of the tests "poor" as an indicator of an applicant's ability to perform a specific job. It found only three companies, all large, whose testing practices could be rated "good," and considered none "superior."

Among the 533 companies studied in the nationwide services, employing more than 386,000 workers, Negroes were found to comprise a smaller percentage of the workforce than their ratio in the population of the area in nearly every case.

Menial Jobs

The findings also showed that even where progress in employing Negroes had been made, they and other minority groups were usually confined to the lowest paying and most menial jobs.

The reports indicated that employers who made an effort to recruit non-white workers succeeded in finding qualified applicants, but only 40 percent of those questioned reported having taken such measures. Most employers said they have no intention of changing their present employment practices.

The report summation warned that existing equal employment laws will have little impact on the present job pattern unless there is an affirmative effort to open up employment opportunities for minority groups.

Shulman expressed the hope that state and local commissions will use the data uncovered for programs "to achieve a substantial increase in the number of job opportunities for Negroes."

Jailed Canadians Fight Contempt Convictions

Toronto, Ont.—Union members serving jail terms for demonstrating against the use of injunctions in labor disputes will ask the Supreme Court of Canada to overturn their convictions their counsel said.

The sentences grew out of a strike by the Textile Workers Union of America, at the anti-union Tilco Products, Inc., Peterborough, Ont. They were imposed after conviction on charges of criminal contempt of a court order limiting pickets to 12 persons, and were upheld by the Ontario Court of Appeal.

The jailed unionists argue that they were not picketing in violation of the injunction, but instead were protesting against laws which allow the use of injunctions in labor disputes.

E. B. Jolliffe, counsel for 24 of the 26 men found guilty, asserted that the demonstration was not covered by the curb on picketing.

The strike, involving 35 women, began in December of 1965. The company promptly obtained an injunction prohibiting picketing which was later modified to restrict it to a dozen persons at a time.

Five protest leaders were sentenced to two months in jail; 20 others were given 15-day sentences and one was given a suspended sentence because of his physical condition.

The Executive Council of the Canadian Labor Congress, at a meeting last month in Ottawa, called on provincial and local central bodies and international and national unions "to engage in vigorous and appropriate activities . . . seeking abolition of the use of the injunction in industrial disputes."

'Impact' Projects Set in 14 Countries

Forty-nine projects under the AFL-CIO "Impact" program have been approved for 14 Latin American countries, according to a report by the American Institute for Free Labor Development, which administers the program.

The projects are of the type that can be financed with moderate-size loans or grants and which can be completed largely with labor in the community. A total of $99,224 has been earmarked largely to pay for materials.

GOP Election Gains Cut Liberal Margin

New Threat Posed To LBJ's Program

in Ohio, Michigan and California, he suggested, played a part in the GOP gain of 13 House seats in those states.

There were these major patterns observable in the voting:

● The much-discussed and threatened "white backlash" to civil rights legislation for the second straight election failed to show up as a nationwide factor, although present in scattered locations.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in a pre-election radio speech urged trade unionists specifically to reject appeals to "hate and fear," which he saw aimed at driving from public life "liberals in both parties." Pres. Johnson in a press conference struck a parallel theme.

Gov. George Wallace of Alabama was successful in getting his wife, Lurleen, elected as his successor, and Republican Claude R. Kirk, Jr., used what are termed "code" phrases for "backlash" in defeating the liberal Democratic Mayor Robert King High of Miami for governor of Florida. California riots in Los Angeles, San Francisco and Oakland played a clear part in actor Ronald Reagan's defeat of incumbent Democratic Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown. But other issues besides simple segregationist appeals played a part in these contests.

On the opposite side, Massachusetts elected a Negro, Atty. Gen. Edward W. Brooke, to the U.S. Senate, moderate Republican Winthrop Rockefeller defeated hard-shouting segregationist Democrat Jim Johnson for governor of Arkansas, and Democratic voters in Maryland deserted the party's candidate for governor, George P. Mahoney, opposed to open housing, and elected Republican Spiro T. Agnew, who favors open housing.

● Four new GOP senators elected—Charles W. Percy in Illinois, Mark Hatfield in Oregon, Howard Baker in Tennessee, Brooke in Massachusetts—are all rated as moderate to moderately liberal.

The most Goldwaterish candidate, Gov. Tim Babcock of Montana, was beaten in an effort to unhorse liberal Democratic Sen. Lee Metcalf.

● The Republicans emerged with at least two new presidential possibilities—Gov. George W. Romney of Michigan, who led the way to a statewide party victory, and Sen.-elect Percy in Illinois—to consider along with former Vice Pres. Nixon.

Reagan, the California winner, is rated by some in this class but he must prove himself as governor in the absence of previous public experience.

● The Republican tide was almost nationwide in scope—but strongest in the traditional GOP heartland, the Midwest, where the party scored almost exactly half its House gains—25 of the net 47.

● The GOP made a substantial advance toward a two-party system in the South, raising its House members from 19 to 28, its senators from two to three and winning two governorships.

In the Deep South, further, it scored gains in state legislatures as a foundation for future operations.

● Regional gains otherwise included, for the Republicans: one governorship and six House seats in the Mid-Atlantic States; two governorships and one Senate seat in the Midwest; three state houses and five House seats in the Mountain States and Southwest; two governorships, one Senate seat and five House seats in the Far West; one House seat in New England.

One governorship remains undecided—in Georgia, where Democrat Lester Maddox holds a lead over Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway, but enough write-in votes were cast for Democratic former Gov. Ellis Arnall to deny a majority to either Maddox or Calloway. Court action has been filed to block selection of the winner by the state General Assembly as presently apportioned.

● Republicans now hold governorships in five of the Big Seven industrialized states—New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan and California—with all it implies regarding influence at the party convention and possible influence in the 1968 election. In the other two Big Seven states, Democratic incumbent Gov. John B. Connally won re-election in Texas and Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois is in the middle of a four-year term.

● Despite the Reagan spectacular in California, it is by no means sure that rightist-dominated Republicanism came out of the elections without a weakened grip.

The organizer of the pro-Goldwater "southern strategy," which gave the former Arizona senator an unshakable bloc of about 270 delegates, John Grenier, was beaten by Democratic Sen. John J. Sparkman of Alabama. Rep. James Martin, another Alabama activist, was outmaneuvered by Gov. George Wallace and failed to win the governorship. Two of the five Alabama districts taken by Goldwaterites were lost this year and one in Mississippi.

By and large the Republicans elected in the Midwest sweep appear to be moderate-to-conservative and fairly typical Republicans, perfectly familiar, and having no observable bent toward rightist causes.

The scope of the Republican victory nevertheless makes undeniable the threat of immediate difficulties for the White House.

The new party breakdown of 248 Democrats and 187 Republicans obviously clears the way for possible re-establishment of the old conservative coalition of southern Democrats and northern Republicans that functioned for a generation before Kennedy and Johnson.

Farm Union Wins DiGiorgio Election, Extends Drive to Smaller Growers

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO farm workers continue to roll up gains on the California farm front, winning a major new election at the giant DiGiorgio Corp. and a significant agreement for still another ballot.

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee was designated bargaining agent on Nov. 4 for both field and shed workers at DiGiorgio's sprawling grape ranches in the Arvin-Lamont area, near Delano. The vote was 283 for UFWOC and 199 for no union, with 72 challenges and three void ballots. Ninety percent of the 618 eligible workers voted in the state-supervised election.

The Arvin victory, coupled with the defeat of the Teamsters last August at DiGiorgio properties in Delano and near San Diego, gives the UFWOC bargaining rights for an estimated 5,000 to 6,000 workers DiGiorgio normally uses during peak times.

The Arvin-Lamont election came after the Teamsters suddenly withdrew from the picture last month.

Meanwhile, a crack in the "small" grower front appeared as the union reached agreement for a Nov. 15 election at the Mosesian-Goldberg-Hourigan grape ranch in Delano.

Ground rules were approved with the aid of the California State Conciliation Service, culminating a strike that goes back to September 1965.

An observer at the negotiations was a representative of the California Association of Employers, a management advisory group whose members include other growers.

Thirty-three Delano growers have yet to accept the collective bargaining concept for their field workers. In the absence of laws making it mandatory, the UFWOC has been forced to fight for it on the picket line.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher has sounded a somber note for the holdout growers.

Growers Warned

"To the extent there is any degree of intelligence and decency among the remaining growers on strike—what has happened here [at DiGiorgio] should be pretty clear handwriting on the wall. DiGiorgio has taken 95 percent of our total interest and attention for the past six months" and this will now be turned to organizing efforts among the other growers, Kircher said.

He warned the growers "they can dictate the terms of how bitter the next few months are going to be" by their readiness to accommodate the farm worker's determination to have a collective bargaining base.

Bargaining with DiGiorgio is due to pick up momentum now that the Arvin-Lamont situation has been settled.

Still undetermined is an election date for the DiGiorgio fruit ranches in the Northern California area around Marysville.

Howard Hague Takes New Government Post

Commissioner on Aging William D. Bechill has announced the appointment of former Vice Pres. Howard R. Hague of the Steelworkers as his assistant for legislation.

Hague, who was USWA vice president from 1954 to 1965, resigned from the President's Committee on Manpower to take his new post, in which he will help Bechill in handling legislative affairs under the Older Americans Act of 1965. Earlier this year he directed the Medicare Alert program as a consultant with the Manpower Division of the Office of Economic Opportunity.

CBS Network Technicians Vote on Pact

New York—Weekly pay scale increases totaling $38 feature a new three-year agreement on which 1,100 engineering technicians of the Columbia Broadcasting System stations are voting by mail ballot.

The technicians, all members of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, maintain audio and visual equipment in CBS stations here and in Washington, Boston, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco and St. Louis.

Lengthy contract negotiations had reached a stalemate when IBEW leaders helped get the parties back to the bargaining table in Washington, D.C. The tentative settlement, agreed to by majority vote of the union committee, calls for an average yearly wage hike of 4.9 percent, along with improvements in schedules, vacations, jurisdictional language and fringe benefits.

Under the pact, the present $212 weekly scale would rise to $220 as of last Feb. 1 and by successive $10 raises every Nov. 1 to $250 by 1968.

Ratification by members will make the term effective for a period ending Sept. 30, 1969.

Council Review Reaffirms AFL-CIO Foreign Policies

Protecting Legislative Gains Vital

The accomplishments of the 89th Congress "must be both protected and broadened" despite the difficulties posed by the results of the elections, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

Terming the 89th Congress the "most progressive" in history, the council said the laws enacted must be safeguarded especially "against the strangulation of inadequate appropriations."

Acknowledging that the election has made this job more difficult, the council pledged that organized labor will not "shirk" its job in this regard. It noted that there is also unfinished business from the 89th Congress that should be completed by the 90th Congress.

The election results, it said, have not changed the problems that face the nation—poverty, racial discrimination, improved education, inequities in labor laws and the challenges posed by an urban America. While some of these problems have been ameliorated "none of them has been solved," the council declared.

Commenting on the elections and the outlook for the 90th Congress at a press conference, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany made these points:

- Organized labor may not "move as fast" in legislative terms

Installers Ratify New CWA Pact

New York—A contract between the Communications Workers and the Western Electric Co. for more than 22,000 Bell telephone equipment installers has been ratified by nearly a 2-1 margin. The same unit had narrowly rejected an earlier settlement.

The nationwide vote was 10-697 for ratification, 6,027 against. A total of 16,742 CWA members cast ballots, according to the accounting firm of Ernst and Ernst, which tallied the vote.

After the earlier agreement was rejected, the parties returned to the bargaining table, made some amendments in the first pact, and the union submitted the revised version to a second referendum with the proviso that a no vote would empower the CWA to call a strike.

Terms agreed to by union and management have set a pattern for

Results Parallel Congress:

Liberal Strength Cut In State Legislatures

By David L. Perlman

Liberal strength in state legislatures receded from its 1964 high-water mark much as it did in Congress as the Republican Party made its political comeback in the 1966 elections.

The outlook in most—but not all—states is for harder sledding for labor's legislative programs over the next two years.

The shift to the political right was not quite as great as the shift in party strength, however. This election year marked the virtual completion of the reapportionment process which has transferred legislative power from the towns and rural areas to the suburbs and cities. And even in states where the GOP captured most of the reapportioned seats, the successful Republicans were often closer in viewpoint to their Democratic competitors than to the conservatives of both parties they replaced.

Reapportionment also brought about the one major Democratic gain in state legislative elections. Connecticut Democrats captured the reapportioned House to win control of the legislature for only the second time since 1876. The old House was 184-120 Republican; the reapportioned House, reduced to 177 seats, will be 117-60 Democratic. And the State AFL-CIO rates the legislative outlook "excellent."

Connecticut was an exception, however. All the other shifts in party control were from Democratic to Republican.

The GOP took both houses of the legislature away from the Democrats in Alaska, Arizona, Maine and Utah.

In Michigan it captured the Senate and achieved a 55-55 tie in the previously Democratic house.

Republicans won complete legislative control by winning Democratic-held lower houses in Colorado, Illinois, North Dakota, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin and Wyoming and by breaking a previous tie in the Ohio Senate.

Finds Past Stands 'Sound, Justified'

By Saul Miller

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has unanimously re-endorsed the federation's positions on foreign policy developed since the merger as "sound" and "justified by events."

The council's review of position statements and convention actions on international affairs opened its fall meeting in Washington. The day-long discussions on 19 different items making up the AFL-CIO's comprehensive views on foreign policy brought the conclusion by the council that labor's positions "have stood the test of time."

The three-day meeting also took a detailed look at the results of the 1966 election and the makeup of the 90th Congress. Despite the difficulties posed by liberal losses, the council said, the accomplishments of the 89th Congress must be both "protected and broadened." (Story this page.)

The council also voted support of strike and bargaining objectives of a number of affiliates and dealt with internal matters of charter application and requests for financial aid.

On international affairs, the council noted that the AFL-CIO has continually re-evaluated its positions for the past 11 years and "will continue to do so." It declared that "our judgment in all cases will continue to rest upon our unalterable devotion to freedom for all men in all places at all times."

Federation Pres. George Meany told a press conference that the council's decision was unanimous on the resolution with an exception voiced by Vice Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky on the question of admission of Communist China to the United Nations. Meany said Potofsky now favored a "two-China" policy of having both Nationalist and Communist China represented in the world organization.

Meany added that the review produced the conclusion that there has not been a single thing that the AFL-CIO has said in the past 11 years "that we wouldn't say again."

Farm Union Wins New Grape Vote

Los Angeles—AFL-CIO farm workers made history again with a lopsided 285 to 38 representation election victory on a so-called "independent" vineyard in the Delano grape district.

The United Farm Workers Organizing Committee thus became the first union to crack the wall of small-grower resistance which precipitated a strike against nearly 40 companies 14 months ago.

The victory, at the Mosesian-Goldberg-Hourigan ranch, appeared to solidify the UFWOC's position in agriculture in the state. Since April, the fledgling union has been named bargaining agent at four big California grape operations connected with wineries, including the pacesetting Di-Giorgio Corp. and Schenley Industries.

The UFWOC also worked with the Distillery Workers to win an election of the winery employes at

IBEW Votes on Westinghouse Pact; Strikes Continue over Local Issues

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers reached tentative agreement with the Westinghouse Corp. on national contract terms but members of seven locals remained on strike until local contracts are settled, the union said.

Achievement of the national agreement was the latest development in the drive for better contracts by 11 AFL-CIO unions that coordinated their 1966 negotiations through the AFL-CIO Committee on Collective Bargaining at General Electric and Westinghouse.

The coalition came to terms on national-level agreements with both big firms, subject to ratification by the members of each local union, but strikes over local issues involving nearly 20,000 union members continued as the AFL-CIO News went to press.

At a meeting of the AFL-CIO committee scheduled for Nov. 18 in Washington, D. C., members of the 11-union coalition were to plan future moves and hear reports on the following strikes over local contract issues:

- Seven IBEW locals with more than 3,600 members in Westinghouse plants at scattered locations.
- Locals of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Technical Engineers and Plumbers at the GE plant in Schenectady, N. Y., where 12,000 workers have been out since Oct. 17.
- The AFTE local at the Pittsfield, Mass., GE plant.

Meanwhile members of 46 IBEW locals were balloting on acceptance or rejection of the national agreement with Westinghouse. The national pact, if approved, has terms applying to all locals. Other provisions involving such issues as sen-

the Perelli-Minnetti Co. near Delano. This is the company that signed an agreement with the Teamsters for its field workers in an effort to avoid recognizing the AFL-CIO Farm Workers. A UFWOC boycott against its products is being pressed.

The Mosesian-Goldberg-Hourigan ranch was regarded as a landmark case because of its labor force character and the possible implications for many growers with similar conditions.

An eligibility list based on May 15-Oct. 28 employment offered a potential vote of nearly 1,500. However, only 377 ballots were cast since most of the work force is hired through labor contractors and hundreds of eligible voters failed to make it to the polls.

Many other independent growers watched the vote with keen interest. A representative of the California Employers Association, a management advisory group, was on hand throughout the proceedings.

Of the 377 votes cast, 49 were challenged — and ultimately not counted since they would not have changed the outcome — and five were rejected. The California Conciliation Service supervised the election.

UFWOC Dir. Cesar Chavez, Assistant Dir. Larry Itliong and Assistant AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Irwin DeShetler headed the organizing campaign.

John Hourigan, a key management figure, said prior to the election that bargaining with UFWOC would commence promptly if the union won.

UFWOC also is bargaining with DiGiorgio for a first contract covering field workers at the corporate giant's grape ranches in Delano, nearby Arvin and Borrego Springs, near San Diego. It recently won another election by a 4-1 margin among workers at the DiGiorgio peanut shed.

iority, job classifications, geographic differentials and job pooling, are negotiated locally.

Wage rates are a major issue at most of the IBEW plants where strikes began as old contracts expired.

Four southern lamp plants have voiced determination to stay out until Westinghouse agrees to improve wages the IBEW called the "worst in the nation"—from $1.75 to about $1.78 an hour. The four plants employ 2,700 IBEW members at Richmond, Ky., Paris, Tex., Little Rock, Ark., and Reform, Ala.

Other Westinghouse lamp plants pay much higher wages, the IBEW reported.

The same union has 2,400 members on strike for better wages at the Westinghouse aerospace facility at Friendship Airport near Baltimore, Md.; 365 striking for improved rates at the Athens, Ga., transformer plant of Westinghouse, and 670 out at the same firm's Cheswick, Pa., atomic fuel facility in a dispute over job classifications, continuous shift operations and job "pooling."

One Expiration Date

A major issue in IBEW-Westinghouse negotiations this year was the union's request for a national agreement like those won previously by other unions. The full objective was not achieved but the IBEW did win a common expiration date covering all 46 plant locations—a major gain, the union said.

IBEW negotiators pointed out that strikes over local issues would not be in effect now if Westinghouse had agreed to a national pact.

Besides the IBEW, IUE, AFTE and the Plumbers, the AFL-CIO National Committee includes the Machinists, Auto Workers, Allied Industrial Workers, Sheet Metal Workers, Flint Glass Workers, Carpenters and Steelworkers. The committee recently received firm assurance of the labor movement's continued support from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

In a statement pledging support for all strikers in unions of the coalition, Meany recalled that the committee was established to bring about "more genuine and effective bargaining" with GE and Westinghouse. It will continue, he said, until the 11-union effort achieves its objectives, now or in the future.

Members of the IAM and UAW at GE's plant in Evendale, O., were preparing to strike over local issues when an 80-day Taft-Hartley injunction was issued by a federal court on the ground that defense work was involved.

GE Pact

The 11-union AFL-CIO coalition was formed at a March meeting chaired by Meany. A national agreement with GE, reached Oct. 15, was the first result of the unions' cooperation. It brought a similar offer from Westinghouse containing major economic benefits.

The national agreements with the two giant electrical manufacturers provide across-the-board raises of 11.5 cents an hour this year and 6 to 12 cents an hour in each of the following two years, plus a formula insuring further increases geared to the cost of living. Also gained were additional raises for skilled trades and salaried workers; pension improvements; a ninth paid holiday and better health and hospitalization protection.

In Pay Dispute:

Machinists' Strike Grounds Air Canada

Ottawa, Ont.—Some 5,200 members of the Machinists walked off the job in a contract dispute and completely closed down Air Canada in the publicly-owned airline's first strike in its 29 years of flying.

The walkout followed inability to agree on a wage increase for the second year of a two-year contract. Union and company negotiators were close to agreement, but a breach developed and widened beyond immediate healing when Richard Geddes, chairman of a three-man mediation board the parties had engaged to assist them, sent a proposal directly to union members instead of channeling it through the bargaining team. The union promptly discharged him.

Geddes' offer, which the company accepted, provided for a 12 percent pay hike the first year plus 12 cents an hour for mechanics, and 6 percent the second year, plus fringe benefits. The union held out for 8 percent the second year plus more ingrade adjustments.

The airline also was willing to reduce the time required to reach the top mechanic's rate from eight years to four years, as the union had demanded, and to four weeks of paid vacation after 18 years of service.

The present rate for top mechanics is $3.17 an hour, compared with $3.70 in the IAM's contracts with United States airlines.

Negotiations for a new agreement began in February in the hope of reaching a settlement without a walkout, as has been the case in the past.

A conciliation board was appointed in August and split when the time came to make recommendations, the chairman of the tripartite group refusing to make any proposals on wages or other economic issues.

Union Committee

Negotiations were carried on in Montreal with a union committee headed by Co-Chairman Mike Pitchford of Lodge 1751, Montreal East, and Rhy Davies, Lodge 714, Montreal West, assisted by Mike Rygus, IAM Canadian vice president.

They broke up when the negotiating committee learned of Geddes' action. Union meetings in Vancouver, B.C.; Winnipeg, Man., and Toronto refused to vote on his proposals unless they were presented by the negotiating committee.

The union represents baggage carriers and radio operators as well as mechanics. Picket lines were immediately thrown up at airports across the country and Air Canada laid off an estimated 4,000 pilots, stewardesses, ticket sellers and sales personnel.

The airline is Canada's only carrier licensed for both domestic and international service. The walkout came at a time when the only other national domestic carrier, Canadian Pacific Airlines, had its spare equipment tied up for annual maintenance and overhaul and was unable to provide additional service.

The union protested to Prime Minister Lester Pearson when the national Air Transport Board, without holding public hearings, authorized five short-haul air carriers to service Air Canada's struck routes. Rygus called the action "strike-breaking" and urged the federal government to rescind it.

10,000 Strike At 10 Plants Of Raytheon

Waltham, Mass.—Pickets from a 10,000-member local of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers marched at 10 plants of the Raytheon Co. in the first strike in the firm's history.

Members of IBEW Local 1505 authorized a strike after more than three months of unsuccessful negotiations. Some 9,500 of them roared their support of union negotiators at a final rally the night of Nov. 13 at Suffolk Downs race track in East Boston.

That was a welcome sign to Local 1505 officers who had returned from fruitless mediation sessions in Washington, D.C., to find that Raytheon management had launched a campaign of newspaper and television appeals to employes to ignore the union and report for work, Business Mgr. James F. Mulloney said.

The strike began that night. The issues are wages, working conditions and contract language. A major union objective is the right to file a grievance over unreasonable work assignments, a right now denied, according to Mulloney.

Philadelphia Orchestra, Musicians Reach Pact

Members of Musicians Local 77 voted approval of a new three-year contract with the Philadelphia Orchestra, ending a strike that began Sept. 19.

The Philadelphia agreement was reached in a 13-hour bargaining session and approved by a 65-63 vote, a union spokesman said. Key to the settlement was a concession by the Philadelphia Orchestra Association on the work-load. The ratification vote was held Nov. 15; the first rehearsal was held the following day and the orchestra season was initiated Nov. 17. Thirty-five scheduled concerts had been cancelled.

The contract calls for not more than four concerts a week, or eight concerts and rehearsals combined; minimum salaries of $225 a week this season, $230 next season and $237.50 the third season, compared to $200 for the three years prior to expiration of the old agreement on Sept. 15.

The agreement also provides five weeks vacation the first year and six weeks the second and third; no more than six weeks of touring a season, and guarantees for the players' pension fund of $5,000 the first year, $20,000 the second and $30,000 the third from the sale of concert tapes to radio stations.

In New York, a three-day strike of Musicians Local 802 against the New York City Ballet ended when a new three-year contract was tentatively approved.

Pres. Max L. Arons of Local 802 said the size of the orchestra, which precipitated the dispute, will be discussed after the first year of the new agreement.

Stephen M. Bailey Dies in Chicago

Chicago — Stephen M. Bailey, business manager of Plumbers Local 130 for 22 years, vice president of the Chicago AFL-CIO and a power in Democratic political circles, died in Wesley Memorial Cancer Hospital of cancer. He was 67.

Bailey joined Local 130, which new has 7,300 members, when he began his apprenticeship in the early 1920s following his discharge from the Navy. He became a business agent in 1928, one of the youngest men ever to hold the post; assistant business manager in 1936 and business manager in 1944. He was a member of the Board of Health and annually led the city's St. Patrick's Day parade.

Surviving are his widow and three sisters.

Walter G. Davis Named New Education Director

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the appointment of Walter G. Davis, assistant director of the Dept. of Civil Rights, as director of the federation's Dept. of Education.

Davis will succeed Lawrence Rogin, who is leaving at the end of November to direct a research project in labor education.

Davis joined the AFL-CIO civil rights staff in 1961 after serving as executive vice president of the Transport Service Employes. He had previously been a local steward, local president and member of the executive board. He served the union also as director of education and research and as editor of its paper.

In August 1965, Davis was granted a leave of absence to go with the new Equal Employment Opportunity Commission as deputy executive director. He helped organize the agency's field program and advised the commission on trade union problems. He returned to the AFL-CIO last Sept. 26.

Davis, 46, was born in New York City and holds a bachelor's degree from Columbia University where he majored in political science and public law. He is married and has three children.

Rogin, a veteran labor educator, has served as director of the AFL-CIO department since 1960, joining the federation after three years as director of labor education at the Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations at the University of Michigan. He had served earlier as education director of the Textile Workers Union of America and the Hosiery Workers.

In leaving his post with the AFL-CIO, Rogin indicated his desire to use his experience in a detailed, long-range evaluation of the current status of labor education in the United States.

Council Affirms Foreign Policy Stands

Finds Past Positions 'Justified by Events'

He reaffirmed that the policies have stood "the test of time."

The positions and actions reviewed by the council included:

Basic Estimate of International Crisis; Struggle Against Colonialism; Support for Programs of Economic Assistance and Development; Support Development of Democracy and Effective Free Trade Unions in Africa, Latin America, etc.; Support the United Nations; For National Defense, NATO, Disarmament and World Peace; For German National Reunification in Freedom and a Free and Secure Berlin.

Additional Subjects

Changes Behind the Iron Curtain; "Peaceful Co-Existence," East-West Trade; Free Trade Union Exchanges with State Company Unions; Recognition of Communist China and Admission to UN; Sino-Soviet Differences; Viet Nam; Santo Domingo; For Peace and Social Progress in the Middle East; Support Expanded International Trade and Reciprocal Trade Agreements; ILO; Build and Strengthen ICFTU, ORIT and Trade Secretariats.

The review of international affairs was placed on the meeting docket at the request of Vice Pres. Walter P. Reuther, but Reuther did not attend the session, wiring that he had to attend instead a meeting of the Auto Workers executive board. Meany noted in reply to a query that Reuther had participated in the work of the council and all AFL-CIO conventions that had adopted the policy positions and had been recorded as in support of all of them.

He noted that Reuther had differed with the majority of the council on the protest walkout by worker delegates to the ILO convention earlier this year, but that was the only difference he was aware of.

On the elections Meany told reporters that although "we didn't win" and lost a number of friends of labor in Congress, especially Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.), the AFL-CIO would continue to "keep moving" to accomplish its objectives. He stressed that labor is never satisfied with the status quo.

The council heard detailed reports from Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller on the outlook for the 90th Congress and from Alexander Barkan, national COPE director, on the election campaign. Barkan was instructed to develop the preliminary figures on the election with special attention to voting patterns in industrial areas and workers' wards for presentation to the next council meeting.

In other actions the council:

- Pledged full support to the strike of AFL-CIO unions against Union Carbide and urged union members not to buy the company's consumer products.
- Backed the bargaining objectives of the Oil Workers for a plan of guaranteed employment for all present oil refinery employes.
- Denied an application by the Airline Employes Association, a branch of the Air Line Pilots Association, for a national charter.
- Voted strike assistance for locals of the Technical Engineers on strike at a number of General Electric plants.
- Endorsed a bond drive being undertaken by Histadrut, the Israeli Federation of Labor, to build economic enterprises in Israel to shore up the nation's economy.
- Voted $25,000 to help strikers at Kingsport Press who are in danger of losing their homes.
- Set the next Council meeting starting Feb. 20 in Miami Beach.

Rubber Workers Set Up Political Education Arm

Akron, O.—Francis A. Maile, a Rubber Workers' international special representative since 1961, has been named to head the union's newly created political education department.

A HERO'S WELCOME to a defeated candidate demonstrated the affection the nation's capital has for Sen. Paul H. Douglas (D-Ill.). Union and senior citizen delegations were among those which greeted the veteran liberal leader at Washington's National Airport after his defeat for re-election to the Senate.

Union Carbide Strikers Supported by Council

The AFL-CIO Executive Council voted full support for current strikes of several unions against the Union Carbide Corp. and urged all affiliated unions to give them their strong backing.

As one phase of such support, the council asked all union members and the general public not to buy the following Union Carbide products:

Prestone antifreeze, Eveready batteries and related equipment, Bakelite Glad Bags and Englander mattresses and sofa beds.

Union Carbide, the council said in a statement, is the nation's 10th largest corporation and has "for years insisted on making unilateral decisions" on pensions, insurance, wage rates, vacations and holidays even though workers in 50 of its plants are organized into locals of 14 international unions.

Last July 2 the giant corporation locked out 1,200 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at Alloy, W. Va., an action ruled illegal by a National Labor Relations Board examiner who took testimony in several days of hearings. The lockout triggered strikes of more than 6,500 union members at 10 other Carbide locations.

Members of the Steelworkers and the Chemical Workers, as well as OCAW members, struck for "decent contracts," the statement noted. It added:

Economic Justice Sought

"The AFL-CIO Executive Council recognizes this struggle as an important part of the continuing effort to achieve economic justice in huge, nationwide corporations which have frustrated that goal in the past by playing one union off against others."

In the lockout at the Alloy plant, the OCAW charged Carbide with trying to force the workers to accept unwanted amendments to a pension-insurance plan that was not subject to bargaining until 1967, in exchange for other contract improvements.

NLRB Examiner George J. Bott ruled that Union Carbide was guilty of illegal discrimination, coercion and refusal to bargain.

Management's whole course of conduct, Bott concluded, was "equivalent to insistence upon union acceptance of an altered pension-insurance plan as a condition of settlement." He said the corporation "insisted to the point of impasse . . . on obtaining a settlement of this nonmandatory issue, and locked out its employes to secure that end."

The strike spread to plants in these other cities after the billion-dollar corporation resisted all settlement efforts: Sistersville, W. Va.; Marietta and Ashtabula, O.; Kokomo, Whiting, Hammond and Speedway City, Ind.; and Portland, Ore.

Need Stressed To Safeguard Gains of 89th

as a result of the elections, "but we will keep moving."

- It will be more difficult to get good legislation from the 90th Congress.
- The AFL-CIO has lived with adverse congresses before and despite the loss of liberal strength in the new Congress there is "something to build on."
- Organized labor is neither pessimistic nor optimistic about the new sessions starting in 1967, and it will fight to implement appropriations for programs adopted by the 89th Congress, revive the campaign for overhauling the unemployment compensation system by adoption of federal standards. Meany acknowledged that the outlook for repeal of Section (14b) of the Taft-Hartley Act was "pretty dim."
- The AFL-CIO is never satisfied with the status quo in terms of legislative and political programs.
- COPE did a good job in the elections, but despite its efforts "some of our members" did not vote for labor-endorsed candidates. A detailed analysis is now underway of the election results, especially in areas where large numbers of union members live, to determine why labor-backed candidates did not get as high a percentage of the vote as in previous years.
- Labor is concerned about proposals to enact compulsory arbitration legislation and its historic opposition remains unchanged.

Oil Workers Backed In Job Security Drive

Efforts of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers to negotiate a guaranteed employment plan for workers covered by its oil refinery contracts have won the support of the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

The council, asserting its long-held concern over the "damaging effects of plant closedowns on workers—particularly those in the middle age groups and with skills not easily transferrable," declared in a statement that "we endorse OCAW's view that these union proposals are feasible and desirable for the future stability of employment" in the petroleum industry.

The council pointed out that petroleum refiners have introduced "many advanced forms of automation" resulting in a "sharp decrease in the number of employes and a rapid increase in the profitability of the dozen big corporations which dominate the industry."

For many years, the statement continued, industry profits "have exceeded the total cost of wages and salaries" while the productivity of the workers continues to rise without interruption.

The council noted that a heavy proportion of men now working in oil refineries have seniority of more than 15 years, and many are in the over-45 age group "where it is difficult to find new jobs" or train for them. It said the OCAW's program is "designed to protect these workers from the disastrous economic effects of refinery closedowns and layoffs."

"The OCAW collective bargaining plan," the statement continued, "calls for a sound plan of guaranteed employment for all present oil refinery employes" and would protect thousands of men "who have given long years of service to their employers and who cannot easily transfer their skills to other jobs, by providing them with an assurance against layoff until they reach retirement age."

Council members said they support the union in its "clear determination to achieve definite progress toward these goals."

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron reported recently that the crucial issue in the union's contract negotiations this year is job security, especially for older members whose jobs increasingly are being eliminated by automation.

At a meeting last spring, rank-and-file oil industry members set this goal in 1966 bargaining affecting 60,000 workers:

"We propose that each contract provide that all present regular and permanent employes be guaranteed continued employment at present or higher status until retirement on adequate pensions."

Text of Council Statement On the 90th Congress

Statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council on the 90th Congress adopted Nov. 15, 1966:

The 89th Congress was the most progressive Congress in history. What it accomplished in the last two years will enrich the lives of all Americans for generations to come.

These accomplishments must be both protected and broadened.

It will be the responsibility of all who cherish this record to insist that the 90th Congress protect all of these new legislative accomplishments and, in particular, safeguard them against the strangulation of inadequate appropriations. In addition, the 90th Congress should complete the unfinished business of progress which the historic 89th Congress left undone.

The election results will make these goals more difficult to achieve. But the trade union movement has never shirked, nor will it shirk, difficult jobs.

The election results have not changed the problems that still face America—such problems as poverty in the midst of affluence; as the persistence of racial discrimination; as the still-unmet needs of the educational system; as the inequities in federal labor laws; as the vast and complex challenges posed by urban America, and many more.

These problems will face the 90th Congress just as they faced its predecessor, for while some of them have been ameliorated, none of them has been solved.

The American people, we firmly believe, are committed to the solution of these problems. Certainly we in the AFL-CIO are so committed, for we are dedicated to the endless quest for the ultimate perfection of American society. We will work with undiminished vigor toward that end, and we are confident that the cause of progress will prevail.

Council Sends LBJ Its Best Wishes

The AFL-CIO Executive Council from its meeting in Washington sent Pres. Johnson a telegram declaring it was "delighted at the good news following your operation."

"You have our heartiest best wishes for an early and complete recovery," said the wire, which was signed by Pres. George Meany.

Foreign Policy Keystone

NEARLY 11 YEARS AGO at the founding convention of the AFL-CIO, the delegates adopted a basic foreign policy resolution that became the keystone for all federation policy positions on international affairs for the years to come.

The principles set out in that 1955 resolution have in the words of the Executive Council "stood the test of time." The following excerpts demonstrate why:

"The united American trade union movement, in common with labor everywhere, has the greatest stake in the preservation of peace and the promotion of freedom. Approaching the international crisis as patriotic citizens and free trade unionists, we have the highest interest in building a world free from all dictatorship, poverty and war.

"The free trade union movement cannot thrive, or even live, without democracy. In view of the enormous Communist threat to democracy, we of American labor face new significant tasks. At this critical juncture of history, we are in duty bound to help our country meet its heavy responsibilities as a powerful force for the attainment of lasting world peace, freedom and human well-being.

"We of the united American labor movement—the AFL-CIO—have three main areas of activities in our efforts to aid our country in the fulfillment of its new historic role. These are:

"1. Through our trade union strength and political actions, help build an ever better and stronger America, a prosperous and progressive land free from economic and social inequity and all racial and every other form of discrimination.

"2. Through democratic processes, help our nation evolve and execute an effective domestic foreign policy.

"3. Through cooperation with and assistance to the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, to aid free labor everywhere in becoming a most powerful force for furthering social justice, national and human freedom, economic well-being and world peace."

A Test for the GOP

THE NEW BRAND of moderate Republicanism will be put to the test in the state legislatures as well as in Congress in 1967.

Many of the Republican gains in the states were achieved by candidates who described themselves as progressives and who advocated programs to meet the needs of cities and suburbs and halt the pollution of rivers and streams.

These needs are great. There is unmistakable need for improved schools, community colleges and state universities. Mental health facilities in too many states remain a disgrace to a civilized society. There is continued need for social legislation to help those ground down by poverty and prejudice.

Republicans have often argued that the federal government can't and shouldn't do everything. This argument is valid only if accompanied by a willingness to fill the gap through state action. Too often in the past, the GOP has ducked responsibility for positive legislation at the state as well as the federal level.

The newcomers to the legislatures should be aware, too, that Republican office-holders who have allied themselves with the needs of working people have won a substantial share of labor votes. The converse is true, also. When the GOP has been linked with punitive anti-labor legislation, including so-called "right-to-work" laws, it has forfeited support and hardened the image of reaction that genuinely moderate Republicans are trying to shed.

89th Congress Acts:

New Laws to Control Pollution Open Way to Clean Air, Water

ALTHOUGH the United States is far from tackling the problems of air and water pollution as vigorously as it should, the 89th Congress, at least, has opened the way to a cleanup of our air and water—one of the major domestic jobs facing the nation.

The story of what has been happening to the air we breathe and the water on which we are so dependent is an old one, but bears repeating:

- Each day nearly 50,000 tons of poisonous sulphur dioxide are added to our atmosphere while our automobiles produce almost 300,000 tons of other pollutants, including poisonous carbon monoxide.

- These pollutants reduce the capacity of the blood to carry the oxygen so vital to the heart; they cause headaches, dizziness, fatigue, nausea; they irritate the eyes, reduce visibility; damage vegetation and irritate the lungs.

- Sulphur dioxide causes respiratory irritation, corrosion of metals, damages crops and has been involved in most of the large air pollution disasters that have hit this and other nations.

- Soot, smoke and fly-ash cause disagreeable odors, soil clothing and painted surfaces, reduce visibility.

Air pollution is no small matter. In 1930, 60 persons died when polluted air massed in the Meuse Valley of Belgium; in 1948, 20 died in Donora, Pa., due to air pollution; in 1952 no less than 4,000 persons died in London, England, as a result of complications caused by pollution-laden fog that especially hit those suffering from respiratory diseases.

To head off disasters such as these, the 89th Congress adopted an Air Pollution Control law which gave the federal government authority to set standards for the control of exhaust from motor vehicles. It authorized the start of a national research and development program for new and improved disposal of the vast quantities of waste that are burned in municipal garbage dumps and fill the air with pollutants.

Obviously, we still have a long way to go to clean up the air we breathe, but we have a start.

Water pollution control is equally vital to the health and welfare of every American.

Every major river system in the United States is now polluted. Wastes dumped heedlessly into rivers have caused the mass death of fish and helped spread water-borne diseases, notably hepatitis. Sewage and industrial wastes have made many rivers a disgrace. Hundreds of millions of dollars must be spent every year by cities and local communities to purify needed drinking water and to provide clean water for industrial usage.

TO MEET these crucial problems the 89th Congress passed a Water Pollution Control Act which provides for establishment and enforcement of water quality standards for interstate rivers; increases federal financial aid for community sewerage projects; authorizes $20 million each fiscal year, 1966 through 1969, for federal grants to states and communities to keep raw sewage from being discharged into rivers and bays.

In addition, the legislation requires each state to establish water quality standards for all interstate water within their boundaries. All states have agreed to accept these provisions and now are at work setting water purity standards which must be met by July 1, 1967.

Congress took further steps in the Clean Rivers Act of 1966, which set up a four-year, $3.4 billion program of grants in aid for construction of waste treatment facilities, nearly six times the annual rate permitted by earlier authorization.

All this would indicate that at long last and none too soon, the American people are tackling through Congress the essential job of preserving the purity of the water on which their lives depend.

The air we breathe, the water we drink—no human society can afford to fool around with these commodities. To do so would mean national disaster. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

Is Struggle to Keep Individuality Behind Nation's Ornery Mood?

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

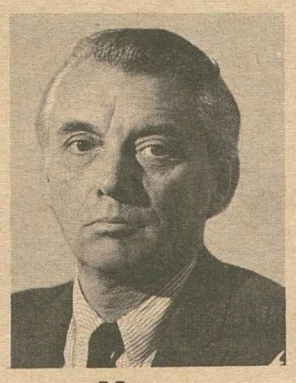
THE COUNTRY has seemed to be in an ornery mood this fall. Perhaps the cornucopia of our material goods has been too full. Are we spoiled? Never has a nation been so rich and powerful. The riches and the power are not evenly distributed and never will be. Still, it is to the federal government's credit that for the first time in the history of the republic, open war has been declared on poverty, though it is being clumsily and hesitantly fought. But the haves seem surly and resentful of this offensive and the have-nots impatient for a miracle over night.



Morgan

It has been an autumn of rising discontent and embittered expectations. Recently a lady — a matron, I think the society columns would call her—cosseted in a fur piece and dripping with jewels, bought a paperback novel for 95 cents at the newsstand of the Plaza Hotel in New York. She complained bitterly when the clerk added a 5-cent sales tax. "A dollar for a paperback?" she demanded. "Why, New York is getting as bad as California."

A couple of weeks ago a publisher of a daily newspaper in Burlington, Ia., was discussing inflation with a visitor. "My wife complains that a loaf of bread costs a nickel more," he said, "but I tell her we've got more nickels than we ever had before to spend."

The negative has risen to out-accentuate the positive, knocking perspective into a cocked hat. There are some 197 million people in the United States today and about 176 million of them are white, or at least non-black, and yet hundreds of thousands of these citizens have taken leave of their senses or at least have forgotten their grade-school arithmetic and allowed themselves to be panicked into ugly moods of reprisal by a non-existent thing called "black power."

Black men and white men are fighting and dying side by side in a place called Viet Nam for the ostensible purpose of protecting the open society, too many doors of which, paradoxically, will remain closed to the Negro American soldier when he comes home.

Protest movements are rising like the yeasty dough of fresh bread on college and university campuses across the country but many of them, instead of serving as the food for inspiration to greater things, are becoming mouldy with a kind of nihilism. Education is America's highest hope and with the mighty impetus that government assistance is now beginning to give it, it should unfurl like a flag, bringing new direction and new purpose to millions who never had the opportunity before. But in this odd and uncomfortable interim, the college population seems to be beguiled with anarchy instead of turned on by the electric principles of the American revolution. In such a mood, students at one of the world's most celebrated universities, Harvard, denied Defense Sec. Robert McNamara the basic constitutional right of free speech and shouted him down when he tried to defend the Administration's policies in Viet Nam. The demonstrators and no doubt the secretary as well would have learned more from the honest exchanges of an impromptu debate.

IT MUST BE ADMITTED—and it would be encouraging if more politicians admitted it—that the frustrations of life in the 1960s are beginning to entrap its promise like weeds choking a new strip of lawn. What on earth can a gross national product approaching three quarters of a trillion dollars mean when mayhem on the highways becomes daily slaughter, as if a collective death-wish had been elevated to a national ritual? How can the bounty and the beauty of the land—coppered and gilded and bronzed now with the elegance of autumn—be preserved even for tomorrow when the air is already befouled, the waters already polluted, the raids on the resources of nature continued with such blatant selfishness that the steal makes Britain's big bank robbery look almost legal by comparison?

Yet, important as they are, maybe these are not the things that are really bugging people. Maybe we are trying to preserve our individualities, rebelling against the computer, the automated machine, the punch-processed identity card threatening to reduce us all to digits and symbols in somebody's programmed programming, whether the buttons are being pressed by big government, big business, big labor, or just big deal.

Winston Churchill once said, you remember, that democracy is the worst possible form of government—except all the others. Politicians and bureaucrats seem to be conspiring to complicate the democratic process even more. Campaigns have become outrageously expensive processes which, by and large, candidates have used to bore constituents to extinction with soggy cliches. Ballots have become so big and incomprehensible in some precincts that a voter needs a radar to guide him.

Nevertheless, against all this, it is quite possible that the republic will survive. The Peace Corps, I am reliably informed, is now considered square among many of its potential recruits. More people, it may be true, are asking not what they can do for their country but what their country has done for them lately and what it proposes to do tomorrow. Still, let us not forget that America is reaching for the moon with one hand and for the serenity and well-being of people with the other. This is a posture of greatness and we must not allow ourselves to fall—or be pushed—off that pedestal.

Strike Ban Set for Review:

State Laws Pushed to Protect Fire Fighters' Union Rights

MAJOR EFFORTS for state collective bargaining statutes covering union fire fighters are a necessity if they are to win improved pay, hours and working conditions, Pres. William D. Buck of the Intl. Association of Fire Fighters said in a network radio interview.

In addition, Buck reported the union's constitutional prohibition against strikes, in effect since 1918, is scheduled for intensive review. He said that formation of a high-level fact-finding and review commission authorized by the union's recent convention is now under way.

The review group will include "representatives of organizations that should know something about the fire fighting services in their communities" as well as union members, Buck said. His statements came as he was interviewed on Labor News Conference, aired weekly over the Mutual radio network.

"Arbitrary public officials" in some areas "must think we are still back in the volunteer fire fighting days," Buck declared, and in some cases "have dared us to strike, knowing that we would not." Collective bargaining statutes, with built-in arbitration proceedings, have given the fire fighters "some relief," he said.

HE SAID there is a widening disparity between professional fire fighters and police officers in both salaries and working hours.

"Our brothers in blue, the policemen," have had a 40-hour workweek "for many, many years," but the average in the fire fighting service is 58 hours.

Such conditions, he said, have "a demoralizing effect" on the professional fire fighter and make it increasingly difficult for communities to recruit young men who can meet the high standards for the job.

Reporters questioning Buck on Labor News Conference, a public affairs production of the AFL-CIO, were Alan Adams of Business Week magazine and Harry Conn of Press Associates, Inc.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A SUBSTANTIAL FACTOR in Republican election gains this year was superior organization and superior financing of campaigns and it is a factor Pres. Johnson must take into account in preparing for the presidential election.

Figures filed with the Clerk of the House are generally considered to reflect a level of campaign expenditures below the realities but the gap between the two parties, as compiled for Congressional Quarterly through Nov. 2, seems unusually wide. In state after state, moreover, campaign managers for key Democratic candidates complained about a difficulty in financing.

On the organizational front the difference in the effectiveness of party operations seems undeniable.

The staff group assembled in 1960-61 for the Democratic National Committee was riddled by reorganizations, by reductions in force for economy reasons, by changes of various kinds.

The Republican National Committee, in contrast, moved quickly to reorganize itself effectively after the 1964 disaster. Dean Burch, handpicked by then-Sen. Barry Goldwater as chairman, was allowed to resign in less than three months and he was accompanied in his departure by the Goldwater executive director, John Grenier of Alabama.

The GOP called on its ablest state chairman, Ray C. Bliss of Ohio, as the new national chairman. Bliss delights in terming himself just a "nuts and bolts" party tactician.

The fact remains that he developed the Big Cities program, arguing that the Republicans had to get candidates and issues with which to increase their share of the city and suburban vote. The fact remains that in 1958 he argued hard against a state committee endorsement of a pending "right-to-work" proposal, warning that it would jeopardize GOP statewide candidates. The state committee ignored him, and Democrats were elected as governor and senator.

Whatever else the election results show, perhaps including what Pres. Johnson referred to as the American people's "way of balancing things," Bliss is clearly entitled to consider his GOP organizational job a highly-expert operation.

Organization counts for a good deal in politics even on a national level, despite the fact elections are decided on state and local levels, for the simple reason that candidates need a central point of reference. The money-raising potential of well-staffed national committees is obvious.

LOOKING IN PERSPECTIVE at individual elections, it seems perfectly clear that Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller of New York was confirmed by his re-election as an influential force in Republican Party affairs.

Rockefeller publicly removed himself as a potential presidential candidate but he remains a leader while Goldwater, Burch and Grenier—whose delegates heckled and booed the New York governor mercilessly in 1964—are out.

Florida voters kicked away the election of the ablest Democratic candidate for governor who has emerged in years, Mayor Robert King High of Miami.

High's defeat was made more regrettable by the sloganeering campaign waged by the victorious Republican, Claude Kirk, Jr., of Jacksonville, all about crime rates in Miami and "Your home is your castle—defend it." The slogan will neither reduce crime nor halt the urgency for open-occupancy housing programs.

The Republican governor of Kansas, William H. Avery, lost his re-election bid largely because he pushed through state income tax increases to improve the schools, and didn't explain it very well.

Age and too much voter familiarity with candidates played a part in some state elections, including California, Illinois and Michigan, where Gov. Edmund G. (Pat) Brown, Sen. Paul H. Douglas and former Gov. G. Mennen Wililams all became defeated Democrats although all have had fine public records.

LAGGING PAY and long hours make it increasingly difficult for communities to recruit fire fighters who meet the high standards for the job, Pres. William D. Buck (center) of the Intl. Association of Fire Fighters told reporters Harry Conn (left) of Press Associates, Inc., and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine on Labor News Conference, broadcast weekly by the Mutual Radio Network.

State Legislatures Follow GOP Trend

Labor Goals Face Tougher Obstacles

also have Republican governors.

In Delaware, the GOP took the House and gained an even split in the Senate, although the vote of a Democratic lieutenant governor there leaves effective control with the Democrats.

Previously all-Democratic legislatures were split by Republican capture of the lower houses in Indiana, Iowa and Washington.

One obvious result of the election will be a renewed drive by the National Right-to-Work Committee, already emboldened by the failure of the congressional 14(b) repeal effort, to add to the 19 states which have outlawed the union shop.

The "work" forces were on the defensive during the past several years, with Indiana repealing its union shop ban and repeal bills passing the lower houses in Iowa and Wyoming.

Republicans were badly burned on the "right-to-work" issue in 1958 and the attitude of some newly-elected GOP legislators may depend on the length of their political memories. In a number of states, AFL-CIO leaders say they have sufficient commitments from moderate Republicans to vote against "work" laws to nullify that threat. But in several states, labor anticipates a hard-fought battle on the issue.

Enactment of the federal minimum wage improvements during the last session of Congress is giving impetus to labor-initiated campaigns to raise state minimum wages, most of which lag behind the federal level, and to enact minimum wage laws in states that do not have them.

Likewise the failure of Congress to set federal standards on amount and duration of unemployment insurance will bring a renewed drive to make improvements in state laws.

Improvements in workmen's compensation and collective bargaining laws, including strengthened bargaining rights for public employes, are other goals high on most state labor agendas.

Five states did not elect legislatures this year—Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, New Jersey and Virginia.

Pattern Set by Congress

Of the 45 that did, the party gains and losses with some exceptions followed the congressional pattern. GOP gains were greatest in the Midwest, lowest in the East. Republicans picked up seats in most southern legislatures but control remained firmly in the hands of conservative Democrats. The GOP ran strong in the Mountain States and picked up seats in the West. The Republican capture of the governorship and congressional seat in Alaska was matched by a takeover of both houses of the legislature. The Democratic sweep of major offices in Hawaii was matched by the party's victories in the legislature.

States in which significant legislative changes took place are listed below. Recounts or delayed tallies may change some of the figures but are not likely to affect party control.

ALASKA—The Republican sweep captured both houses of the legislature, with the Senate shifting from 17-3 Democratic to 14-6 Republican. The GOP took the House, 22-18. Some moderate Republicans had labor endorsement and anti-labor legislation is unlikely.

ARKANSAS—Democrats maintained strong control and reapportionment has increased liberal strength. Legislative outlook "the best in years," the State AFL-CIO reports, with good prospects for a state minimum wage law.

ARIZONA—Republicans took both houses away from the Democrats as well as electing a governor. It is the first time since statehood that the GOP has controlled the legislature.

CALIFORNIA—Republican gains narrowed Democratic control to 42-38 in House and 21-19 in Senate. Labor not optimistic about legislative progress under Reagan administration.

COLORADO—Republicans captured House and held on to Senate. House switched from 41-24 Democratic to 37-28 Republican. One salvage to Democrats was victory of Mark Hogan for lieutenant governor over an ultra-conservative Republican. Most Republicans in legislature not identified as conservatives and labor anticipates "reasonably good relationship" with new legislature.

CONNECTICUT—Reapportionment led to Democratic capture of House and the party also increased its Senate majority. It is the first time since 1959 and only the second time since 1876 that the Democrats have held both houses. The old House was 184-120 Republican; the new House, reduced to 177 seats, will be 117-60 Democratic.

State AFL-CIO reports: "Because of reapportionment, this year's election marks a shift of legislative power from the small Republican towns to the big and medium-sized cities, most of which are controlled by Democrats. The outlook for labor and liberal legislation is excellent."

DELAWARE—Massive Republican gains in state brought GOP control of the House and a tie in the Senate. The House switched from 30-5 Democratic to 23-12 Republican. The Senate, previously 13-5 Damocratic spli, 9-9. However the state's Democratic lieutenant governor can break the tie to save his party's control. Outlook described as "rough" for major labor-sought legislation.

FLORIDA—GOP made substantial gains in reapportioned legislature as well as taking the governorship. Conservative Democrats control both houses.

HAWAII—It was a good year for COPE-backed candidates as Democrats retained firm control. Reapportionment gave 19 of 25 Senate seats to Oahu, the most populous island which includes Honolulu and is the center of AFL-CIO strength. COPE-endorsed candidates won 39 of the 51 House seats and 17 of 25 Senate seats. Labor's legislative goals include improved education, consumer protection, tax reform and better administration of workmen's compensation.

IDAHO—Republicans maintained firm control of the reapportioned legislature. State is a possible "right-to-work" battleground with moderate Republicans in Senate holding balance of power.

ILLINOIS—Republicans captured the Illinois House to win control of the legislature and strengthened their majority in the Senate. House shifts from 118-59 Democratic majority, achieved under a unique at-large ballot two years ago, to a reapportioned 99-78 Republican. A holdover Democratic governor leaves open the possibility of moderate progress—or stalemate.

INDIANA—Republicans captured control of the Indiana House and won most of the Senate seats at stake, although holdovers leave the Democrats with a 31-29 margin in the upper house. The GOP took the House, 66-34, ending the first Democratic-controlled legislature since 1936—one which repealed the state's "right-to-work" law soon after taking office.

IOWA—In a massive turnabout, the Iowa House switched from a 101-23 Democratic majority to 89-35 Republican control. The Senate remained Democratic, with a 32-29 margin despite GOP gains. Legislative outlook "not very promising," State AFL-CIO comments.

KANSAS—Reapportionment and election of Democrat Robert Docking as governor helped the Democrats pick up five seats in the House, although the GOP maintained firm control. The reapportionment ends long-time domination by rural areas, however, and the State AFL-CIO is "hopeful that labor's program will be received with a better understanding" and that attention will be paid to needs of urban areas.

MAINE—While Democrats captured the governorship and picked up a congressional seat, they lost both houses of the legislature which had gone Democratic in 1964 for the first time in 54 years. The House, formerly 81-70 Democratic, now is Republican by 94-57; the Senate switched from a 29-5 Democratic majority to 25-9 Republican.

MARYLAND—The legislature remains heavily Democratic, with a majority of its members having COPE endorsement, as did the new Republican governor.

MICHIGAN—The statewide Republican sweep gave the GOP 20-18 control of the Senate, previously 23-15 Democratic, and a 55-55 tie in the House, which had been 73-37 Democratic. It may mean, the State AFL-CIO says, "a slowdown in aid to education, mental health, labor legislation and other programs which were vastly bettered in the last two years."

MINNESOTA — Conservatives slightly increased their control of the state's officially non-partisan legislature and the State AFL-CIO takes a dim view of the legislative outlook.

MISSOURI—Both houses remain firmly Democratic and reapportionment cut conservative influence.

MONTANA—GOP captured the House, 65-39; Democrats retained Senate with a reduced 29-26 margin.

NEBRASKA—Eight of 13 COPE-endorsed candidates were elected to Nebraska's 50-member, single-house legislature, including three union members. But the overall control remains conservative.

NEVADA—Republicans made gains in reapportioned legislature, which has slim Democratic majority and bipartisan conservative control.

NEW MEXICO—Republicans gained seats in reapportioned legislature but Democrats still control. New Republican governor had a good labor record in the legislature and State AFL-CIO sees likelihood of cooperation between governor and legislature in many areas.

NEW YORK—Democrats kept lower house, Republicans held on to Senate. However Democrats elected a clear majority of delegates to a Constitutional Convention which will write a new state constitution for submission to the voters.

NORTH DAKOTA — GOP swept back into 82-16 control of the House, which had gone Democratic two years ago for the first time in history, and tightened the GOP hold on the Senate. Legislative outlook for labor described as "dim."

OHIO—Republicans solidified control of the House and captured the Senate, 22-11, to break a 16-16 tie. State AFL-CIO Pres. Frank King, the Democratic leader in the Senate, won re-election. But the GOP will have clear sailing on legislation.

OKLAHOMA—Besides taking the governorship for the second time in a row, Republicans made gains in the legislature although Democrats have a solid majority. Only 27 of the 99 House seats were contested by the Republicans. But the GOP won 17 of these, including the seat of the veteran Democratic speaker.

OREGON—The GOP picked up six House seats, strengthening majority to 38-22. Senate remains 19-11 Democratic but effective control is in hands of a conservative coalition. "Labor's role continues to be difficult," State AFL-CIO notes.

PENNSYLVANIA—A small GOP pickup gave Republicans a paper-thin majority in the previously Democratic House. The GOP lost a Senate seat but kept control. However 28 of the 50 senators had labor endorsement, as did 104 of the 203 House members. State's Republican platform described as "the most liberal" in Pennsylvania's history.

RHODE ISLAND—Labor "tremendously successful" in elections for reapportioned legislature as Democrats kept strong control.

SOUTH DAKOTA—Republicans gained 19 seats in the House, 10 in Senate to strengthen control and more than wipe out Democratic gains of two years ago. Labor's legislative prospects "minimum."

TEXAS—Little change in heavily Democratic party lineup but redistricting may have made Senate "almost liberal." Labor's legislative goals, including a state minimum wage law, given "a chance of passage."

UTAH—Republicans took both houses away from the Democrats. GOP majorities are 22-6 in the Senate, 59-10 in the House.

WEST VIRGINIA—Democrats retain firm majorities despite GOP pickups. But State AFL-CIO comments: "With only 18 of 34 senators and 38 of 100 House members endorsed by COPE, coupled with a lame-duck governor, outlook for labor and liberal legislation appears dim."

WASHINGTON — Republicans captured previously Democratic House, winning big in newly reapportioned districts. Democrats held on to Senate.

WISCONSIN—Republicans gained six seats in lower house to win 53-47 control and held on to firm Senate majority.

WYOMING—Republicans took over House, 35-26, and strengthened control in reapportioned Senate, further dimming chances for "right-to-work' repeal.

Total Vote Sets Off-Year Record

In numbers and percentages, the voter turnout this year set a record for a mid-term election — even though less than half the potential voters went to the polls.

The total vote of nearly 56 million amounted to 48.3 percent of the potential, according to the count by United Press. Intl. In 1962, the last off-year election, the comparable figures were 51.3 million persons and 46.5 percent of the eligible voters.

In the 1964 presidential election, 70.6 million persons went to the polls, 62 percent of the electorate.

Abel Asks National Parley:

Massive Drive Urged To Fill Social Needs

New York—A "concerted and massive attempt to end the basic social cancers" besetting the country and "a formidable assault on social and economic stagnation" were urged by Pres. I. W. Abel of the Steelworkers in a speech before the Economic Club of New York.

Abel cited a "growing awareness" of society's needs as expressed recently by union and industrial leaders, and added:

"Perhaps the time has come for the President to convene a summit conference involving the leaders of Congress, top industrialists, representatives of organized labor and other influential Americans.

"Such a meeting might take a cold, hard look at where we are and where we are going.

"It might consider adopting a program for a Great Society through which we could actually obtain the freedom to pursue happiness, an equal sharing of the tax burdens and an equal sharing of our prosperity."

Abel's proposal followed a warning that a "too rapid" rise in profits at the expense of other segments of the economy is causing an imbalance that could disrupt the entire economy.

"No one can deny that trouble will develop if real wages continue to fall short of productive growth," he declared.

Profit Boom Hit

"Our failure to check profit inflation can most certainly result in a serious recession. It is this disparity of income that is causing the worker, the consumer and the poor to revolt."

The Steelworkers' president reiterated labor's traditional support of democratic capitalism, but charged that "our form of society is not presently serving the general welfare of all the people."

City ghetto riots he described as "the product of endless years of hopelessness, exploitation, frustration and the denial of at least a chance to get a turn at bat in the game that is dominated by the more affluent white players."

"It is not easy," he went on, "to comprehend the vicious cycle of poverty that has provided succeeding generations of children only with an inheritance of more poverty, more lack of opportunity and more inferior education."

In a time of "rising expectations" and "expected deliverance" on the promises of America and "free enterprise," Abel said, "legitimate questions" are being asked that call for answers.

Why Poverty?

"If this is the richest country in the world," he demanded, "who's got the money? Why are 34 million human beings living in poverty? Why are Negroes enslaved in rickety old schools and cursed with inferior educational facilities and disheartened teachers? Why are so many families hungry? Why must this country officially declare a War on Poverty?

"In the greatest era of prosperity that this nation has ever experienced, the gap between the 'haves' and the 'have-nots' is growing wider and wider. And those on the short end of the stick are becoming painfully aware of it. The leaders of the free enterprise system and the responsible leaders of the trade union movement are today facing a severe test."

Abel said the "summit meeting" he proposed might set up a new set of priorities and also demonstrate "a willingness and a dedication and a commitment" to them—"the same kind of unhesitating commitment that we give to appropriations for national defense, space exploration and the building of supersonic planes."

"Through joint action perhaps we can finally certify that human beings are made not for the purpose of serving an economic system but to be served by an economic system," he said. "And if we accept that truth and begin to do something about it, we may head off a threatening social disaster."

Specifically, Abel urged reevaluation in the light of changing social and economic conditions of the rights of minorities; the "plight of the dispossessed;" the adverse effects of industrial technology on workers, their families and communities; the "responsiveness to the rights and needs of people," and a sharing of economic progress.

"Our future contribution to the good and welfare of America, as labor representatives, as businessmen, as industrialists or as government leaders," he concluded, "is directly related to the adequacy of our response to these vital issues of our age.

"I sincerely believe that America is capable of measuring up to the task at hand. The power of free men in a free society is a formidable weapon. We have the resources and the capacity to do it. All we need is the will to carry it out."

Performers Prepare For Network Strike

Two key entertainment unions were armed with strike authorization in a dispute with the nation's big radio and television networks over contract renewals.

The Television & Radio Artists (AFTRA) represent almost everyone who appears before a microphone, including announcers, performers, newscasters and sportscasters. The Screen Actors Guild (SAG) bargains for actors who make filmed television commercials.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, union members continued at work beyond the Nov. 15 expiration of their contracts on a day-to-day basis. AFTRA's executive secretary, Donald F. Conaway, warned that "a strike is inevitable unless there is a change in the management point of view."

AFTRA is seeking pay raises for all categories of network employes, definite hours and overtime provisions for news personnel and higher pensions for staff announcers.

SAG, whose members overwhelmingly authorized a strike in a nationwide mail referendum, is seeking higher fees for acting in TV commercials and for re-use of the films.

A network strike would not affect locally-produced programs, but it would largely eliminate live and newly-taped network shows. The two unions are negotiating jointly.

The 17,500 AFTRA members who would be affected by a strike range from bit performers in soap operas to nationally-known news commentators, disc jockeys and entertainment stars.

One new feature sought by the two unions is extra payment for relays of television performances to a worldwide audience through the communications satellite, a new development since the last contract was written.

In a touch of international solidarity, unions in other nations pledged support for SAG and AFTRA in the event of a strike.

British Actors Equity said it would prohibit any of its members from making commercials for use in the United States if a strike is called and ban the use of British commercials in the United States.

Earlier the Association of Canadian Television & Radio Artists and European entertainment trade unions took similar action.

The two U.S. unions are negotiating with advertising agencies and independent producers as well as the networks—American Broadcasting Co., the Columbia Broadcasting System, the National Broadcasting Co., and the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Georgia Governor Vote Enmeshed in Litigation

Georgia remained without a governor-elect as a three-judge federal court wrestled with the legal problems raised by the failure of either Democrat Lester G. Maddox or Republican Howard H. Callaway to win a majority of the vote.

Maddox received slightly more than 47 percent of the vote in the Nov. 8 election, Callaway slightly under. Former Gov. Ellis G. Arnall received about 6 percent of the vote, write-ins from Georgians who could not stomach either the extreme segregationism of Maddox or the Goldwater Republicanism of Callaway.

In most states, Maddox would have been the winner with a plurality. But Georgia's constitution requires a majority vote to elect a governor and throws the election into the legislature if no candidate has a majority.

The American Civil Liberties Union blocked that procedure with a motion for a court injunction against action by a malapportioned legislature.

The federal court agreed that action by the legislature would be unconstitutional and issued an order barring it. But the order did not specify how the impasse should be solved.

Open Vote Sought

The civil liberties organization has asked the court to permit a wide-open election in which any candidate might run. Callaway's supporters have urged a runoff election limited to the two top candidates, with write-ins barred. A group supporting write-in privileges in any runoff argued that a Negro voter would be deprived of his rights if he were forced to vote for a segregationist candidate. And Maddox has expressed the hope that the choice of governor would be made by the legislature.

Meanwhile Gov. Carl E. Sanders said he will stay in office after Jan. 10, the normal inauguration date for a new governor, if the issue has not been settled by then.

Hatters' Leader Mendelowitz Dies

New York—Labor and management joined here in final tribute to Vice President Abraham Mendelowitz of the Hatters. He died at 72 after almost a half-century of union service.

Pres. Alex Rose delivered a eulogy on behalf of the union and Samuel Lish of Lish Brothers spoke for employers at services in the Riverside Funeral Home.

Mendelowitz joined the union after migrating from the Ukraine in 1915 and was active in fights to keep Communists and then racketeers from taking control. At his death he was co-manager of the union's Millinery Joint Board, chairman of the union-industry welfare fund, and a leader in charity drives. in addition to being an officer of the international union.

His widow and three children survive.

ABC Wins Unit In Automat Chain

Philadelphia — Local 6 of the American Bakery & Confectionery Workers has been recognized by Horn & Hardart, the Automat restaurant and bakery chain, as collective bargaining agent for 650 of the firm's bakery and commissary employes. The union was certified after a cardcheck by the American Arbitration Association.

Installer Unit Ratifies New CWA Contract

CWA settlements with other Bell System companies. The three-year Western Electric pact called for wage increases averaging 7 percent with a reopening on money items permitted after 18 months; retroactivity for the first time in any Bell contract with CWA; and improvements in life, health and hospitalization insurance, vacations and the pension program.

The installers also won an increase from 50 percent to 75 percent in company payments toward health insurance costs.

The Western Electric ratification brings more than 150,000 CWA-represented workers under the union's 1966 bargaining pattern. Contracts for more than 200,000 others will be negotiated as old pacts expire in the next few months, the union said.

CWA Pres. Joseph A. Beirne reported that a recent agreement covering 4,000 employes of the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co. of West Virginia has been ratified, and that tentative agreement has been reached with Southern Bell benefitting 62,500 workers in nine states.

Beirne has called the Bell contracts the best the union has ever negotiated in the communications industry. They provide wage increases ranging from $3.50 to $8 a week in wages, and fringe benefits paralleling those in the Western Electric pact.

Additional settlements reached to date include those with Ohio Bell for 18,000 workers, Northwestern Bell for 17,500, Illinois Bell for 2,000, New Jersey Bell for 7,700, Wisconsin Bell 6,600 and Pacific Northwest Bell 13,500.

Lake Central Airline Group Gets First Pact

Chicago — A first contract between the Air Line Employes and Lake Central Airlines has been ratified by a 12-1 margin.

The 38-month agreement provides raises of $100 to $175 a month over the contract term, with station and cargo agents eligible for a top salary of $650 per month, reservation and ticket agents for a $635 top. Other improvements include eight paid holidays per year, with double time and a half for those working on holidays, and three weeks' vacation after 11 years.

Under the agreement, employes required to wear uniforms will be paid a $6 monthly cleaning allowance, and will be furnished with raingear and similar protective clothing at the company's cost. Split shift assignments were eliminated and night shift premiums of 12-18 cents an hour agreed to.

ALEA won a National Mediation Board election last May among 400 reservation, ticketing station agent and ramp service employes of Lake Central, which serves 46 cities in eight states and the District of Columbia. It is a unit of the Pilots,

New Group To Combat Extremists

A new national organization has been formed to combat the "merchants of fear," extremist "hate" groups of the radical right and the radical left.

An immediate target of the Institute for American Democracy will be the John Birch Society and the interlocking directorate of extreme right-wing groups in the Birch Society's orbit.

A committee of 48 prominent leaders in religion, public affairs, education, labor and business is sponsoring the institute. Its chairman is Dr. Franklin H. Littel, president of Iowa Wesleyan College and a Methodist clergyman who served in post-war Germany as a religious adviser to the U.S. high commissioner.

Dr. Littel told a Washington news conference that his experience in Germany and elsewhere convinced him that extremists can't be dismissed as harmless "kooks." Both the Communists and the radical right leaders "are playing for keeps," he warned, adding that "they are flesh eaters."

One of the tasks of the new institute, he said, will be to provide local groups with facts to combat extremists who try to take over parent-teacher associations, schools, town councils and library boards and who seek to discredit religious, trade union and civic organizations.

Selling Fear

He warned that the Birchers and the groups they dominate are engaged in a "lavishly financed effort to sell a predetermined set of fears and prejudices to the American people."

As a result of these efforts, Dr. Littel said, thousands of Americans "tend to live in a world reflected in the 10,000 weekly radical right radio broadcasts, the scores of radical right newsletters and hate sheets and magazines. . . . Once they are hooked by the radical right propaganda barrage, they often develop into fanatics, distrusting all other sources of information including not only newspapers and television but schools and churches as well."

In many communities, he noted, "extremists have made life miserable for good citizens—through spying, nocturnal phone calls, economic and social pressure, stonings, even bombings."

The institute's chief contribution, he said, will be the "full time, day-in, day-out methodical correction of record, exposure of unworthy tactics and focusing of the national conscience on local

He was operated on successfully at the National Institutes of Health, but must be brought back when he is a little older for another bout of surgery that will enable him to live normally.

Firemen OK Pact, Others Negotiating

Chicago—The Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen have approved a contract agreement with the nation's railroads providing a 5 percent wage increase and other improvements.

The acceptance, coupled with a similar settlement earlier in November by the Railroad Trainmen, brought to 175,000 the number of rail workers covered by agreements reached in the current round of wage negotiations.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert said the union's general chairmen, representing members on more than 150 railroads, voted to accept the settlement "in principle" and authorized a nine-man negotiating committee to work out the details of contract language with representatives of each road.

The BLF&E settlement, like that of the BRT, calls for an across-the-board pay raise, retroactive to August 12. Gilbert said firemen, engineers, hostlers and hostler helpers represented by the union also won an improved vacation plan and correction of certain inequities in holiday pay.

For engineers, the increases will average $1.50 a day for men in yard service and $1.40 for those in freight service. Applied to firemen, the raises will result in these new average basic daily rates:

Passenger service, $21.30 a day; through freight service, $24.11; local freight, $24.54; yard service, $25.73 a day for a five-day week; engine hostlers, $26.01.

Rail management made similar 5 percent wage offers to 14 other unions involved in three separate sets of negotiations. The Switchmen submitted the proposal to membership referendum, with ballots due at union headquarters Dec. 12, SUNA Pres. Neil Speirs said.

The Railway Conductors & Brakemen, unaffiliated, announced

Home Start Rate Shows Sharp Drop

Housing starts dropped to a 20-year low of 80,000 units in October with union economists blaming the tight money policy for boosting interest rates to record highs and drying up sources of mortgage funds.

The month's starts were at an annual rate of 848,000 units, the first time the figure has dropped below the 1 million mark since November 1946—right after World War II—when 975,000 starts were reported, the Commerce Dept.'s Census Bureau said.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. in a recent "position paper" charged that the Federal Reserve Board's action in raising its discount rate and increasing the permissible interest rate that commercial banks can pay on certificates of deposit started an interest spiral "throughout every segment of the economy."

"If this policy of tight money is allowed to continue," the department warned, "it will surely lead to an unnecessary recession or depres-

2 Radio-TV Unions Win New Contracts

New York—Fee increases as high as 20 percent and other major benefits were won by two entertainment unions with nearly 35,000 members in negotiations with national television and radio networks and advertising groups.

Bargaining jointly on new three-year contracts covering performers who make TV commercials, the Screen Actors Guild and the Television & Radio Artists reached tentative agreements that headed off nationwide walkouts by their members on the American, Columbia and National broadcasting systems and the Mutual radio network.

AFTRA also negotiated separately for network newsmen who make transcriptions for rebroadcast, and for station staffs including announcers, news and sportscasters and performers. Agreement in principle was reached for performers in prerecorded taped commercials but talks are continuing on local contracts for stations in New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and Washington, D. C., a union source said. One local agreement was reached—for Cleveland, O.

The agreement marked a breakthrough in the coverage of AFTRA newsmen for the first time in a master national agreement, negotiators reported.

Members to Vote

Details of the settlement were not disclosed pending submission by AFTRA Exec. Sec. Donald F. Conaway to national board members, after which the proposals were to be voted on by members.

The new pacts were reached after members of both unions had approved strike action. They stayed at work beyond the Nov. 15 expiration date of their contracts while bargaining continued five more days with network negotiators, the Association of National Advertisers and the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

In Hollywood, the SAG reported

October Price Rise Cuts Worker Buying Power

The cost of living as measured by the Labor Dept.'s Consumer Price Index moved up four-tenths of 1 percent in October—the ninth straight monthly increase—making a further dent in the average factory worker's purchasing power.

Nearly all consumer goods and services increased in price last month except groceries, which moved downward two-tenths of 1 percent. Increases were registered for housing, clothing, medical care, automobiles and other items.

The CPI at 114.5 means it cost $11.45 in October to purchase items worth $10 in the 1957-59 base period. The October index was 3.7 percent higher than a year ago with indications that living costs will average out for all of 1966 at about 3.5 percent higher than a year ago.

After-tax earnings of factory workers were up 11 cents a week to $100.65 for workers with three dependents, but the price increases rubbed out the gain so that the real purchasing power dropped 22 cents a week.

The real purchasing power of a factory worker's paycheck was $87.90 in October 1966, the department reported, compared to $88.12 in September 1966 and $88.80 a year ago October.

Seasonal declines in fruit and vegetables and a drop in pork and poultry prices sent grocery costs down. But overall food prices were up slightly because of a rise in the cost of restaurant meals.

AFL-CIO Unions Extend 3-Year Organizing Gains

AFL-CIO unions broke all recent yearly records for organizing success in fiscal 1966.

For the year ended last June 30, affiliated unions won 3,159 representation elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board—the highest number in 13 years—and took part in 5,461 elections, also the greatest number for the period.

The percentage of wins was 57.8, highest since fiscal 1956. As a result, AFL-CIO unions were certified as bargaining agents for 243,994 workers—the highest such number in seven years.

The fiscal 1966 figures were assembled from monthly NLRB reports by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization, which noted that they followed sharp gains in 1965 and 1964 in every category—the number of elections, number won, percentage of elections won, and number of persons covered. In fiscal 1964, affiliated unions had established a post-merger record for the number of persons newly represented, and compiled the second best score for the number of elections participated in and the number won, the analysis showed.

Department Dir. William L. Kircher said the record constituted "a three-year demonstration that AFL-CIO unions are organizing more, and are organizing more effectively."

Appeal Denied In Canadian Injunctions

Ottawa, Ont. — The Supreme Court of Canada has refused to hear an appeal from the conviction of 25 Peterborough, Ont., union members involved in anti-injunction demonstrations at the plant of Tilco Products, Inc.

Twenty of the laborites have since completed 15-day jail sentences they had started before the appeal was filed. Five others were sentenced to two-month terms.

All were convicted of violating an injunction limiting to 12 the number of pickets at the Tilco plant, where the Textile Workers Union of America was on strike. Their counsel maintained at the Supreme Court hearing that they were not picketing in support of the strikers, but were protesting against the use of injunctions in labor disputes.

The court turned down the appeal petition just as the convention of the Ontario Federation of Labor, which had backed the strike and joined in the fight against the convictions, passed a resolution calling for the outlawing of injunctions in strikes.

In a speech at the convention one of the jailed demonstrators, Robert Sarginson of Steelworkers Local 5009, Peterborough, compared the harsh treatment he and his colleagues got with the $100 fines imposed on the killers of striking Lumber & Sawmill Workers at Resor Siding, Ont.

sion and will even have an adverse effect on our international relations."

The abruptness of the drop, from 1,070,000 units in September and 1,411,000 in October 1965, was startling to most observers. The Northeast was hit hardest, with the annual rate dropping from 196,000 units in September to 114,000 in October. In the North Central states it fell to 224,000 units from September's 277,000 starts. Smaller declines were registered in the South and West.

Prospects for the immediate future indicated no improvement. Building permits, which are required by about 12,000 local government units and are a sign of construction starts in the month or two after their issuance, were granted at an annual rate of 719,000 in October, down about 2 percent from the 733,000 in September.

In another federal report, sales of new single-family homes in September were reported down 32 percent from September 1965.

The BCTD position paper called on the incoming Banking & Currency Committees in House and Senate to investigate "the basis for arbitrary control of money and banking by a few with no checks and balances," and for "an immediate study of the detrimental effects of this Administration's tight money policy on not only the construction industry, but also on all other facets of our economy."

"We in the construction industry are being maneuvered into a depression," the statement declared. "We realize that we will not go in alone. We know that every segment and sector of industry after industry will go with us. We can stop this now if we let our views be known."

Federal housing experts voiced the belief that the home construction depression has "bottomed out" and predicted that as more mortgage funds become available, building will be resumed.

The government undertook to boost the supply of money when Pres. Johnson authorized the Federal National Mortgage Association to raise $550 million through the sale of debentures.

Spokesmen for the home building industry, however, said they could foresee no material improvement before the middle of next year.

Sam P. Ming Dies; Led Grain Millers

Los Angeles — Sam P. Ming, founding president of the Grain Millers, died in retirement here at the age of 74.

A former flour mill worker in Seattle, he became active in the trade union movement and served the American Federation of Labor as an organizer for more than ten years.

In a message of condolence to his widow, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Sec-Treas. William F. Schnitzler said he had brought "the first awakening and enthusiasm for trade unionism to thousands of workers throughout the Midwest and Far West." He took this "same zeal for good" with him the message noted, when he became first president of the Grain Millers on its chartering by the AFL in 1948. He retired from the post in 1960.

Funeral services were scheduled here for Nov. 25.

2 Radio-TV Unions Win New Contracts

that its videotaped and filmed commercial agreements will bring players three annual increases totalling an estimated $5 million a year.

Executive Sec. John L. Dales told a membership meeting at the Hollywood Palladium that agreement had been reached on most of the major objectives sought from the makers of commercials.

Typical of the increases gained this year, he said, were raises in the basic fees from $105 per on camera commercial to $120, and from $80 to $90 off camera.

All use and re-use fees were increased substantially, Dales reported. In the Class A program category covering use in more than 20 cities, similar raises were won plus substantial increases for additional uses in each 13-week cycle.

Boosts in spot commercial rates ranged from 13 to 20 percent. Fees for 13 weeks' spot use in New York were raised from $230 to $260 on camera, and from 150 to $180 off-camera.

"One of the most important gains is the institution of a system of 'holding' fees which insures payment to a player in a commercial of at least one session fee—$90 or $120—every 13 weeks, whether or not the commercial is used, as long as the sponsor retains the right to use the commercial," Dales told the meeting.

For the first time, the Guild negotiated minimum fees for foreign use of American commercials. Two sessions fees—$240 on camera, $180 off camera—must be paid for use in the United Kingdom; one additional session fee for the rest of Europe, and an extra session fee for other foreign uses, Dales said.

The contract contains many other increases, all of which are retroactive to Nov. 16 if ratified in a national referendum. Ballots will be mailed to members during the week of Nov. 28.

SAG Pres. Charlton Heston reported that for the first time, Guild members now earn more than $100 million a year under contracts negotiated by their union. Of that amount, more than two thirds come from television, and more than half of TV actors' income is from commercials, he noted.

Earlier this year, Heston, said, SAG took the "unprecedented" action of filing a brief supporting the contention of the Federal Communications Commission that the networks are abdicating their responsibility to viewers.

"We took this action," he said, "because we feel the actor is being shortchanged—not only creatively but commercially. If the networks are determined to devote the largest part of their energies to extracting the last possible dollar from the makers of the underarm deodorants and filter cigarettes they peddle, and the smallest part of their energies to the creative content of the programs that peddle them, then we believe actors are entitled to a larger share of that dollar."

Sears Boycott Stepped Up by Retail Clerks

Locals of the Retail Clerks, prompted by the international union, plan a sharp step-up in "don't buy" activities at Sears, Roebuck & Co. stores in all parts of the country during the week of Dec. 5.

In a drive planned to remind Christmas shoppers that organized labor is boycotting the nationwide chain of retail outlets, the RCIA planned to expand picket lines and intensify handbill distribution.

The increased activity will be carried out with the cooperation of local union label councils, the RCIA said.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. strongly urged all segments of organized labor to give renewed support to the campaign.

He recalled that the AFL-CIO Executive Council expressed itself as "convinced that Sears, Roebuck & Co. is engaged in a calculated and concerted effort to deprive its employes of their rights to union protection," and called on all union members and their friends not to patronize the firm's stores.

Bassett Retires as Head Of Los Angeles Labor

Los Angeles—W. J. "Bill" Bassett has resigned as secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO County Federation of Labor after 23 years.

The 61-year-old Los Angeles labor leader said the resignation was based on "strictly personal" reasons. He had been elected to a new two-year term just last June.

His retirement was reluctantly accepted by the 37-man county federation executive board. Nominations for a successor were scheduled for Dec. 19, with an election, if necessary, Jan. 16.

Bassett resigned as a vice president of the California AFL-CIO last August, declining to run for re-election.

During his tenure as secretary-treasurer, the Los Angeles central labor body became one of the largest in the AFL-CIO, boasting 458 affiliates with a membership of 500,000.

Bassett, who came up through Mailers Local 9, was designated by his executive board to stay on the job pending selection of his successor.

In a 2,000-word resignation letter voicing his regrets at leaving the post, he summarized the growth of the Southern California labor movement from a scattered fragment of trade unionists to a powerful, cohesive force in the community's life.

Bassett came to Los Angeles in 1922, after disastrous post-World War I strikes virtually wiped out every union in the area.

He joined the Mailers Union and became active in its affairs in 1929, when he was made chairman of a special organizing committee. He advanced through the chairs and became local president in the mid-1930s.

Trades Council Official

He became a business representative and later executive secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles Printing Trades Council. In 1941, he was elected chairman of the area's first permanent labor political organization, embracing all unions and councils under the title United AF of L.

Bassett ascended to the secretaryship of the old Los Angeles Central Labor Council Nov. 16, 1943. His resignation came precisely 23 years and one day later.

PROBLEMS TO BE DISCUSSED at the AFL-CIO General Board meeting are reviewed by Federation Pres. George Meany, Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler. The Washington session heard Biemiller on the legislative outlook for the 90th Congress, Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger (standing left) on economic policy and wage-price guideposts and Organization Dir. William L. Kircher (standing right) on organizing problems and the progress of the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee.

Rail Firemen Approve 5% Wage Pact

they had reached an impasse with the carriers and circulated strike ballots among its general chairmen. Both sides then requested the National Mediation Board to enter the dispute.

Two other groups of AFL-CIO rail unions are going through mediation—five non-operating unions negotiating jointly, and six shopcraft unions. The Locomotive Engineers, unaffiliated, are negotiating with each railroad.

Non-Op Talks

Chairman G. E. Leighty of the non-operating group said some bargaining sessions have been held but no carrier proposal has been made to his group—the Railway Clerks, Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation - Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen and the Hotel & Restaurant Employes, for dining car crews.

The shopcraft unions have a committee headed by Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept. bargaining for the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, Sheet Metal Workers and the Firemen & Oilers.

The BLF&E was one of five unions of on-train workers seeking contract improvements they called long overdue.

Gilbert said that the management offer ratified here provides three week of vacation after 10 years of service, instead of the former 15 years. An additional three cents per day was added to the pay rates of firemen in local freight service. A grievance involving some employes who were being denied holiday pay was corrected, he said.

Application of the five percent wage increase to the average basic daily rates of firemen, Gilbert said, will produce daily boosts of $1.01 in passenger service, $1.15 in through freight service and $1.18 in local freight service; $1.23 for yard service (based on five days a week) and $1.24 for hostlers, also for a five-day week.

Under the law, the BLF&E can serve new wage notices Sept. 1 for the contract period beginning Jan. 1, 1968, its spokesman said.

Kohler Strike Veterans Split $4.5 Million Fund

Milwaukee, Wis.—The final chapter in the historic strike of Kohler workers of Sheboygan, Wis., is being written as checks totaling $4.5 million are being mailed to the former strikers.

The checks are part of the settlement in the 12-year dispute between Auto Workers Local 833 and the plumbing fixtures firm which found that its anti-unionism was costly.

On the basis of the settlement, reached Dec. 17, 1965, Kohler turned over to the National Labor Relations Board $3 million for back pay to the strikers and $1.5 million for restoration of pension rights.

The total of $4.5 million is the largest amount of money ever collected by the NLRB in settlement of an unfair labor practice case dispute or similar settlement ever negotiated in the history of labor-management relations.

The checks are going to 1,349 former strikers, including 400 who have now gone back to the Kohler plant. They range from $33 to $14,000.

The largest check—$14,389, not counting tax deductions—went to 79-year-old Charles Bergoch of Sheboygan. A Kohler employe since 1935, he retired during the strike as a matter of economic necessity. He was reinstated Oct. 26, 1965, on the union's insistance so he would be eligible for back pay.

After tax deductions, 80 of the former strikers received $5,000 or more.

Final Act

"This is the final act of a drama we hope will never be played again," UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazey said in Detroit. "The cost was high and we can only pray that American industry will remember Kohler if anyone ever again suggests a union-busting course.

"While I am thankful that so many members of Local 833 will finally receive their back pay, which they so richly deserve, I cannot forget the injustice inherent in the situation. No one should ever have to wait 12 years for recompense. As a matter of fact, a number of beneficiaries of this settlement died long before these checks were mailed out. Thus they received no compensation at all."

In these cases, the checks are going to the estate.

The final settlement came only after the U.S. Supreme Court on Oct. 11, 1965, refused to consider a Kohler appeal from a decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia which had upheld the NLRB.

The actual strike lasted from 1954 to 1960, but was followed by five years of litigation. It took the government board nearly another year to figure out the amounts of back pay each individual striker was entitled to.

Labor historians have considered the dispute the longest—and probably the bitterest—in modern times.

Foreign Airline Crews Pledged Engineers' Aid

San Francisco—Air line crew members from other nations who are left stranded in this country were assured of help by the Flight Engineers annual convention here.

The 60 delegates—including representatives of the union's units in Holland, France, Australia, Israel and Pakistan—voted to give individual crew members "every possible assistance" and to support their cause in any dispute with their employers.

Donald Trott of the Boeing Co. described to the delegates the firm's new 747 "jumbo jet," which will carry some 500 passengers and two pilots and is expected to triple the flight engineer's productivity.

Exec. Vice Pres. and Sec.-Treas. Harry S. O'Brien was re-elected without opposition and was tendered a surprise testimonial dinner The term of Pres. William A. Gill Jr., does not expire until next year.

In recognition of the international character of the union, which has units in eight foreign countries, it was voted to hold the 1967 convention in London.

Progress in the Vineyards

FOURTEEN MONTHS AGO grape workers in California struck 40 companies, determined to win union recognition and decent pay and working conditions.

Today, after months of sacrifice and dedication, these men and women are on their way to building a solid trade union movement of farm workers in California. Banded together in the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, they have won representation elections in the four major grape operations as well as at smaller firms.

And they have done it without the protection and machinery afforded other American workers—the National Labor Relations Board. The act setting up the NLRB does not cover farm workers. So, if there are to be elections among these field workers, they have to bring the companies around to consenting to the balloting. There is no government agency involved that can order elections or conduct them; the workers must win the right to choose a bargaining agent, using whatever devices come to hand.

THE GRAPE WORKERS' courage and dedication have been supported by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates. Manpower and finances to aid the strikers have been provided. The labor movement at large has rallied to the cause, including the broadcasting of boycott campaigns against growers who resisted a fair election procedure.

The labor movement of California has demonstrated its complete involvement in the grape workers' cause. It has raised money, picketed, demonstrated, and made it clear that the grape workers were not alone; that this was a battle of all workers to help those most in need win the basic dignity that comes with unionism and the improved conditions that come with a collectively bargained contract.

Other groups in the community have rallied to the side of the grape strikers—religious, fraternal and civic. The battle between the large growers with their vast holdings and the poverty-line farm workers has caught the attention also of the mass media.

THE GROUNDWORK for the present surge of success in bringing unionization to farm workers was laid many years ago. There were a number of attempts to bring unionism to the exploited and browbeaten farm workers, but they fell short. The growers exerted their naked power to break early attempts and the work force was loosely knit and migratory. The various campaigns helped improve wages in some areas, but the power of the growers to dictate terms continued.

In 1960 the AFL-CIO established an organizing committee that chalked up important gains in raising wages but fell short of winning meaningful and lasting union recognition. While this effort in the California fields continued the AFL-CIO launched a determined and successful campaign to end the government policy allowing importation of farm workers. With imported labor removed as a source of strikebreakers, organizing campaigns picked up momentum and today the UFWOC is breaking new ground.

There is a long way to go, however, before the basic standards of American life are extended to farm workers. Organizing and collective bargaining are essential to this effort and will continue to spread with AFL-CIO support. But they must be aided by a revision of the nation's laws to give the farm worker the same protection extended to other workers—the right to hold bargaining elections, full minimum wage coverage, protection of unemployment and workmen's compensation laws. This is essential to further progress.

Catholic Bishops' Statement:

Housing, Jobs, Education Key To War on Poverty, Race Bias

The following is excerpted from the text of the pastoral statement of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops on race relations and poverty adopted at its meeting in Washington.

THESE ARE turbulent days, marked by severe social strains and civic clashes. We are grateful that much progress in civil rights legislation has been made in recent years. Laws have been passed to eliminate discrimination in our nation and to open voting to all. We urge the vigorous use of all legal means to assure their prompt implementation.

Comprehensive programs to eradicate poverty have been begun. We ask for strong and continuing support for them.

However, the great task of changing the hearts of men on the subject of equal rights for all requires more than laws and programs. It needs above all a true sense of neighborliness, based upon a religiously inspired conviction that all men are equal before God and that all should be welcomed in our midst.

We note with sorrow that civil strife is an ever-present danger. There have been riots in our cities. Racial antagonism has been fostered under many emotionally charged and irrational slogans. Moreover we are still confronted with the depressing problems of poverty, joblessness, and urban and rural slums.

As American citizens we deplore the fact that such conditions exist in a nation so endowed with wealth. As Christian leaders, we must repeat the constant refrain of recent popes, and of Vatican Council II, that material goods are held in stewardship for the welfare of all men. Destitution and degrading, avoidable poverty hurt family life, blight the promise of youth, and lead to a bitter harvest of sickness, delinquency and crime.

Open discussion of these problems is the beginning of their solution. It is our hope that all our Catholic people will join with their Christian and Jewish brothers, and indeed with all men of good-will, in common projects which affirm and realize the dignity of all men.

Second, we ask that a concentrated attack upon poverty be mounted upon many fronts. This is a complex problem and its solutions are equally complex. There is work that can be done by individuals, by religious groups, and by community organizations.

Other aspects of this problem require strong governmental intervention at appropriate levels. We wish to suggest certain objectives that seem to us paramount at this time and which require adaptation to different places in their application.

Foremost among these is the quality of education given to the poor. The poorly educated child and the school drop-out face life with almost insuperable handicaps. Communities should be concerned about the quality of teachers, schools, guidance programs, and the supplementary aids needed by all our children.

Next we should be concerned with the type and quality of assistance available to poor families. Where welfare relief is necessary, it should be given in a context that favors family stability.

Such programs should help maintain the father in the home and be joined, where need be, with training facilities to enable the unemployed to secure gainful work. These programs should offer incentives to part-time or temporary employment, often refused today because of regulations that penalize such efforts.

A KEY CONCERN is job opportunity. This problem has two main facets: realistic training joined with proper motivation and the willingness of employers to hire and promote without discrimination. Unions likewise should open their membership rolls to all without discrimination.

We especially commend those employers and unions which have agreed to take affirmative actions to secure a fully integrated working force. Such open attitudes best express the Christian response to racial discrimination.

Finally there is the problem of adequate housing. Millions of Americans live in overcrowded, substandard homes. Under such conditions, it is difficult to promote sound family life, to encourage education or to bring about stable, peaceful neighborhoods.

Our citizens, our civic groups and our churches should be eager to use the opportunities they now have to promote low-cost housing for the poor, to build well planned public-housing units and to rehabilitate run-down neighborhoods.

But this is only part of the task. As our nation becomes increasingly suburban, industry and service occupations are expanding far more rapidly in the suburbs than in our inner cities. We cannot hope to solve the problem of joblessness in our cities if men and women are denied the opportunity of living near places where work is available.

We urge support for sound programs to assure equal housing opportunities for all, without discrimination based on race, creed or color.

Morgan Says:

Host Nations Sometimes Find Tourism Strains Human Nature

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

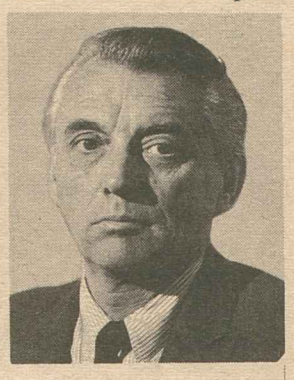
THERE IS NOTHING like a vacation to refresh and confuse you. But that's life in this frenetic age of jets and fringe benefits. I can remember when a vacation was a rarity but simple to take once you got it. Now it is standard procedure but it involves an army of thousands to plan it, confirm it and get you through it. No wonder some people barely survive.



Morgan

Time was when you simply loaded up the old flivver with camping equipment and fishing tackle and chugged off to the mountains or the seashore, rarely if ever more than 100 miles from home. Now it is unthinkable, virtually, to travel less than 1,000 miles, one way, even for a weekend outing and it is far more prestigious and image-building to be able to blow into the office on Monday morning and remark casually that the movie they showed as the in-flight feature on the plane from London was a bomb or that the snack service on the jet from Jamaica was really not up to par.

Thanks to a durable secretary, travel agents, airline representatives, solicitous stewardesses, hospitable hotel managers, National Park Service guides, car rental agencies, customs service personnel and credit cards, I have been fortunate enough to have spent a week in the sun on an island in the Caribbean—St. John in the Virgin Islands, to be exact.

I am still enough of a country bumpkin to be thrilled—and I used that glib, dog-eared travelogue term advisedly—at new sights.

The Caribbean is not totally alien territory to me. I have explored several pieces of its insular real estate and the green water in between before. But St. John is different. It is about to celebrate its 10th anniversary as the Virgin Islands National Park, which means that this particular property does not resemble Miami Beach South or Waikiki Beach East or countless other resort areas that have been so hideously commercialized and despoiled.

The tourist business has become an important part of the gross national product of almost any country that can boast at least one picture-postcard view. With the burst of post-World War II prosperity in most of the western world, the jet airliner and especially the restless well-being of the expanding American middle income classes, tourism has expanded so fast just in the last 20 years that even the average traveler makes Marco Polo look like a shut-in.

Travel, some sage once accurately said, is broadening. But it can also be cheapening as fair-weather promoters. admittedly not without risk, but with shocking short-sightedness and greed, reach for quick profits in the vacation trade.

Fortunately for St. John, the philanthropy and foresight of one of the nation's leading conservationists, Laurance S. Rockefeller, has saved it from becoming a kind of Coney Island of the Caribbean. The park was created in 1956, when Rockefeller presented 5,000 acres of land on St. John to the people of the United States. True he has something of a vested interest in it as he has in Grand Teton National Park in Wyoming, to which the Rockefeller family also donated a large piece of land to encourage its establishment. For in both Grand Teton and on St. John, Rockefeller operates resorts. They are not exactly moneymakers, however. His Caneel Bay Plantation on St. John, for example, spends an estimated $6 per guest per day for water.

Though its tropical growth is magnificent (and protected), the island has scant rainfall and much of the water for human use has to be shipped in from as far away as Puerto Rico.

BUT THERE ARE other paradoxes in paradise. Pirates used to prey on sailing ships in the Caribbean, after the gold and other treasure they were carrying back to Spain and other countries of Europe. Then slaves were brought to the islands from Africa.

Now, centuries later, the region contends with the mixed blessings of western civilization and, lately, the prosperty which the incredible growth of the tourist trade has contributed to it. The native population is not unanimously cheering these developments. A certain sullenness of attitude is sometimes apparent; even perhaps, now and then, a downright resentment of visitors.

Some observers might say they were not so "grateful" as they should be for new job and other opportunities. Others could suggest they were apprehensive over the inevitable changes in their simple ways of life. Still others would see a belated impact there of the civil rights movement, generating an impatience turned somewhat bitter by the sight of well-healed, well-fed tourists enjoying so much more material riches than they themselves.

The enduring point in all this seems to be that the wealth and power of our material growth is changing our very surroundings far more than we may suspect—and while it is necessary to preserve nature it is also necessary to understand the strain to which human nature is being subjected.

Size Creates Problems:

Gardner Offers Plan To Streamline HEW

THE DEPT. of Health, Education & Welfare, which was established only 13 years ago, is now second only to the Defense Dept. in size.

An indication of the growth of the department is the fact that in the last two years HEW has launched more than 40 programs in the fields of education and health alone.

The President has asked HEW Sec. John W. Gardner to review ways "of streamlining the department and making it more modern, efficient and economical in its operation."

Ever since the department was first created it has been considered one of the difficult agencies in the government to administer. Its many and varied subdivisions cover so many areas of concern that it gives the appearance of the shotgun. Sen. Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.), when he resigned as secretary of HEW, called the department "unmanageable."

Gardner has now come up with some recommendations which, Johnson says, are "worthy of very serious consideration."

The secretary has proposed to the President the establishment of three sub-cabinet departments in HEW, each headed by a secretary. There would be a Dept. of Health, Dept. of Education and Dept. of Individual & Family Services. The last would include both social security and family welfare as well as other programs.

"This will reduce the number of line agencies reporting to the secretary of HEW from eight to three," Gardner said. "It will give each of the three primary fields a stronger national voice and greater prominence and, at the same time, it will keep the three fields closely related under one management and in the position where they can work very closely."

Gardner said that in HEW's study of reorganization "we have discovered there isn't any other way to get at the complex programs of poverty, the problems of the cities and the other complex problems that face us today without interrelation of these three fields."

THE SECRETARY, in discussing overall problems in his jurisdiction, was particularly concerned about health manpower.

"There isn't any other problem which is a more serious barrier to the achievement of health goals of the American people than the serious shortages in health manpower," he said.

Gardner noted that the problem has been a real one for 20 years and the federal government has programs to train doctors, dentists and nurses.

"One of the most serious shortages is in the nursing field," the secretary continued.

One approach he suggested was to bring back to the field some 300,000 nurses who are still licensed. Refresher programs are now being offered for nurses as well as medical technologists.

HEW and the Labor Dept. are working together to produce twice as many health workers in such fields as practical nurses, nurses' aides and laboratory assistants.

Gardner said he was also disturbed by the "shocking" figures in infant mortality. Johnson noted that we rank 11th in this field, losing "40,000 more babies each year than we should."

There are also more than one million children who need eye glasses and can't afford them, he noted and pointed out, in addition, that there was an urgent need for dental care for children from low-income families.

"I am going to recommend legislation—and I have discussed this with the President—for a new program of grants to experiment with new ways of providing children with health services, new ways of training child health workers," he said.

Washington President Says:

Organizing Is Still a Challenge To Most Highly Unionized State

ORGANIZING the unorganized remains a major challenge to the labor movement even in areas that have already reached a high level of union membership, a top West Coast labor official said.

Pres. Joseph Davis of the Washington State AFL-CIO said that despite the fact that his state is "pretty well organized right now," there is still a good union growth potential, particularly among public employes and white collar and farm workers. Washington has the nation's highest percentage of union membership.

"In the area of public employment, we have fast expansion of not only employment, but . . . of organization into unions," he said. "The economic boom itself, of course, is bringing many people into all of the trades and our total movement is growing."

Davis was questioned by reporters on the weekly AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, Labor News Conference, over the Mutual radio network.

DAVIS DISCOUNTED the effectiveness of any renewed "right-to-work" drive in Washington and the announced intention of the National Right-to-Work Committee to step up efforts for anti-union shop laws throughout the country.

He pointed out that proposals for so-called "right-to-work" legislation have twice been defeated in Washington "by good substantial votes —in 1956 and 1958." The recent election, he added, won't give the state's anti-union forces "any comfort at all . . . because virtually every man who ran for the legislature, from both parties, was committed against consideration of a 'right-to-work' law."

Questioning Davis were Stanley Levey, labor reporter for the Scripps-Howard newspapers, and Sam Sharkey, labor specialist for the Newhouse Newspapers.

UNION GROWTH potential remains good in Washington State despite the fact that it now has the nation's highest percentage of union membership, State AFL-CIO Pres. Joseph Davis (center) told Sam Sharkey (left) of the Newhouse Newspapers and Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard newspapers on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public affairs interview on the Mutual radio network.

Most Expensive Christmas Due As Price Tags Go Up—and Up

By Sidney Margolius

WITH PRICES at an all-time high, this will be the most expensive Christmas yet—unless you seek out the better values.

This also is a time to avoid going into debt heavily for Christmas. Many families already have more debts than they can safely handle, the collections index of the Associated Credit Bureaus reveals. The number of debts turned over to collection agencies showed a sharp rise this fall, while the volume of collections turned down. This is a double-barreled danger signal.

Fortunately food prices have subsided a little, largely because more meat comes to market during the winter. But this is only the lull before they move up again.

This has been a rough year on the food budget. The jump in food prices of about 5.5 percent has been the largest 12-month rise since 1950-51, when the Korean conflict erupted. In the intervening years, food prices have risen, most years, by usually a less-shattering 1 to 1.5 percent rate.

Milk and bread prices remain a particular problem. The Federal Trade Commission said it found that in general retailers and processors had raised prices more than was justified by the rise in the cost of farm ingredients. For milk, the increase was twice the increase in farm prices. For bread it was three times as much.

Significantly, the price tags on stores' own brands of bread have gone up much less than the nationally-advertised brands. This has led the FTC to predict that national bakers will be compelled to readjust their prices.

Current milk prices of 44 to 60 cents a half-gallon in stores will become more pressing if prices are raised further during the winter months of milk scarcity. Some protesting housewives have said they will turn to canned and nonfat dry milk. A family with three or four children will be forced to spend $7 to $9 a week just for milk.

Best-Buy Gifts: Three groups of gift items stand out for exceptional values:

One is permanent-press or durable-press garments such as shirts, blouses and slacks. The preferred polyester-and-cotton blends have come down in price because of recent cuts on polyester fibers (sold under brand names such as Dacron, Fortrel, Kodel, Vycron, Terylene, etc.). Permanent-press shirts have been selling for as little as $4 at sales.

AT LEAST ONE major manufacturer also produces a permanent-press shirt in all-cotton, since some people prefer the greater comfort and opacity of cotton. All-cotton permanent press, however, is not as durable as the blend of 65 percent polyester and 35 percent cotton. This winter you also will find a blend of 35 percent polyester and 65 percent cotton offered as a compromise.

A second group of high-buy Christmas gifts is sweaters—both reasonable and attractively styled.

A third is household appliances, which have actually gone down in price in recent years, although some increases on large items are pending.

Be careful about "list price" claims. Several manufacturers have two separate brands of similar appliances, one under Fair Trade and the other not price-protected, thus open to price cutting by retailers. The price-protected brands, which retailers can't reduce, are Sunbeam's Vista, Proctor's Citation and GE's Universal.

An important development in portable power tools is the shockproof double insulated drills now available in some brands.

SNOW TIRES: The new studded tires have some disadvantages but have gained in use and are now legal in 33 states. Tests by the National Safety Council found the studded tires do provide better traction on icy pavement than regular snow tires but not as much as reinforced tire chains.

FOOD BUYING CALENDAR: Christmas turkey is in good supply with the 1966 crop up about 12 percent over last year. Prices are a little higher even though the greater supply indicates they ought to be lower. But compared to many red meats, turkey and chicken are comparatively good buys.

Both beef and pork are in heavier supply seasonally with prices down from recent lofty levels. Pork was the big price-booster this year and also influenced the prices of other meats and poultry. Beef remains somewhat the better buy, except for pork shoulder.

One help to price-besieged working families is the recent price drop on eggs. Cheese—always one of the best protein buys—also has come down a little from recent higher tags.

Medicare Helps Air Drug Price Gouging

THE HIGH COST of prescription drugs is again rising as an issue. One reason is that under medicare the programs will finance purchase of some $200 million in drugs next year. If, as proposed, the financed drugs are extended from just in-hospital use to out-care use as well, it could mean that the federal government would have about a $400 million annual investment in the cost of pharmaceuticals.

Recently, Pres. Johnson ordered an immediate inquiry into the high cost of medical care. The study, now being conducted by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, will cover drugs as well as hospital costs, doctors' fees and other aspects of medical care.

A number of bills are being prepared for the 90th Congress to open, once again, to full public exposure what is happening in the drug field.

Many of these proposals would require the use of the generic—or real—name rather than the brand name. Since the big drug manufacturers have spent millions of dollars on brand names, they are fighting the proposal.

It is behind the brand name, however, that the manufacturer is able to command such a fantastic price for his product. It would not be so easy with the use of the generic name.

Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and majority whip, has spoken out strongly on the drug issue and is expected to lead a fight as soon as the 90th Congress opens.

LONG CONTENDS that under medicare and welfare programs alone, if the generic name were used, the federal government would save at least $100 million annually.

The National Council of Senior Citizens reports that the drug industry "has sought ways to ease the government criticism of high drug prices by federal programs while urging Congress to keep hands off the industry."

One drug company was reported offering to provide a 25 percent discount to the nation's hospitals on all the company's prescription drugs used by medicare patients during their hospitalization. Part of the discount would be passed on to the federal government.

The company announced its discount in 300,000 letters to doctors so the medical men would prescribe the firm's drugs.

To forestall action, the drug manufacturers are placing ads in Washington, New York and Chicago newspapers and other publications. They claim that while the cost of living has gone up, prescription prices have actually dropped 9 percent from what is described as the "1957-59 base" price period.

The Senior Citizens decided to make its own study. It "found that the cost of average new prescriptions had actually risen some 15 percent during the period the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association claims prescription prices dropped 9 percent." (PAI)

If You Can't Stand the Heat Better Stay Out of the Kitchen

By Jane Goodsell

I DID IT. I'm ready to confess. Sooner or later they're bound to find out, anyway, and now the suspense of waiting to be apprehended is over. I'm making a clean breast of the whole thing. Let them do with me what they will.

I can't explain why I did it. Something just came over me and, the next thing I knew, the deed had been done. Nothing in my past would lead anyone to suspect me capable of such a crime. I'm one of the most law-abiding, non-aggressive types you ever met. I'm timid to a fault. I stay off the grass. I post no bills. I move to the back of the elevator. I close match covers before striking. I wouldn't dare to bend, spindle or mutilate a business machine card. In short, I do what I'm told.

And yet, there's no denying that I did it. I wasn't feeling hostile or aggressive. I remember humming as I changed the bed linen, and the only thought in my head was whether to have meat loaf or barbecued spareribs for dinner.

And then I saw it. That little tag on the pillow that certifies it is made of all-new material, and that warns in bold, black letters, "DO NOT REMOVE THIS TAG UNDER PENALTY OF LAW."

OH, I'D SEEN the tag before, of course. And I'll admit that I'd occasionally harbored mutinous thoughts about that warning. After all, it was my pillow, wasn't it? And why shouldn't I remove the tag if I felt like it? But this was sheer bravado. I'd never seriously contemplated such an act of outright disobedience to the law.

But this morning was different. I honestly can't explain it. Something just welled up within me when I saw that tag and, driven by an irresistible impulse that was beyond my will to control, I removed it! Ripped it clean off.

For one wild, delirious moment, I felt triumphant. After all those years of submission, I had asserted my independence and rebelled. It was a glorious moment. Needless to say, my delirium didn't last. I got scared, and I've been feeling that way ever since.

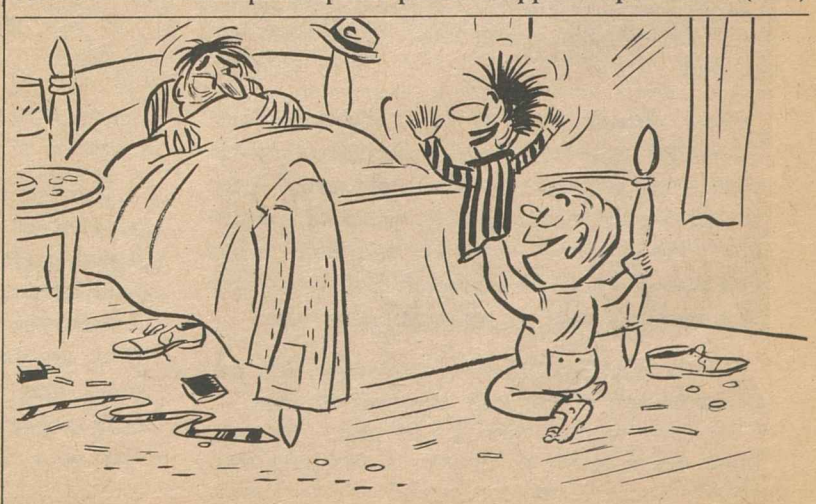
I've stuffed the telltale evidence into the back of my closet, but my guilt feelings are getting me down. Whatever the penalty is, I'm willing to pay it. I do hope, though, that they'll put me in one of those nice, new, modern jails.



"Hi chum, how's the old noggin this morning?"

Stronger Labor, Rights Links Urged

Natural Alliance Pressed as Key To Social, Economic Reforms

The labor and civil rights movements should strengthen their natural alliance in pursuit of social and economic programs that will benefit all Americans.

This was the basic argument put forward by contributors to the November issue of the AFL-CIO Federationist. The theme of the 32-page edition was "Equal Rights: To Realize the Promise."

The unemployed and lower-income Negroes and whites all would benefit as unions and civil rights groups united to fight for full employment, adequate training and more and better schools and housing, the writers agreed.

Professor Ray Marshall of the University of Texas declared that if the labor and civil rights movements united behind common objectives, they could become a powerful force for the national good. Divided, he warned, they would strengthen their common adversaries.

Bayard Rustin, a leading civil rights strategist, wrote that the civil rights movement is at a crossroads. He said the movement must ally itself with labor and liberals to fight for the Freedom Budget or else be led by the appeal of "black power" into strife and a racial nightmare.

Other articles in the magazine dealt with the moral basis of civil rights, the roles of organized labor and civil rights groups in expanding opportunities and making civil rights laws work more effectively.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in an editorial on "Labor's Commitment" stated labor's position:

"The AFL-CIO is firmly determined to achieve full equality in America in all fields—education, employment, accommodations, housing and justice."

Meany also deplored the so-called white backlash. He blamed it on demagogues exploiting unreasoning fear stimulated by cries of "black power." He said labor opposes both black supremacy and white supremacy and believes America has only one class—citizen—"the highest and most meaningful title in a democracy."

These were the main points made by the authors:

● A. Philip Randolph, discussing "The Moral Basis of Civil Rights," makes the point that all men are brothers and so entitled to equal treatment.

Randolph, president of the Sleeping Car Porters and an AFL-CIO vice president, criticized "black power" as a slogan that cannot solve social and economic problems. He urged cooperation between labor and civil rights groups in support of the Freedom Budget and the goal of full employment.

● Dr. Marshall traced "The Roots of the Negro-Union Alliance." He proposed a variety of approaches through which discrimination might be reduced and opportunities expanded through cooperative action by labor and civil rights groups.

● Donald Slaiman, director of the AFL-CIO Civil Rights Dept., described the close working alliance between civil rights groups and labor in winning rights legislation and on labor issues. He spelled out in detail labor's policy and program for eliminating the discrimination remaining in unions.

● The Workers Defense League of New York City explained how it organized information on apprenticeship opportunities and worked closely with unions in placing Negro youths seeking to learn a trade.

● Whitney Young, Executive Director of the National Urban League, detailed the wide range of NUL programs aimed at opening the doors of opportunity to minorities.

● Rustin, who is executive director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, posed the choice facing "Civil Rights at the Crossroads." He urged a Negro-labor-liberal coalition to achieve progress. The alternative, he warned, is social chaos.

● Nathaniel Goldfinger, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, wrote on "Negroes and Jobs" and analyzed the factors behind the high unemployment rates of Negro adults and Negro teenagers.

● Walter G. Davis, newly-appointed director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education, discussed the whole range of government programs in his article, "Making Equal Rights Laws Work."

● Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, wrote on "The NAACP and the New Strategy" aimed at the economic improvement of all lower income groups, Negro and white.

New Institute to Combat Extremist Hate Groups

harassments in the hope that gradually a greater measure of decency and dignity can be restored to the American political dialogue."

Illustrating how hate from both extremes of the political spectrum stifles reason and communication, Dr. Littel cited the role of those who seek to fan the flames of "black power" in the civil rights field and those who whip up "white backlash" reaction.

Birch Society leaders can be found in key positions in dozens of far right organizations, he said. Some of these groups "sound more shrill than the Birchers and some play in a lower key, but they echo versions of the Birch line, and their impact is cumulative."

Among the organizations he described as in the Birch Society's "orbit" were Let Freedom Ring, the Liberty Lobby, Americans for Constitutional Action, America's Future, Christian Crusade, Manion Forum, Dan Smoot Report, National Economic Council, Church League of America and We the People.

Dr. Littel said he is a Republican but that the members of the sponsoring committee include persons identified with both political parties and with all major religions.

Auto Workers Pres. Walter P. Reuther and Clothing Workers Pres. Jacob S. Potofsky are on the committee as are Democratic Senators Gale McGee of Wyoming and Frank Moss of Utah, and Republican Sen. Clifford P. Case of New Jersey. Charles R. Baker is the executive director, and the Institute for American Democracy has set up a permanent office at 1330 Massachusetts Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

College Cost Conference Draws Special Award

Kent, O.—The American College Public Relations Association has awarded Kent State University a certificate of special merit for co-sponsoring, with the Ohio AFL-CIO, a "College Price Tag Conference" on the campus last spring.

The one-day session, chaired by State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Robert Bollard, drew about 200 labor, education and business leaders who discussed ways of lowering college costs for students on limited financial means.

Appeals Court Upholds NLRB Race Bias Ruling

New Orleans—The 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that a local union in East Gadsden, Ala., failed in its duty of fair representation when it refused to process the grievances of eight Negro employes against the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

Three appeals judges voted to enforce an order by the National Labor Relations Board that Local 12 of the Rubber Workers must process the backpay claims of David Buckner and seven other complainants and must bargain in good faith with Goodyear plant management for written language prohibiting separate treatment of white and Negro workers, and racially segregated lunchrooms, rest rooms and showers.

The parent URW was not a party to the appeal. It withdrew from the case, a spokesman said, after Local 12 rejected its directives to process the grievances.

First for NLRB

The ruling, which may be appealed to the Supreme Court, was said to be the first of its kind in race bias cases under the labor law. The court rejected a Local 12 claim that the contract had not been violated and that therefore the NLRB had no jurisdiction. It held that the labor board is the proper forum for such cases even if the Civil Rights Act of 1964 might be applicable to race bias violations committed after July 2, 1965, effective date of the 1964 act.

The URW sent James Turner, its director of fair practices, to East Gadsden to investigate reports that Local 12 and management had three separate work lists—for white males, colored males, and females.

The Negro workers, acting on the advice of the international union, presented their case to all local union tribunals and were turned down by each—grievance committee, executive board and membership. Then they filed the unfair labor practice charge with the NLRB, whose ruling was upheld by the 5th Circuit court.

The local union refused to comply with a URW directive to process the grievances, the international union said, but later reinstated the Negro workers and discontinued its racially discriminatory practices in a verbal agreement with Goodyear management and a representative of the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity.

The appeals court judges said in an opinion written by Judge Homer Thornberry:

"We are convinced that the rights of individual employes to be fairly represented can be more fully achieved . . . by recognizing the [labor] board as the appropriate body to meet the challenge of uniformly administering standards of fair representation.

"We have confidence in the competence of the board to discharge the delicate task of striking a meaningful balance between its primary duty of promoting union-management relations and that of safeguarding the Section 7 rights of employes" under the Civil Rights Act.

Buckner and his fellow workers are seeking backpay for a period of nearly one year in 1960-61 when they were laid off while whites with less seniority were kept on the job. Also they want plant facilities opened to all workers by contract.

Mediator Paul Bowers To Head St. Louis Office

Appointment of Paul E. Bowers as St. Louis regional director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service was announced by FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin. Bowers, a federal mediator since 1962, will succeed retiring Regional Dir. William F. White on Dec. 30.

Bowers has been a national representative of the service for two years as a "trouble shooter" in major negotiations including recent General Electric Co. talks. White is the service's senior mediator, with experience dating to 1934. The region serves Arkansas, southwest Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Missouri, Oklahoma and Texas.

Union Sets Up Camp For Job Corps Youth

The Operating Engineers will provide on-the-job training in heavy equipment handling to 80 Job Corps youngsters in Tennessee—and offer a helping hand to successful graduates of the year-long program.

Under an agreement with the U.S. Forest Service, the union has established a full-scale training center in the Cherokee National Forest in Eastern Tennessee and members of Local 917 will serve as instructors.

Job Corps trainees who have passed basic education tests and have a demonstrated aptitude on heavy equipment will be assigned to the center for one year. They will receive nine months of instruction on operation and maintenance of bulldozers, graders and scrapers, followed by three months of shop work in basic mechanics. Their regular school work will also be closely tied to the construction industry.

On successful completion of their course, the trainees will be referred to local unions needing operators or to the local union in the area from which they came. If the union has an apprenticeship program, they will have an opportunity to apply.

In announcing the development of the Job Corps program, IUOE Pres. Hunter P. Wharton cited two key factors:

"First," he said, "we have accepted a part of the responsibility all of our society has for extending a helping hand to the less fortunate among us.

"Secondly, we have opened a new reservoir of potential talent for our union without compromising on the level of skill required to operate safely and economically. When these young men have finished their year of training, they will be excellent applicants for our apprenticeship program or for dispatch as assistant engineers. We're making it an international union responsibility to teach these boys the fundamentals of operating. Some boys may not make it, but those who do will be a credit to our union."

Wharton noted that many of the union's members "knew what poverty was in the Thirties," and added:

"We're ready to do our share to help deserving youngsters out of poverty in the Sixties."

100 Stations to Air Gompers TV Film

More than 100 stations of the NBC-TV network will carry the filmed drama of the efforts of Samuel Gompers in behalf of Latin American workers and international labor relations on Dec. 11.

Broadcast time to the network is 1:30 p.m. (EST). Local schedules should be consulted outside New York City.

The play, "The Liquid Fire," will star Leon Janney as Gompers and Douglas Watson as his associate and narrator. Produced under the auspices of the George Meany Foundation, an arm of the Herbert H. Lehman Institute, the film will be incorporated into the Eternal Light series, presented weekly by NBC and the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

UNITED FRONT by organized labor and the National Council of Senior Citizens could lead to significant progress in social security and medicare legislation in the 90th Congress, AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bert Seidman told the council's executive board at a meeting in Washington. John W. Edelman, council president, is at the right of Seidman.

'Mixed Bag' of Referendum Issues Produces Varied Voter Reactions

Voters in nearly every state passed judgment this month on referenda issues ranging from school bonds to elimination of the death penalty, from a state lottery to a full crew law, from a definition of obscenity to a state income tax.

Here are some of the highlights that have been unearthed in a state-by-state survey:

● Washington State voters repealed—over labor's opposition—a safe crew law establishing a minimum crew size for railroad freight trains. This leaves only New York, Ohio, Indiana, Wisconsin and Arkansas of the 13 states which a few years ago had enforceable train crew laws.

● The biggest bond issue on any state ballot was approved in California, authorizing borrowing of $230 million to expand facilities at the nine state university campuses. Labor endorsed the proposal.

● California voters rejected the advice of their new governor-elect, Ronald Reagan, and turned down a proposal to strike from state law the declaration that movies, books and pictures which have "redeeming social importance" are not obscene in the law's eye. The proposition was backed by right-wing groups, opposed by the State AFL-CIO.

● Louisiana voters approved a state constitutional amendment to let a governor succeed himself but West Virginia voters rejected a similar measure. Nebraska put a two-term limitation on the governorship.

● Texas voters approved a labor-opposed constitutional amendment which under the guise of repealing the state poll tax—already outlawed by the courts as a condition for voting—requires annual registration of voters. The State AFL-CIO is challenging the constitutional amendment on the ground that its ballot title, "an amendment to repeal the poll tax," is misleading.

● A labor-supported state income tax was rejected in Nebraska and Massachusetts voters turned down a labor-sponsored effort to repeal the sales tax. In Illinois, however, the State AFL-CIO hailed the defeat of a constitutional amendment which would have coupled a new income tax with a reduction in taxes paid by corporations.

● Michigan voters turned down a labor-supported amendment to lower the voting age from 21 to 18. Only four states allow those under 21 to vote—Georgia and Kentucky at 18, Alaska, 19 and Hawaii, 20.

● In New York, a labor-backed proposal to increase the state's borrowing power for industrial development and job expansion won approval. But voters rejected a labor-endorsed proposal to provide broader taxing power for cities for housing and slum clearance.

● Tennessee voters ratified, over labor opposition, a trickily-worded amendment requiring apportionment of the legislature every 10 years "according to population and the U.S. Constitution." There's nothing wrong with the amendment if the Dirksen amendment to the U.S. Constitution isn't enacted since both houses of a legislature must now be apportioned on the basis of population. In the unlikely event that some form of the Dirksen Amendment were enacted, however, the Tennessee provision could then be used to set up one house of the legislature on a basis other than population.

In some other referenda actions of interest, Washington State voters repealed archaic Sunday "blue laws," Colorado refused to abolish the death penalty and West Virginia citizens rejected an amendment to permit school bond issues to be approved by a simple majority, instead of 60 percent of those voting.

New York voters authorized a state lottery to raise money for educational purposes. But the decision on whether to hold such a lottery and the details of its operation are up to the legislature and the governor. In a New York City referendum which drew national attention, a civilian police review board was abolished even though the top Democratic, Republican and Liberal Party candidates urged its retention.

Mississippi voters narrowly agreed to permit the legislature to consolidate counties. Civil rights leaders charged the intent is to prevent election of Negroes to office in counties where they constitute a majority.

Kentuckians rejected a new state constitution that labor had criticized, and South Carolina voted to allow women to serve on state juries for the first time.

Kansas approved but West Virginia rejected annual legislative sessions.

Minor, technical amendments to state constitutions cluttered the ballot in many states and were widely disregarded by voters. However in Idaho more people cast ballots on a referendum on the poll tax (it was upheld) than voted for governor.

ILO to Press Program Despite Million-Dollar Loss in Annex Fire

Geneva—The Intl. Labor Organization has determined to press ahead in its wide-ranging activities to improve working and living conditions despite a million-dollar fire that recently destroyed much of the research and planning work of its staff.

"Our programs will go forward as planned," ILO Dir. Gen. David A. Morse assured the 48 worker, government and employer representatives on the UN agency's Governing Body.

Addressing the executive group only 48 hours after a spectacular pre-dawn blaze leveled a headquarters annex housing key departments and services, Morse said this would be possible only because of the "determination and optimism" shown by the staff "in the face of a really difficult situation."

The nearly 400 staff members employed in the destroyed annex of five barracks-like prefabricated buildings were already reconstructing in emergency offices the basic documents and records needed to keep the work moving smoothly.

By coincidence the Governing Body was holding its last session of the year when the blaze, of undetermined origin, raced through the annex, about a mile from the cramped headquarters building.

The day after the fire the executive group disposed of one of the main items on its agenda by unanimously approving the general plans for a new 12-story headquarters to be erected at an estimated cost of just over $21 million, with the financial assistance of the Geneva and Swiss governments. Work is expected to start next spring.

After deciding on Geneva as the site for the 1968 annual ILO June conference, or general assembly, the Governing Body added to the session's agenda two technical items called for by the workers:

● Establishment of international labor inspection standards for assuring the protection of agricultural workers.

● Updating of the minimum sickness insurance coverage that the 118 ILO member nations are called upon to guarantee the worker and his family.

Vacation Standards

But the labor delegates failed in a bid to add a third item to the 1968 agenda—the question of improving the standards for paid vacations set in a 1936 ILO pact. They lost the issue by a 26-18 vote because government representatives of underdeveloped countries protested that three important technical questions were more than their delegations could handle at one session.

Nevertheless, Jean Moeri, Swiss chairman of the workers' group, said the vote was "deplorable" because the 1936 standards are completely outdated.

Rudolph Faupl, U.S. worker delegate on the Governing Body, hailed the plan drafted by the Ottawa conference of the ILO's American member states for developing Latin America's human resources.

Faupl told the executive group that, provided the necessary effort and money are put into it, the plan "will go down in ILO history as one of its most fruitful instruments."

Another worker spokesman, Kalmen Kaplansky of Canada, similarly urged that the ILO be given "the means to implement this very constructive and vital program."

Kaplansky is resigning from the Governing Body to take up an appointment on Jan. 1 as special adviser to Morse and head of the ILO's Ottawa office. His seat will be filled by Executive Vice Pres. Joseph Morris of the Canadian Labor Congress.

Faupl remained on in Geneva after the session to serve as the Governing Body's worker representative at the 28-nation ILO Inland Transport Committee meeting that immediately followed.

2 Organizers Win Local License Case

Carrollton, Ga.—Recorder A. B. Parker dismissed charges of violation of a city ordinance requiring licenses for union organizers against two representatives of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers after union attorneys attacked the law's constitutionality.

The legislation was enacted in 1954 and was amended in 1956 and last August. It imposes a fee of $350 a year on all union agents, promoters or organizers soliciting membership in any labor organization.

The charges were brought against IUE Representatives Harold McIver and Robert Best on Sept. 1 while they were aiding in organizing efforts at the Southwire Co. Their attorneys argued the ordinance violated the 1st and 14th Amendments to the Constitution and cited numerous court decisions supporting their stand.

Conservative Gains Spur New 'Right-to-Work' Push

Labor Hits New Count Of Jobless

The AFL-CIO has criticized a change in the government's method of measuring employment and unemployment as "a serious mistake."

Research Dir. Nat Goldfinger protested the revision in letters to Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Commissioner Arthur M. Ross of the Bureau of Labor Statistics. An advisory committee of union economists likewise challenged the change as "much inferior" to the present system.

At issue is a conflict over the designation of persons who are not employed, but are no longer actively seeking work because they have been discouraged by a lack of jobs.

In good times, there aren't enough in this group to make a dent in the monthly employment-unemployment statistics. In hard times, the number can be statistically significant.

Under the present system, itself a compromise, persons without jobs interviewed in the monthly census sampling are asked if they are actively looking for work. If they say they are not, they are normally not considered a part of the work force. But if they volunteer the information that they are not job-hunting because there's no work to be had in the area, they are listed as unemployed.

The new BLS system, to take effect in January, will ignore any volunteered information and list as unemployed only those who actively applied for jobs within the past four weeks.

As Goldfinger sees it, national policy could be affected by the change in statistics.

A sampling procedure which counts the "discouraged" unemployed could lead to congressional and Administration action to combat a recognized serious unemployment problem. A procedure which reduces the count of unemployed could lead to inaction or insufficient action because the extent of the jobless problem is not recognized.

The BLS also announced other changes, including dropping 14 and 15-year-old youngsters from the job statistics on the ground that their part-time work has little economic significance, and requiring that an individual be "currently available for work" to be counted as unemployed.

Ross also said that more probing questions will be asked in an effort to find out more about "discouraged" jobseekers, even though they will not be counted

The pact was signed in Barbados, where Meany was attending a conference. (Story Page 7.)

Key States Listed as Targets

A new right-wing drive to outlaw the union shop in additional states is under way, spurred by conservative gains in a number of legislatures that the National Right-to-Work Committee says have put "new steam" behind its campaign.

At a closed-door meeting in Oklahoma City, top officials of the national "work" organization met with the leadership of Oklahomans for Right-to-Work, which maintained its full-time headquarters even after the state rejected a constitutional amendment to ban the union shop in a 1964 referendum.

The "right-to-work" coalition, ranging from conservative small businessmen to radical right extremists, was making noises also in such perennial battlegrounds as Idaho, New Mexico, Montana and Delaware. And the national committee publicly identified as targets a group of big industrial states including California, New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Massachusetts and Missouri.

Indiana is the only northern industrial state which ever succumbed to a "right-to-work" law, and that was a short-lived experiment which was repealed early in 1965. Nor does the "work" committee claim majority support in any of the big state legislatures.

"New right-to-work laws will not be passed overnight in these states," the committee readily concedes. But it claims that the election returns and the failure of the 89th Congress to repeal Taft-Hartley's Section 14(b) have boosted "the long-range prospects" for outlawing what its propaganda calls "the

Sloane House 'Y' Workers Vote Union

New York—A campaign that included a picket line to protest a lockout and a drive that amended the State Labor Relations Act paid off when Hotel, Motel & Club Workers Local 6 scored a 164-33 victory in a representation election at the YMCA's Sloane House.

The vote was conducted by the State Labor Relations Board after the legislature had changed the SLRA to give the hotel and restaurant employes of non-profit institutions the same right of self-organization and collective bargaining the law had insured other workers in the same field.

The victory constituted a major breakthrough in action to bring union wages and working conditions to some 20,000 additional low-paid workers in similar institutions.

It brought the congratulations of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to the workers themselves, to AFL-CIO Regional Dir. Michael Mann and to New York City AFL-CIO officials headed by Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., for their share in the triumph.

The drive for union protection at Sloane House really got off the ground last March when Gerald McElroy, chairman of an in-shop organizing committee, was discharged. His fellow employes showed their resentment by staging a demonstration in the lobby.

Management countered by firing 76 employes, of whom 46 were jailed, and put into effect a lockout.

The workers' resistance won public admiration and the help of the entire labor movement and many clergymen in a campaign to

BLS Survey Shows:

Bigger Wage Boosts Mark '66 Bargaining

Wage increases in major union contracts negotiated during the first nine months of 1966 jumped to an annual rate of 3.8 percent averaged over the full life of the contracts, the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The average negotiated increase was higher than in recent years but fewer workers were covered, BLS said, and fewer collective bargaining agreements were up for renegotiation.

The 3.8 percent annual average compared with 3.3 percent in 1965, 3 percent in 1964, and 2.3 percent in 1963.

Other details of the BLS survey showed that:

- Almost a third of the workers covered by contracts negotiated during the first nine months of 1966 received wage boasts averaging 3.5 to 4 percent a year over the life of the contract.

- The median increase effective during the first contract year was 4 percent—lower than the 4.2 percent increase experienced during the first nine months of 1965 but higher than the 3.4 and 3.2 percent raises recorded in the comparable periods of 1963 and 1964.

- The 1966 agreements as of Sept. 30 covered 1.3 million workers, as against the 2.2 to 2.4 million workers affected by settlements during the comparable periods of the three preceding years.

BLS said first year adjustments averaged 4.2 percent in manufacturing, which employed 55 percent of those covered by the agreements surveyed, and 3.9 percent in non-manufacturing industries.

Pay raises, the bureau said, went to all but 1 percent of the workers involved.

It gave these annual rates of increase over the life of contracts negotiated:

Under 2 percent for 14.7 percent of the workers.

From 2 to 3.5 percent, 17.5 percent of the workers.

From 3.5 to 4 percent, 31.7 per-

Union Vote Set At DiGiorgio Fruit Orchards

Los Angeles — AFL-CIO farm workers prepared to broaden their organizing drive from the vineyards of Central and Southern California to the fruit orchards of Northern California as the giant DiGiorgio Corp. agreed to a harvest season election.

Some 700 pickers and shed workers at DiGiorgio's plum and pear orchards near Marysville will vote in late July. The election date was a major victory for the United Farm Workers Organizing Committee, which sought balloting when the peak work force would be on hand.

The UFWOC already represents about 2,300 DiGiorgio grape workers as the result of election victories in two vineyards. Negotiations for

550 Teachers Strike Eight Junior Colleges

Chicago—A strike of 550 college teachers halted classroom sessions for most of the 38,000 pupils at eight Cook County junior colleges. The strike, called to secure a first contract, was the largest walkout of college teachers in the history of the American Federation of Teachers, the union said.

The Cook County College Teachers Union—AFT Local 1600—won collective bargaining rights for 684 full-time faculty members in a representation election last summer. It presented contract proposals Oct. 6. When the county's Junior College Board of Education failed to make a counter-offer at several bargaining sessions, local members voted to picket all campuses.

The union asked for a package of benefits including a pay increase of $200 a month. The Board of Education set 17 presettlement conditions, including a no-strike guarantee and no written contract, Local 1600 Pres. Norman G. Swenson said.

The Chicago AFL-CIO executive board voted full support of the union's fight for an acceptable contract. After that action, more teachers joined the walkout despite an anti-picketing injunction issued by a County Circuit Court judge, and school officials resumed bargaining with the union.

The right of teachers to bargain collectively with school boards in this state was affirmed Nov. 9 by the Illinois Appellate Court, 1st Judicial District. Upholding a February ruling by a county Circuit Court judge, three appeals judges concluded that the Chicago Board of Education "does not require specific legislative authority to enter into collective bargaining with a sole bargaining agent" selected by teachers and "such action is not against public policy."

The union called the decision "a milestone for Illinois teachers in their march toward dignity and genuine professional status."

The Chicago Teachers Union, another AFT affiliate, had won bargaining rights for teachers in the city schools in an election in which the Chicago Education Association, affiliated with the National Education Association, refused to participate. The CEA and a Chicago Chamber of Commerce official sued for a restraining order against the board and the union.

The Appeals Court decision was followed by a series of union organizing drives and contract demands. A strike by East Chicago Heights teachers was called off when the Board of Education agreed to conduct a collective bargaining election Dec. 5. The Niles Township board, also facing a teachers' strike, approved an election on a date to be set

The nation's first college strike was called last January by the United Federation of College Teachers against St. John's College, which has 13,000 students on campuses in Brooklyn and Jamaica, N.Y. AFT Local 1460 said about 200 faculty members struck in protest against the firing of 31 teachers.

CITATION OF HONOR was presented by the National Committee for Rural Schools to Mrs. Esther Peterson, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs, at a meeting in New York. Acting for the committee were Morris Novik (left), AFL-CIO radio consultant, and Benjamin F. McLaurin, NCRS chairman and vice president of the Sleeping Car Porters.

Rhode Island AFL-CIO Sets Endorsement Rule

Providence, R.I.—A major change in machinery for political endorsements was approved by the biennial Rhode Island AFL-CIO convention here under which approval will be given by the delegates themselves rather than a committee.

The program shifts the date of the convention from after the general election to "soon" after the last primary election.

It provides that a Committee for Political Education conference be held on the Friday before the weekend convention and that political candidates be given the opportunity to express their views. Recommendations will go to the convention for final action.

"No subordinate AFL-CIO body shall announce an endorsement of such candidate prior to the convention," the unanimously approved resolution said, "or make an endorsement of a candidate contrary to the endorsements granted by the Rhode Island AFL-CIO convention."

In other resolutions the 360 delegates:

- Raised per capita payments from 5 to 10 cents per month.
- For the second time, voted to establish a group practice health plan for AFL-CIO union members. Approval of such a plan was first voted in 1963, but it became mired in the planning stages.
- Asked the General Assembly to regulate intra-state meat and poultry processing plants.
- Urged all affiliated locals "to take appropriate action for the elimination of any vestiges of segregation of local union membership on the basis of race or color."
- Voted support to the Fire Fighters in their legislative drive for the 40-hour week.

AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller and Sec.-Treas. Matthew DeMore of the Machinists addressing the delegates warned that organized labor may find itself in a fight as a result of the recent election.

Biemiller said union members must be prepared to resist possible efforts to push restrictive legislation through the 90th Congress. But, he said, although 40 friends of labor were defeated in the House, it was "not as bad as 1946."

DeMore deplored the fact that "too many union members voted their prejudices instead of their principles" and predicted that "the new Congress is going to turn around and bite the hand of every working man who helped elect it."

Convention speakers included Mrs. Esther Peterson, special assistant to the President for consumer affairs; Stanton E. Smith, AFL-CIO coordinator of state and local central bodies, and Assistant Dir. Ernest Lee of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Pres. Thomas F. Policastro, facing opposition for the first time since the state central body was established eight years ago, easily defeated a fellow Steelworker, Pres. Stanley Kaplan of Pawtucket Local 3333. Sec.-Treas. Edwin C. Brown won without opposition.

27% Package Settlement Ends Air Canada Strike

Montreal—A 27 percent package settlement, including 20 percent in wage increases, ended an 11-day strike by 5,200 members of the Machinists and restored service by Air Canada, the government-owned air line which is the country's largest.

The settlement, worked out in negotiations here, was ratified by meetings of union members in Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto, Vancouver and a number of smaller units.

The pact will boost the top rate for mechanics from the pre-strike $3.17 an hour to $3.97 beginning June 24, 1968.

The 26-month agreement provides for a wage increase of 12 percent retroactive to Nov. 1—two weeks before the strike started—another 5 percent on Nov. 1, 1967, and 3 percent on June 24, 1968.

Additional adjustments were made for specified job classifications ranging up to 20 percent the first year for station attendants.

An estimated 4 percent of the settlement was earmarked for reclassification adjustments, among them a reduction in the time a mechanic must serve to reach the top scale from 12 years to eight years, including a four-year apprenticeship. The issue proved one of the toughest facing the negotiators.

The remaining 3 percent is in fringe benefits. These include an additional holiday, raising the total to nine; three-week vacations after five years of service instead of 10 and four weeks after 15 years instead of 20 years; and assumption by Air Canada of the full cost of health insurance for employes and their families on Nov. 1, 1967. The employer paid 50 percent under the old contract.

The walkout got under way on Nov. 14 when Richard Geddes, a mediator union and management had brought into negotiations to help them reach a settlement, was dismissed by the union because he allegedly bypassed the bargaining committee and sent Air Canada's "latest offer" directly to the members.

The strike was the first in the 29-year history of the airline, which is not only Canada's largest domestic air carrier but shares international services with Canadian Pacific Airlines.

The union bargaining committee was assisted by IAM Vice Pres. Mike Rygus and had as its co-chairmen Rhys Davies of Lodge 714, Montreal West, and Michael Pitchford of Lodge 1751, Montreal East.

Quality Shoe Pact Hikes Pay, Fringes

New York—The United Shoe Workers negotiated wage and fringe gains for 3,000 members in a two-year contract with the Quality Shoe Manufacturers Association, covering 18 companies in the New York area.

An initial increase of 15 cents an hour will be followed Feb. 1 by a 10-cent hike in guaranteed minimums, which will rise to $1.75 after one year of service plus incentive pay.

Insurance, vacation and pension benefits are also improved, the union said.

Youngstown Strike Ends:

Election Promised, Teachers Return

Youngstown, Ohio—Members of Local 1517 of the American Federation of Teachers returned to their classrooms after a "division of the house" victory that ended Ohio's first teacher strike.

The settlement was worked out at a meeting where officers of the striking YFT were served with a temporary injunction ordering them back to school.

The agreement ending the week-long strike provides for an election to be held in 1968 to determine the collective bargaining representative for a unit comprising classroom teachers only.

The YFT's call for an election and the composition of the bargaining unit were key issues in the dispute.

The Board of Education on Oct. 3 had recognized the Youngstown Education Association as the bargaining agent for all 1,246 certificated employes on the basis of membership cards, including those held by supervisory employes all the way up to the superintendent of schools.

John Wendle, YFT president, called the YEA a professional organization and a company union and asked the board to hold an election among classroom teachers only to let them decide who would be their bargaining agent.

The YEA agreed to the election but only if supervisory personnel were allowed to vote. The YFT set up pickets at all 44 Youngstown schools Nov. 21. Maintenance employes, custodians and bus drivers respected the lines and School Supt. J. Harry Wanamaker told the 28,000 pupils to stay home.

YFT members remained on the picket lines Nov. 22 and 23 despite threats that Ohio's Ferguson Act, which forbids strikes by public employes, would be invoked. Picketing was suspended over the Thanksgiving holiday, but on Saturday morning, Nov. 26, Mahoning County Common Pleas Judge Elwyn V. Jenkens issued a temporary injunction ordering all teachers and pupils to return to classes the following Monday.

Court Order Served

Wendle said he was served with the court order during a meeting with school officials at which the 1968 representation election was agreed upon.

Wendle called the settlement a "99 per cent victory," saying that "the only thing we didn't want was a strike."

Under terms of the settlement, the classrooms teachers will be a separate group whichever organization wins. If supervisory personnel desire representation through the YEA, they would constitute a separate bargaining unit.

Wendle also called delaying of the election until 1968 a victory for the YFT. He acknowledged that an election now probably would have been won by the YEA. But, with more than a year to work on organizing, he predicted victory in 1968 for the AFL-CIO affiliate.

The YFT has about 350 members out of the approximately 1,100 non-supervisory certificated employes in the Youngstown system. The majority of the members are male, high school teachers who are heads of households. Wendle said the YEA had much of its strength in the supervisory ranks and among women elementary school teachers.

Meanwhile, in nearby Hubbard, a strike by members of the Hubbard Federation of Teachers was settled as it entered its second week. The agreement provides a wage-pension package of $530 a year and resolves a number of grievances.

Sloane House 'Y' Workers Vote Union

amend the SLRA. The change gives coverage to employes of charitable, educational and religious organizations whose services are performed in connection with the operation of a hotel or restaurant.

The amendment became effective July 1. On Aug. 3 Van Arsdale called a conference of central body affiliates which established an organizing committee to operate with Mann and the Hotel Trades Council headed by Pres. Jay Rubin. An advisory committee of citywide and hotel trades leaders was named to coordinate the drive.

Local 6 mounted a vigorous campaign under the direction of Gen. Organizer Vangel Kamaras and Organizer David Sola which made widespread distribution of leaflets spelling out the case for unionism and which contacted with each eligible employe.

Sloane House management opposed unionization to the end. It set forth its opposition to unions in a series of leaflets and in conversations with eligible voters, and on the afternoon before the voting called them to a meeting from which union representatives were barred and which actually strengthened sentiment for the union.

CHRISTMAS SEAL purchases to help "seek an end to one of mankind's oldest plagues" were urged on all union members by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany as he endorsed the 1966 campaign of the National Tuberculosis Association.

Baltimore Pact Settled:

11 Units Still Struck At GE, Westinghouse

A 2,100-member local of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers settled a contract dispute with the Westinghouse Corp. over local issues but 15,500 other members of a multi-union coalition remained on strike at 11 other locations of Westinghouse and the General Electric Co.

The strikes, by affiliates of five international unions, involve disputes over job classifications and similar in-plant problems. Most of the locals have been out since early November.

An 11-union coalition coordinated its bargaining this year in an effort to frustrate "divide and conquer" techniques of the two big manufacturing chains. The coalition succeeded in negotiating national contracts but local pacts remained for negotiation in more than 40 locations.

In the latest developments:

● IBEW members at Friendship Airport near Baltimore voted to accept a settlement ending a 14-day strike at the Westinghouse space center. Major gains included upward revision of job classifications, and a provision that the union will designate 15 job categories involving up to 400 workers for wage reclassification.

● IBEW contracts expired Dec. 1 at Westinghouse plants in Bloomington, Ind., and Sunnyvale, Calif. Strikes were authorized—by 500 workers at Bloomington and 1,300 at Sunnyvale. The latter involves 300 IBEW members and 1,000 members of the Machinists, Carpenters and the unaffiliated Teamsters, whose pacts also were up for renewal.

● Contract talks between the Auto Workers and Machinists and GE's Evendale, O., plant management moved to Washington, D.C., at the request of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service. Union members have been working under a Taft-Hartley Act injunction barring a strike, but members have said they will go out when the injunction expires unless acceptable terms are reached. The plant makes jet plane engines.

At the GE plant in Schenectady N.Y., more than 12,000 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the Technical Engineers and the Plumbers were in the seventh week of a strike called to protect 2,500 workers against arbitrary wage cuts, to settle numerous other grievances and negotiate a local supplement to the national agreement, according to a union spokesman.

Other locals on strike include seven IBEW locals at Westinghouse locations; AFTE Local 140 at the Pittsfield, Mass., plant of GE; and two UAW locals at GE plants in Warren, Mich., and Fort Smith, Ark.

AFTE Pres. Russell M. Stephens said GE management has "not moved one inch" toward a settlement since members of that union struck in October at Pittsfield and Schenectady.

Canadian Brushoff

Meanwhile a first attempt at coalition bargaining by five Canadian unions met the same attempted brushoff from GE officials that U.S. bargainers had met earlier. The IUE said company spokesmen refused to bargain with it because of "certain people on the union committee."

The IUE represents 4,000 GE office and technical workers in Ontario and Quebec. Other unions with contracts expiring soon are the Molders, AFTE, IAM and IBEW, who were added to the IUE committee. In U.S. negotiations a court injunction was required to bring GE back to the bargaining table with the IUE and observers from 10 other unions.

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was marked by a banquet in Washington at which AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler was one of a number of speakers. At left of Schnitzler is IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman and at right, Sec. Joseph D. Keenan.

Union Vote Set At DiGiorgio Fruit Orchards

a first contract are still under way, with indications that arbitration may be used to resolve issues still in dispute.

Meanwhile the union has stepped up a consumer boycott of wines and brandies of the Perelli-Minnetti Co. near Delano, which signed what the union terms a back-door agreement with the Teamsters while the UFWOC-represented field workers were on strike.

UFWOC pickets dramatized their "don't buy" campaign at Macy's department stores in California, New York and New Jersey, protesting the sale of four brands. The boycotted labels are 11 Cellars and Ambassador wines, Aristocrat brandy and Tribuno vermouth.

The brands are distributed by the California Wine Association, a satellite of Perelli-Minnetti.

Similar boycotts helped bring about union recognition agreements at Schenley Industries and DiGiorgio, UFWOC Boycott Coordinator Gene Boutilier noted.

The DiGiorgio orchard election next summer will be supervised by the State Conciliation Service, as were the vineyard elections, unless a collective bargaining law for farm workers is passed by the legislature.

While the DiGiorgio Corp. has indicated it would support such a law, other powerful farm interests are likely to oppose the legislation.

The Teamsters, who were licked by the UFWOC in the first big DiGiorgio election and sat out the second, did not indicate if they would compete for bargaining rights at the Marysville orchards.

The UFWOC reported significant progress in negotiations with the Mosesian-Goldberg-Hourigan grape ranch, where the union recently won bargaining rights for field workers by a 285-38 vote. The employer has agreed to a union hiring hall and a full union shop, the UFWOC said.

A representation election has been approved for shed workers at the Mosesian-Goldberg-Hourigan ranch. The company is the first of the "independent" vineyards in the Delano area to recognize the union.

700 Toast the IBEW On Diamond Jubilee

Some 700 leaders from government, the trade union movement and the electrical industry paid tribute to the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers on its diamond jubilee year.

Similar celebrations are taking place throughout the country sponsored by IBEW local unions.

At the dinner, IBEW Pres. Gordon M. Freeman announced that the union had reached its anniversary year goal of adding one thousand members for each year of its history or 75,000 new members. He said the 90,000 mark had been passed and that by the end of the year 100,000 new members should be added to the brotherhood membership lists.

Sec. of Labor W. Willard Wirtz, in toasting the labor movement at the dinner, noted that it was 160 years since the first strike in U.S. history for which the Philadelphia cordwainers (shoemakers) were tried for criminal conspiracy.

"What was 'criminal conspiracy' then," Wirtz said, "has become one of the great forces for freedom in America and the world."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. William F. Schnitzler, toasting the IBEW, said that the brotherhood "symbolizes the absolute identity of the job, the worker and the union." He added that "on any trade union issue, the support of the IBEW will be swift, sure and solid."

IBEW Sec. Joseph D. Keenan, toasting members past and present, said that "no writer could have written a more thrilling story" than the history of the brotherhood.

He noted the early "brutal and often bloody opposition to unions with its beatings and blacklists." The pioneer leaders had to overcome all this to lay the foundation upon which the union grew, he recalled.

Industry Toasts

Other toasts during the evening were made by W. J. Clapp of Edison Electric Institute to the electrical power industry; by Garth Griffiths of British Columbia Hydro & Power Authority to the electrical power industry of Canada; by Richard W. Osborn of the National Electrical Contractors Association to the electrical construction industry; by J. S. Conway of Western Electric to the electrical manufacturing industry; by Kenneth L. Dally of Central Telephone Co. to the telephone industry and by J. P. Leach of the Washington Terminal Company to the railroad industry.

Pilots' Parley Stresses Safety Needs on Airlines

Miami Beach—Stronger safety measures were urged by the Air Line Pilots at the union's biennial convention here.

The ALPA called for federal regulations requiring installation of protective devices to prevent explosions within the fuel system on all new type transport aircraft and on existing planes that can be adapted to such devices.

Fire and explosions have been the cause of many accidents, the union noted, and loss of life that could have been avoided.

The resolution also called for development of explosion suppression devices, which it said are now within the "technical capability" of the industry.

Another resolution affirmed the ALPA's opposition to reduction of aircraft separation standards, the amount of space aircraft have in which to operate, until collision avoidance safeguards are improved.

The ALPA presented its first gold medal awards for heroism to two pilots and two stewardesses.

National Airlines Capt. Kenneth I. Carlile and First Officer Dennis S. McDaniel won the award for subduing an armed hijacker during a flight from Miami to Key West last year.

Stewardess Nancy Taylor was honored for preventing an armed hijacker from entering the cockpit on another National Airlines flight, from New Orleans to Miami. And Allegheny Airlines Stewardess Barbara Ann Creske received the award for safely evacuating all passengers from a flaming plane in a crash landing.

The ALPA Board of Directors—the union's term for its convention delegates—re-elected Capt. Charles H. Ruby to a four-year term as president. Ruby, a former National Airlines pilot, has headed the ALPA since June, 1962.

A Braniff Airways stewardess, Margie Cooper, was elected to a four-year term as vice president for the Steward & Stewardess Division.

Other officers, chosen for two-year terms, were Clyde Muirheid, an Eastern Air Lines pilot who was re-elected first vice president; Joseph G. Fickling, Piedmont Airlines pilot, re-elected secretary, and Seth M. Oberg, Jr., Western Air Lines pilot, elected treasurer.

Rubber Workers Fill Staff Posts

Akron, O.—Pres. Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers has announced the appointments of Pres. Jack W. Moye of Local 5 here as supervisor of the URW's supplemental unemployment benefits program and of Curtis Treen, the union's SUB specialist, to acting pension and insurance director.

Federal Court Refuses To Ban Pan Am Vote

A federal judge refused to halt a second representation election involving 7,000 Pan American Airways clerical employes, but he agreed that the Railway Clerks have "right and justice" on their side in seeking to postpone the vote.

U.S. District Judge Alexander Holtzoff ruled that his court had no power to enjoin the National Mediation Board from continuing with a mail election. But he granted a 10-day stay on tallying the ballot to enable the Railway Clerks to take further steps to seek redress.

The Teamsters are seeking to oust the Railway Clerks as bargaining representative of Pan Am employes. The Clerks are combatting the raid by urging their members not to vote in the election, since the raid will fail if less than 50 percent of the eligible voters cast ballots.

During the first election campaign last August, fraudulent letters were mailed and circulated to employes—one bearing a faked signature of AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany. The letters and circulars falsely told employes that the Railway Clerks had switched strategy and wanted supporters to write in the name of the union on the ballot.

The National Mediation Board, which supervises labor relations in the airline and railway industry, set aside the vote because of "serious doubt" raised by the election incidents.

The Railway Clerks asked the board to hold off another vote until after completion of FBI investigations into the fraudulent letters and leaflets. But the board directed a second election to be held during the period from Nov. 14 to Dec. 12, and the union sought a court order to block it.

Holtzoff said the mediation board "might have been well advised to withhold the second election until the frauds alleged in the first election had been thoroughly investigated." But he said his court had "no power" to substitute its judgment in the case.

New Challenges Ahead

A YEAR AGO in San Francisco, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany told the delegates to the Sixth Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO, "we can fairly say that the merger, begun in form in 1955, has been largely accomplished in substance and spirit as well. That, in itself, is one of the most important products of this past ten years."

In the year since the San Francisco convention, the AFL-CIO has chalked up new membership gains, scored breakthrough victories in organizing farm workers, functioned effectively as the people's lobby in gaining passage of a new minimum wage floor and expanded coverage as well as a score of other important new laws.

AFL-CIO unions have chalked up new bargaining gains for millions of workers. They have improved welfare and pension programs and provided workers with job security in an era of change and new technology.

The outstanding record of American labor in the first 10 years has been carried over into the 11th year of the AFL-CIO, demonstrating the strength and solidity of the 1955 merger and the federation's continuing vitality and growth.

THE YEAR AHEAD poses new challenges for organized labor, challenges that can best be met by making more effective the structure and organization of the AFL-CIO. Pres. Meany emphasized this need in his San Francisco speech:

". . . Another form of division remains to be overcome. By that, I mean the refusal or failure of local unions to affiliate with their state and local central body. While their internationals share fully in the activities of the national federation, far too many local unions stand apart from their brothers at the state and local levels and do not bear their share of labor's effort to make the American community a better place for all to work and live.

"In the future, these central bodies must play a growing role in the work of the American labor movement. They must be strengthened. Their vitality is crucial to our success. . . . In the period ahead, I want to urge, as strongly as I can, that each international union devote itself to the improvement of the record of affiliation on the part of its local unions—to bring home to those locals their duty to join the labor movement, at the community and the state as well as the national level.

"I AM CONVINCED that we must, in the future, place even greater emphasis upon the consolidation of competing organizations as the way to a more rational and effective trade union structure.

"By this, I do not mean the absorption of smaller units by large organizations in order to expand the jurisdiction of those organizations, or for the sake of size alone. . . . Nor do I suggest that we deviate in any way from the principle that such action must be entirely voluntary. I do, however, strongly suggest that all the responsible officers of many unions, who by all logic and common sense should merge, might well take a broader view of the union as an instrument of progress for working people rather than as an institution devoted to its own perpetuation for the sake of sentiment and tradition.

"We have learned, since 1955, that division is a habit of the mind that can be hard to break. Once broken, however, the pain of the experience is quite tolerable and disappears with time. And the gains can far outweigh the pains."

'We Pledge Ourselves . . .':

AFL-CIO Objectives Restated On 11th Anniversary of Merger

These are AFL-CIO objectives and principles as set by the merger convention Dec. 5, 1955.

THE ESTABLISHMENT of this Federation through the merger of the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations is an expression of the hopes and aspirations of the working people of America.

We seek the fulfillment of these hopes and aspirations through democratic processes within the framework of our constitutional government and consistent with our institutions and traditions.

At the collective bargaining table, in the community, in the exercise of the rights and responsibilities of citizenship, we shall responsibly serve the interests of all the American people.

We pledge ourselves to the more effective organization of working men and women; to the securing to them of full recognition and enjoyment of the rights to which they are justly entitled; to the achievement of ever higher standards of living and working conditions; to the attainment of security for all the people; to the enjoyment of the leisure which their skills make possible; and to the strengthening and extension of our way of life and the fundamental freedoms which are the basis of our democratic society.

We shall combat resolutely the forces which seek to undermine the democratic institutions of our nation and to enslave the human soul. We shall strive always to win full respect for the dignity of the human individual whom our unions serve.

The objects and principles of this Federation are:

1. To aid workers in securing improved wages, hours and working conditions with due regard for the autonomy, integrity and jurisdiction of affiliated unions.

2. To aid and assist affiliated unions in extending the benefits of mutual assistance and collective bargaining to workers and to promote the organization of the unorganized into unions of their own choosing for their mutual aid, protection and advancement, giving recognition to the principle that both craft and industrial unions are appropriate, equal and necessary as methods of union organization.

3. To affiliate national and international unions with this Federation and to establish such unions; to form organizing committees and directly affiliated local unions and to secure their affiliation to appropriate national and international unions affiliated with or chartered by the Federation; to establish, assist and promote state and local central bodies composed of local unions of all affiliated organizations and directly affiliated local unions; to establish and assist trade departments composed of affiliated national and international unions and organizing committees.

4. To encourage all workers without regard to race, creed, color, national origin or ancestry to share equally in the full benefits of union organization.

5. To secure legislation which will safeguard and promote the principle of free collective bargaining, the rights of workers, farmers and consumers, and the security and welfare of all the people and to oppose legislation inimical to these objectives.

6. To protect and strengthen our democratic institutions, to secure full recognition and enjoyment of the rights and liberties to which we are justly entitled, and to preserve and perpetuate the cherished traditions of our democracy.

7. To give constructive aid in promoting the cause of peace and freedom in the world and to aid, assist and cooperate with free and democratic labor movements throughout the world.

8. To preserve and maintain the integrity of each affiliated union in the organization to the end that each affiliate shall respect the established bargaining relationships of every other affiliate and that each affiliate shall refrain from raiding the established bargaining relationship of any other affiliate and, at the same time, to encourage the elimination of conflicting and duplicating organizations and jurisdictions through the process of voluntary agreement of voluntary merger in consultation with the appropriate officials of the Federation to preserve, subject to the foregoing, the organizing jurisdiction of each affiliate.

9. To aid and encourage the sale and use of union made goods and union services through the use of the union label and other symbols; to promote the labor press and other means of furthering the education of the labor movement.

10. To protect the labor movement from any and all corrupt influences and from the undermining efforts of Communist agencies and all others who are opposed to the basic principles of our democracy and free and democratic unionism.

11. To safeguard the democratic character of the labor movement and to protect the autonomy of each affiliated national and international union.

12. While preserving the independence of the labor movement from political control, to encourage workers to register and vote, to exercise their full rights and responsibilities of citizenship, and to perform their rightful part in the political life of the local, state and national communities.

'Progress' Marches Onward But Problems Multiply Faster

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

THERE IS a possibility that we don't live in the best of all possible worlds, so maybe it's time, without further ado, to demand our collective concentration on all possible improvements.

On a rain-soaked journey from Washington to New York, via that vintage conveyance called a railway train, it struck me that we have been almost literally swamped by progress and prosperity. We have been so flooded by scientific and legislative breakthroughs that we merely improvise rather than implement their exciting advantages. The Great Society, in other words, is outrunning itself.

Morgan

No sooner are short-hop jetliners woven into inter-urban service than we must brace ourselves against the impact of supersonic transports, discovering meanwhile what we should have known all along—that we've got to revive fast inter-urban rail service to break the rapidly solidifying car traffic jams.

No sooner do we get medicare for the elderly—and hardly soon enough—than we begin to realize how sick our public health services in general are. We hardly start, as a nation, to divert major federal funds to schools before we are confronted with serious flaws in public education which we had overlooked.

The complexities of life have themselves become vivid issues as progress lunges on to complicate them more. Let's sample, for instance, the editorials in the Washington Post. One tackles the greedy scandal of a rezoning fight in growing Montgomery County, Md. Another deplores conditions in Virginia mental hospitals, reflecting increased strain that "modern" civilization is putting on the human frame everywhere. The Post laments the rise of crimes of violence, which might be less a part of the American way of life if gun lobbyists weren't blocking laws for minimal control of firearms. The paper thoughtfully reviewed the findings of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations on the problems of "Metropolitan America." The report found an average of 301 independent local government units in urban complexes of more than a million population. Chicago has 1060 of these governmental hangnails. There are some 70 separate federal programs for urban development alone.

The New York Times views with alarm the breach of individual privacy made in this Buck Rogers era of scientific marvels by electronic eavesdroppers. Its news columns are drenched with the woes of modern living. A crackdown on unsafe drivers commanded page one attention. So did new plans urged to cope with the growing headache of air pollution after the recent smog emergency.

Two stories on education made the front page—one about stretching recruitment restrictions in order to bridge the teacher gap; the other reporting the marked inferiority of public education offered to children in city slums.

These and a shopping basketful of similar items are anxious news on every main street in the land. Obviously, Americans are concerned about Viet Nam and the global marathon between the open and closed societies. But citizens are more intimately involved with open sewers and closed parking lots, with alcoholism and benzedrine and sleeping pills—at once the symptoms and the alleged soporifics for the ills of a frenetic society.

THE INTERESTING thing is that, as live television by satellite and saturation radio by transistor have brought crises from every corner of the world pouring into the American home like a plague of electronified locusts, we seem to recoil from them and pull inward. People can only absorb so much crisis at a time, especially when a stopped-up kitchen drain or a broken furnace commands priority.

According to our folklore, the American way of dealing with such matters is to invent a new gadget or pass a law, or both. At this juncture, with a few quite readily identifiable exceptions, we have enough laws and enough gadgets in stock to last a month of Sundays. What we need is a period of implementation, simplification and coordination. Chicago does not really need 1,060 separate local government units and urban renewal does not need 70 federal programs to support it either. It already looks like a camel produced by the committee assigned to design a horse.

If the 90th Congress, which convenes in January, didn't pass a single new law but concentrated instead on activating and correlating the mass of social legislation produced by the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations alone it would be the greatest service to the republic since the invention of the paper clip. It also would be a miracle and it won't happen. The Times had another story reporting that voters across the country had widely rejected governmental reforms that would, presumably, avoid duplication, save money and increase efficiency. It was news fit to print all right but it was printed on Page 25.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE CHANGED and changing political situation in Georgia—to wit, the rise of the Republican Party—is basically responsible for the somewhat ridiculous fact that the state's citizens don't yet know who their next governor will be, and may not know for many weeks, and won't know even how he is to be designated until the Supreme Court gives them guidance.

The state constitution has a provision that if no candidate emerges from an election with an absolute majority the decision is transferred to the General Assembly, with the legislators free to pick either of the two top candidates.

This hasn't meant much, in practical terms, in the past because the Democratic candidate has always won at the polls, often without serious Republican opposition.

But this year Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway got about 47.1 percent of the vote, the official Democratic candidate, Lester Maddox, got 46.8 percent, and the remaining 6.1 percent went to former Gov. Ellis Arnall. No majority for anyone.

The American Civil Liberties Union promptly filed a suit charging that the state constitution provision authorizing the General Assembly to take the next step was invalid because it conflicted with a 1963 U. S. Supreme Court "one man, one vote" decision and the state legislature is still malapportioned.

Calloway's supporters filed a separate suit making the same point. The Calloway people asked the court to order a special election between the top leaders; the ACLU asked for a special election open to one and all.

THE CASES got to the Supreme Court in a hurry—on Nov. 21, only 13 days after the election. A three-judge federal district court unanimously ruled on Nov. 17 that the state constitutional provision violated the "one man, one vote" principle, but didn't spell out what the General Assembly and the people could do about it. The Supreme Court granted review and ordered oral argument Dec. 5.

The presumption is that a decision will be made with comparable speed, certainly before the General Assembly meets Jan. 10.

Assuming that the court agrees that the constitutional provision violates the "one man, one vote" principle, the presumption must be that the decision also will suggest how Georgia can get out of its mess. (The state constitution also provides that a governor can serve only a four-year term, but incumbent Gov. Carl Sanders says he will stick around until his successor is duly elected and qualified.)

If the high court instructs the General Assembly to order some kind of special election, the assembly will have to pass the necessary legislation, candidates might have to file again, the ballots would have to be counted.

The election process does not necessarily consume much time; in Great Britain a campaign generally takes only three weeks, and Georgia's politicians are technically adept. Besides, they must already have given the possibilities profound study.

THE HEAVILY-DEMOCRATIC General Assembly still will have to consider permanent legislation. The growing strength of the Republican Party in the state is a significant political factor.

Suppose Calloway eventually is declared elected. He would have four years to stimulate the spread of a basic GOP organization, with people and money, pushing the election of sheriffs, commissioners, more members of the legislature from all over the state.

Purely pragmatically, whatever the state legislature does on election laws had better be done so that it meets U. S. constitutional standards. And purely pragmatically, the legislature had better design a plan that guarantees apportionment of its districts on the "one man, one vote" principle.

The upcoming Supreme Court decision may shed some light on what the principle requires.

In Dept. of Defense:

Consumer Protections Urged For Armed Forces Personnel

AN AFL-CIO spokesman urged a consumer-protection program within the Dept. of Defense to safeguard armed forces personnel and their families.

Dir. Leo Perlis of the federation's Dept. of Community Services Activities said that while victimizing of servicemen may not be widespread, "there are loan sharks and unscrupulous businessmen who do play havoc with the men in the armed forces.

Servicemen, he said, are often especially vulnerable to sharp business practices.

Perhaps a feeling of "here we are today, but tomorrow we may not be around," sometimes contributes to a "devil-may-care" attitude that "plays into the hands of gyps," he said during the AFL-CIO-produced public affairs interview Labor News Conference, heard on the Mutual radio network.

Perlis said an armed forces consumer-protection program should include:

- "Information on gyps and training in basic money management as a part of their basic military training."
- Transfer of unit commanders' authority to enforce installment loans and finance company writs to a "central consumer office at the Pentagon."
- "Denial of military base privileges, such as use of bulletin boards and military newspaper advertising, to finance companies and installment sales firms."

"What we say is that we ought to take a good look at the servicemen's problems as consumers and give them the same protections that we have been recommending generally to protect and safeguard the American consuming public," he added.

Questioning Perlis were Neil Gilbride, labor correspondent for the Associated Press and Harry Conn, editor of Press Associates, Inc.

A CONSUMER-PROTECTION program within the Dept. of Defense is needed to protect servicemen against "loan sharks and unscrupulous businessmen," AFL-CIO Community Services Activities Dir. Leo Perlis (center) told Harry Conn (left), of Press Associates, Inc., and Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press on Labor News Conference, weekly public affairs interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

Income Tax Savings Possible By Planning Before Year's End

By Sidney Margolius

YEAR-END tax planning is a quite legal tax-saving device often used by large taxpayers and self-employed people.

They arrange to pay certain deductible expenses before the end of the year, and postpone receipt of income until after Jan. 1—if they want to reduce their tax liability for the current year. Or they may do the opposite if they expect to have higher income next year or think taxes may go up.

Wage-earners usually don't have the same flexibility in advancing or postponing receipt of income. But you can estimate before the end of the year whether you will take a standard deduction or itemize your deductions, and plan your expenditures accordingly.

If you see that your potential deduction will be more if you itemize, it may be worth paying before the end of the year any additional deductible expenses you already have incurred or soon will. For example, you may be paying off a medical bill or a pledge to your church or charity, or may expect shortly to buy or repair deductible work equipment. You may be able to accelerate the payment or complete it by the end of the year to increase your itemized deductions.

Even if you usually itemize deductions, give particular attention to your medical deduction. You can deduct only that portion over 3 percent of your income. If your medical expenses already are approaching that mark, you must want to pay any outstanding bills before Jan. 1 to include them in this year's deduction.

But if you see that your medical and dental expenses this year will not reach 3 percent, it would be more profitable to postpone whatever expenditures you can until after Jan. 1 to include them in next year's deduction.

People 65 or older, or younger taxpayers who support elderly relatives, should be aware that beginning next year, they can deduct only medical expenses over 3 percent of their income, and drug expenses over 1 percent. Up to and including 1966, the over-65's, or taxpayers who support them, could deduct their entire medical bill.

Thus older taxpayers, or those who support elderly dependents, would be well advised to pay any remaining bills or even secure any needed care or expensive medicines for chronic illnesses before the end of 1966.

Younger taxpayers who support an elderly relative but cannot claim him as a dependent because he has taxable income of $600 or more still can include medical expenses paid on the relative's behalf.

For example, your mother may have income of $600 a year from social security (nontaxable income) and $600 from a house she rents out (taxable income). Her total living expenses for the year are $2,500. Of this, you contribute $1,300, either in cash or in the form of room and board, medical expenses, clothing, etc. Even though you meet the requirement that you provide over 50 percent of the support, you still can't claim her as an exemption because of the $600 of taxable income (you could if her gross income from the house or other taxable income was just $599).

Nevertheless, you can include the medical expenses paid on her behalf in your own medical deduction. In such cases, you save taxes if you pay the medical bills of a dependent rather than give the equivalent in cash.

ALSO PREPARE yourself before the end of the year to prove your claims for dependents such as an elderly relative or a child at college. The Internal Revenue Service pays special attention to claims for dependents outside your home.

In deciding if you do provide over 50 percent of the dependent's support, you need to calculate his total living expenses and how much he himself provides.

Among usual expenses that can be counted are meals; lodging; clothing; medical, dental, and medical insurance expenses; education; contributions to church and charity; entertainment; transportation, and personal care (barber, toiletries, etc.) But you cannot include "capital expenditures" such as the purchase of a car, furniture, or life-insurance premiums.

Millions Prove Ability:

Unions Spur Jobs For Handicapped

The following is excerpted from an address by Harold Russell, chairman of the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped, before the 28th convention of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

AMONG THE MEMBERS of organized labor are approximately 2 million who suffer from some kind of handicap, physical or mental.

These handicaps might range all the way from the effects of rheumatic fever or heart conditions to the injuries resulting from wars, birth damage or from a home, job or auto accident.

The government, as you know, reports by fiscal year, and in the year just ended, handicapped placements across the country topped 300,000, a level they haven't reached since World War II days.

Obviously, now is the time when there is employment for many who might never have been considered because of their record of mental illness or physical disability.

But you and I know that far too many will always need our help. Not long ago I read about a 37-year-old pants presser in New York, who had reached the end of the line. His employer had gone out of business and after 15 years of pressing pants with this same company, he was out in the cold pounding the pavement.

Fortunately, organized labor is on the job in New York and elsewhere. The staff at a local union health and rehabilitation center found that our pants presser had the capacity to become a first rate bookkeeper, and the last I heard his future was certainly brighter than his past.

There is another growing group of handicapped and these are the disabled veterans who are starting to come home from Viet Nam. With battlefield scars, they face the uncertainties of adjustment and acceptance by a society largely molded for the ablebodied.

Fortunately, their road to a job and independence has been cleared and leveled by the several million handicapped workers who in the past 20 years have demonstrated that it's ability that counts more than disability.

MANY EMPLOYERS are convinced today of the sound business advantages of hiring the handicapped, a conviction based on records in black and white—of productivity, safety, reliability, and loyalty set by the handicapped workers themselves.

Perhaps organized labor's most effective efforts have been in working with young people. Each year your state central bodies are involved in the President's program through the sponsorship of a high school contest whereby youths in all states are introduced to the job problems of the handicapped. These boys and girls go out and talk with the handicapped, employers, union people and agency folks in their own home towns.

You understand, of course, that this country is not like some foreign countries where mandatory quota systems have been devised to legally force employment of the handicapped. Our democratic way depends upon such persuasive appeals.

If we have learned anything at all in the past 20 years, it is that virtually any job in America is being held somewhat by some handicapped worker. The handicapped set performance records as good or better than the ablebodied. They also have a much better safety record; their attendance tops that of the ablebodied, and they are frequently more loyal and dependable.

Living With a Clear Conscience Can Be Tougher Than It Sounds

By Jane Goodsell

MY HUSBAND and I spent a rainy Saturday cleaning the basement, and today I waver between a feeling of saintly virtue and an ineffable sense of loss.

I suspect that something of value has gone out of my life, and I'm not talking about the cobwebbed jelly glasses and the rusted egg beater or even the battered highchair, although I'll admit that I had to be forcibly restrained by my husband from retrieving the top of a pair of pajamas that would make good cleaning rags, and a set of cracked cups that would come in handy for dyeing Easter eggs.

Still, he too has his sentimental side. I had to use all my persuasive powers to coax him into parting with his mildewed fishing hat, and I never did persuade him to get rid of his file of National Geographics which, he assures me, are collector's items. Well, what isn't?

But that's not what I meant to talk about. It's not the things that have now been carted away that give me the feeling that something is missing from my life. I guess I can adjust to the loss of those dirt-caked flowerpots and outgrown Halloween costumes.

But I'm not sure I can get along without my guilt pangs. For years now, the disgraceful squalor of my basement has kept my conscience in a perfect swivet. Every time I'd sit down to read a magazine, whenever I'd ponder the possibility of an afternoon nap, my conscience would start yapping and clamoring. Far from being a still, small voice, it berated me like a fishwife with nasty cracks: "So you're too busy to clean the basement, are you?" it would sneer. And: "You ought to be ashamed of yourself! Lolling around reading when your basement looks like a pigpen!"

"Oh, shut up!" I'd mutter, but it was hopeless.

IT IS AMAZING the things you can make yourself do when you are motivated by desire to get out of doing something else. To convince myself that I was too busy to clean the basement, I made 10-layer cakes and bearnaise sauce and quiche Lorraine. Instead of plain fried chicken (which the children love), I made coq au vin (which they don't), the advantage being that it takes three times as long to fix. I painted the upstairs hall. I wrote a book.

But now the basement is clean and so is my conscience. I feel noble and virtuous. The burden of guilt has been lifted from my shoulders, and I no longer feel driven to redeem myself with worthwhile enterprise. My conscience is so clear that I feel perfectly justified in serving TV dinners, taking naps and playing solitaire.

And heaven help me, I probably will.

Barbados Becomes Newest Free Nation

Bridgetown, Barbados—AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph were members of the U.S. delegation officially attending the independence ceremonies of this new Caribbean nation—smallest in the Western Hemisphere.

Chief Justice Earl Warren headed the delegation, which witnessed the passing of the independence documents on Nov. 30 to Prime Minister Errol Walton Barrow by the representative of the British Crown, the Duke of Kent.

The two AFL-CIO leaders also were part of the U.S. trade union contingent bearing greetings to the Barbados Workers' Union on its 25th anniversary observance, just prior to the independence celebration. Among others attending were Sec.-Treas. William H. Bowe of the Sleeping Car Porters and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., and Sec. Morris Iushewitz of the New York City AFL-CIO.

Meany, speaking at an anniversary service in St. Michael's Cathedral, also conveyed the greetings of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions and lauded the contributions of Barbados labor to the ICFTU. He recalled the long association between the AFL-CIO and the BWU and its general secretary, Frank Walcott, and foresaw a continued close relationship.

Silver jubilee tributes to the Barbados labor organization also were paid by clergymen of all faiths, other trade union officials and government leaders, including Prime Minister Barrow and the governor, Sir John Stow, who later was installed as the island nation's first governor general.

Besides being the smallest nation in the hemisphere, with an area of 166 square miles, Barbados also is the most densely populated, with about 1,500 people to the square mile, and many of its skilled workers have emigrated to the United States, Canada and England.

Sugar and rum are the keystones of the Barbados economy, but tourists are being increasingly attracted by the white sand beaches of the island, easternmost in the Caribbean. The Hilton chain recently built a $5.4 million hotel here.

Prime Minister Barrow has declared the new nation's intention to seek immediate membership in the United Nations and "within a matter of months" in the Organization of American States. Barbados has already received provisional aproval as the 26th member of the British Commonwealth.

The island has a long history of self-government as a British colony, dating back to its first House of Assembly in 1639. Most of its population of 250,000 is of African descent.

A RECEPTION in Government House in Bridgeport was among events celebrating the coming of independence to Barbados, the Western Hemisphere's newest nation, on Nov. 30. Sir John Stowe (right), the first governor general, greets Frank Walcott, general secretary of the Barbados Workers' Union (left), and AFL-CIO Vice Pres. A. Philip Randolph. Randolph and Federation Pres. George Meany were members of the U.S. delegation to the independence ceremonies.

TWU Girds For Walkout At Pan Am

New York—Some 12,000 Transport Workers in 90 countries were preparing to strike Pan American World Airways as the AFL-CIO News went to press and negotiations continued on a new contract.

The deadline was set at noon, Dec. 2, after members voted Nov. 23 and 25 to reject a company proposal and support the position of union negotiators.

Pan Am serves 17 U.S. cities and 91 others around the world. TWU represents mechanics, stewardesses, pursers and port stewards. Its contract became openable for revision last July 1 and, when a stalemate resulted, an emergency board was named by Pres. Johnson to make recommendations.

On Nov. 1 the board recommended three wage increases of 5 percent each over a 32-month period, and other benefits as a basis for settlement. Pan Am refused to deviate from the panel's proposals and the union accused it of bad faith bargaining.

Negotiations have been held at Pan Am headquarters here under the auspices of Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., and Assistant Exec. Sec. C. Robert Roadley of the National Mediation Board.

Taylor Named to Air Pollution Panel

George Taylor, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been appointed to the National Air Conservation Commission, formed by the National Tuberculosis Association to serve as a focal point for citizen action in the fight against air pollution.

Paladino Appointed As Top ICFTU Aide

Bridgetown, Barbados—Morris Paladino, a longtime official of the Ladies' Garment Workers, was named assistant general secretary of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions at an ICFTU board meeting here.

Paladino, since 1964 associated with the American Institute for Free Labor Development, had previously served three years with ORIT, Latin American and Caribbean regional affiliate of the ICFTU. He has traveled extensively in Latin America, specializing in education and organizing activities.

His new duties with the ICFTU will include coordination of regional activities of affiliates, trade secretariats and groups friendly to labor.

The ICFTU held its three-day board meeting here at the invitation of the Barbados Workers Union, which was celebrating its 25th anniversary. Frank Walcott, board member for the Caribbean, is also general secretary of the Barbados Workers Union.

Representing the AFL-CIO at the board meeting were Pres. George Meany and Vice Presidents James A. Suffridge, Karl F. Feller, Richard F. Walsh and George M. Harrison.

The board voted to assign a representative to assist the ICFTU's newest affiliate, the three-million member Federation of Indonesian Islamic Trade Unions, in developing education and organizing programs.

The Indonesian Islamic unions were previously affiliated but in December 1964 were forced to leave by government pressure. Recovering freedom of action following political changes in the government, the Indonesian federation applied for ICFTU reaffiliation.

Other Actions

In other board actions the ICFTU:

- Approved a resolution expressing concern about the general rise in interest rates, warning that the increase adversely affects employment and economic expansion in industrial countries and checks assistance to developing countries.
- Reaffirmed support of a program to check an acute and growing world food shortage.
- Placed Assistant General Sec. Alfred Braunthal temporarily in charge of the confederation's secretariat. It also expressed regret that illness had made it impossible for General Sec. Omer Becu to attend the sessions here.

Paladino, named as assistant general secretary, has been deputy to the administrator of AIFLD. Before joining ORIT in 1961, he worked 20 years as an official of Local 91 of the ILGWU in New York City and did special assignments with Locals 25 and 32.

SCENE FROM a new television film depicts Samuel Gompers appealing to Pres. Woodrow Wilson for support of the establishment of an international labor organization to help foster democratic governments and build peace. The action takes place in "The Liquid Fire," a production of the George Meany Foundation, to be broadcast nationwide Sunday, Dec. 11, as part of the Eternal Light series on the NBC-TV network. Leon Janney stars as Gompers. Pres. Wilson is portrayed by Guy Spaul. Local television schedules should be consulted for time and channel.

Press Unit Set By Postal Clerks

St. Louis—Eighty-two editors of local and state publications of the Postal Clerks took part in a two-day workshop and organization session here which marked the formation of the UFPC Postal Press Association.

AFL-CIO Loan Aids Guyana Union Housing

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany announced the signing of an agreement providing a $2 million loan from the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions to the Trade Union Council Cooperative Housing Society of Guyana (formerly British Guiana).

The loan, which amounts to $3.4 million in Guyana dollars, will finance the construction of 568 homes for TUC members.

Meany signed the agreement in Barbados while attending a conference of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Present at the ceremony were Richard Ishmael, TUC president; Joseph A. Beirne, an AFL-CIO vice president and secretary-treasurer of the American Institute for Free Labor Development; Alexander Bookstaver, AFL-CIO investment counselor, and James Holway, director of social projects for AIFLD.

Construction of the 568 homes will begin in late February. Bids are now being invited. The security of the loan is guaranteed by the governments of Guyana and the United States.

This is the second Latin American housing project financed by the AFL-CIO and affiliated unions. The first was the $10 million Kennedy development in Mexico City.

The AIFLD acts for AFL-CIO affiliates in setting up the housing projects and acts as overseer of construction.

New Program Covers Union Group Clinics

Federal mortgage insurance and planning funds are available to unions and central bodies to help finance medical, dental or eye clinics for members.

A provision of the new Demonstration Cities Act incorporates legislation long sought by the AFL-CIO to assist non-profit group health practice programs.

It authorizes the Secretary of Housing & Urban Development to insure mortgages covering 90 percent of the cost of constructing or remodeling a group practice facility providing medical, dental or optometric services. The term of the loan cannot exceed 25 years and the interest rate cannot be above 6 percent.

A significant, little-noted provision of the law authorizes the department to provide technical assistance in planning and constructing such group health facilities. Lack of planning funds has made it difficult for many unions and central bodies to start their own health, dental or eye care programs.

Task Force Named On Urban Hazards

Anne Draper, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research, has been named by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner to a six-member Task Force on Environmental Health & Related Problems.

The committee's task is to seek ways to end the hazards to urban life that man has created lest city dwellers end up living in "sumptuous misery," Gardner said. He directed it to think "at least 50 years ahead" and to look at such things as noise, overcrowding, lack of green space and long hours of commuting as well as air and water pollution.

Chairman is Ron M. Linton of Urban America, Inc., former staff director of the Senate Public Works Committee.

Education Held Vital To Latin Progress

By Gervase N. Love

A broad attack on educational problems is vital to Latin American human and economic progress, said Jack B. Kubisch, director of the Office of Brazilian Affairs in the State Dept., at commencement exercises for the 15th training program of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

The course, limited to trade union educators, was completed by 14 Brazilians, four citizens of the United States and a representative of the Paraguayan labor movement in exile. Graduation exercises were held in AFL-CIO headquarters.

Kubisch declared that the responsibility of the labor movement in raising educational standards south of the border is heavy because "it alone has the capability of making the worker realize his great personal stake."

"Until the worker realizes that greater education—both general and technical—is indispensable both to his own future and well-being and to the progress of his country," he declared, "and until he is willing to make the substantial investment of time and effort which education entails, the best efforts of government and industry will prove only partially effective.

Labor's Opportunity

"If organized labor in Latin America can make the worker realize the immense educational effort, on his own part, which the rapid and effective economic development of the continent requires, it will be making perhaps its greatest contribution to the Alliance for Progress."

Brazilian Ambassador H. E. Vasco Leitao de Cunha voiced his nation's appreciation to the AIFLD for its services to Brazil and urged his countrymen among the graduates to return home "and work for the freedom of unions."

The present government, he said, "wants free unions," but he said improvements in wages and working conditions must go hand-in-hand with increased productivity. Brazilian unions are passing through a period of "great vitality," he observed, decrying the fact that "certain elements" in the labor movement are using unions to promote political goals he described as those of the Communists.

"There is great interest in Brazil," the ambassador said, "in collaboration with the United States labor movement that will bring Brazilian union members into contact with U.S. unionists . . . in the hope that they may attain the degree of growth and capacity for action that characterizes U.S. unions."

AFL-CIO Vice Pres. Joseph A. Beirne, president of the Communications Workers and AIFLD secretary-treasurer, presided at the ceremony, presented the certificates and read a message of congratulations and encouragement sent the graduates by Pres. Johnson through AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany.

Edson Buarque Ferreira of Recife, Brazil, public relations director of the Commercial Workers Union, speaking for the class, described the union educator as "the torchbearer . . . the hope of the majority of workers who, for centuries, have dreamed of a better world and cry out for recognition as men and as citizens."

Henry B. Sargent, an AIFLD director and president of the American & Foreign Power Co., which has large Latin American operations, was the principal speaker at a luncheon honoring the graduates.

He called the AIFLD "a good illustration of constructive collaboration between capital and labor to achieve objectives which are important to both groups and to the public at large."

Sec.-Gen. Stefan Nedzynski of the Postal, Telegraph & Telephone Int'l., also spoke briefly.

AIFLD Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr., on behalf of campesino unions in Venezuela, presented a plaque to William Hickey, vice president of the United Corp. and an AIFLD director, in appreciation for a contribution of tools to a training center by a United subsidiary, the True Temper Corp.

Pres. Alva K. Moore of CWA Local 6137, Corpus Christi, Tex., one of the graduates, presented a plaque from the class to the AIFLD.

APPRECIATION for gifts of modern farm tools to a training school for agricultural workers was expressed by the Farm Workers Federation of Venezuela in a scroll presented to Vice Pres. William Hickey (right), of the United Corp., a subsidiary of which, the True Temper Corp., made the donation. The presentation was made in behalf of the campesinos by Administrator William C. Doherty, Jr., of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, of which Hickey is a director.

compulsory union shop." That's the phrase it uses to describe the right of workers and employers to negotiate a union shop agreement.

Moving away from the defensive at the congressional as well as the legislature level, the "work" committee claims that the election also "paved the way for serious consideration of federal laws to restrict compulsory unionism."

Strategy Sessions

The election returns were hardly dry before the full-time director of the Oklahoma "work" committee was in Washington for strategy sessions with the national organization. And the visit was returned Nov. 22 at the Oklahoma City board meeting.

The state "work" organization said it will concentrate on trying to get a constitutional amendment through the legislature, and will resort to a petition campaign to place the issue on a referendum ballot if the legislature refuses to act. That's what happened several years back, resulting in a massive battle between right-wing groups, the Chamber of Commerce and the Farm Bureau on one hand, and labor, liberals, Negroes and small farmers in opposition.

Despite the fact that union membership in the state is relatively small, voters rejected the union shop ban by a margin of about 25,000 out of 720,000 votes cast.

The Republican sweep in Idaho revived the threat of "right-to-work" in the legislature and the State AFL-CIO predicts "a big push" for a union shop ban. A group of supposedly "moderate" Republicans in the state Senate hold the balance of power. The state's Republican governor-elect has said he would sign a "work" bill if it should pass the legislature, but indicated he would not seek its passage.

Idaho voters rejected "right-to-work" in a referendum in 1958, an election year which saw propositions to outlaw the union shop also defeated by massive margins in California, Colorado, Ohio and Washington. The present chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ray Bliss, was then the Ohio State GOP chairman. He blamed the "right-to-work" advocates for dragging his party down to defeat and declared that he had "repeatedly warned them" of the consequences of being identified with the anti-labor measure.

Against this background, the National Right-to-Work Committee is out to convince state legislators and congressmen that the "work" issue is no longer political dynamite, and that support of "right-to-work" has become "a strong political asset."

as unemployed. "If and when we can develop accurate and meaningful data on the discouraged, it will be time to consider whether they should be included among the unemployed," he argued.

"We strongly approve of the in-depth analysis," Goldfinger commented. But there is no reason, he added, why both cannot be done—"provide the in-depth analysis and also count these people as unemployed, which in fact they are."

The BLS, Goldfinger suggested, put "too much emphasis on achieving a 'clean' statistic." He said this is being accomplished "by ignoring some of the realities of labor market behavior."

He warned that the changes in sampling procedure "would make the unemployment rate a less sensitive indicator than it is at present during periods of high and rising unemployment." And labor, Goldfinger stressed, is "also aware of the fact that economic policy formulation—and, importantly, congressional reaction—is based heavily on the overall unemployment rate."

Nat Weinberg, chief economic analyst for the Auto Workers, wrote Ross that the change would "aggravate" what is already an understatement of unemployment. Its effect, he suggested, "would be to provide an additional excuse for complacency."

Machinists Research Dir. Vernon E. Jirikowic and Industrial Union Dept. Research Dir. Woodrow Ginsburg also strongly supported Goldfinger's objections.

cent of the workers.

From 4 to 5 percent, 11.4 percent of the workers.

From 5 to 6 percent, 14.8 percent of the workers.

From 6 percent and over, 9.9 percent of the workers.

Major manufacturing settlements, according to the report, included two major West Coast agreements—lumber, where three-year pacts called for wage hikes of 45 to 46.5 cents; and paper, where a 12-cent hike was gained over one year.

Apparel industry settlements provided wage increases of 2.5 to 6.5 percent. They included a Clothing Workers agreement covering 35,000 shirt, pajama and cotton garment workers whose increase was 10 cents an hour in each of the first two years of a three-year agreement. In textiles, New England unions won rate increases of 23 cents an hour over three years.

BLS reported that in nonmanufacturing industries, such as telephone, the union won increases ranging from $2 to $5 a week at the start of the year, and $3.50 to $8 a week in September under a new round of three-year contracts, with a provision for reopening for further wage bargaining after 18 months.

In the transportation industry, first-year increases were 16 cents an hour for 35,000 REA Express employes, with an extra 9 cents effective next January.

New York City transit employes achieved wage increases of 4 percent, retroactive to last Jan. 1 and 7 percent next July 1 for 34,000 workers.

Contracts by the Machinists with five major airlines provide wage increases of 5 percent this year for 35,400 ground-service employes, and again on Jan. 1, 1967 and May 1, 1968.

An agreement between the Transport Workers and American Airlines covering 10,000 workers provides three 5 percent increases by Nov. 1, 1967.

Settlements in the construction industry were excluded from the study, but BLS said separate information showed first-year wage changes negotiated in construction this year averaged 5.9 percent, or 6.5 percent a year for wages and benefits combined.

White Collar, Southern Trend Cited:

Bargaining Grows As Unions Expand

Cleveland, O.—"The future of collective bargaining is a bright one" and especially so in the South and the white collar fields, two areas formerly "off limits" for union organizers, Member Sam Zagoria of the National Labor Relations Board said here.

Currently the South is the "hottest" union organizing area, Zagoria told the Federal Bar Association at a labor-management relations institute. But unions are attracting white collar workers in other areas too—teachers, nurses, salesmen, engineers and government employes.

The best years for collective bargaining "still lie ahead," he declared.

Because of "booming" union efforts in southern states, the NLRB has had to dispatch emergency help to its regional offices—attorneys, field examiners and law clerks on temporary assignment to cope with the flood of board business, Zagoria revealed. He added:

"Some of these have been on a fireman basis—one or two at a time for brief periods; some in teams, on assignments running from 30 days to five and six months" during the last fiscal year.

Zagoria cited these figures:

- The NLRB held 2,236 elections in fiscal 1966 in the 17 southern and border states—an increase of more than 100 percent in 10 years—and 114,959 workers voted for union representation—another increase of more than 100 percent.
- Sharp increases in union strength were recorded for Alabama, with 143 elections and 7,533 pro-union votes; Mississippi, where elections nearly tripled in number and pro-union votes were five times as large as those 10 years ago; Georgia and Texas, where both the number of elections and votes for unions were almost doubled.
- By way of contrast, Ohio had an increase of more than one-third in NLRB elections over the decade but votes for unions rose less than 10 percent; New Jersey elections were about one-third more numerous but the union share of the vote "decreased substantially," Zagoria reported.

Tracing recent labor history from the days of the sweatshop and the 84-hour week, the NLRB's newest member recalled that when workers tried to organize, "they frequently found the full might of company and community arrayed against them." In the 1930s, "armed guards, armed policemen, even armed

Building Jobs Lag 5th Month

By David L. Perlman

The job picture brightened in November except in the construction industry, where the slump in employment continued for a fifth consecutive month.

The nation's unemployment rate dropped to 3.7 percent, the Labor Dept. reported, down from 3.9 percent in October and 4.2 percent a year ago.

This is the third time this year that the jobless rate has gone down to 3.7 percent. It has not been below that percentage since November of 1953.

Despite a general improvement, the record was still spotty.

Unemployment rates for unskilled laborers (8.5 percent) and construction workers (9.3 percent) were both higher than a year ago.

The Negro unemployment rate, at 7.4 percent, remained more than double the 3.2 percent white jobless rate. It was down, however, from the 8.1 percent of one year earlier, from October's 7.6 percent and the 1966 high of 8.2 percent in August.

Unemployment among women and teenagers dropped to 1966 lows in November, although part of the change was accounted for by temporary employment of women as Election Day officials during the week of the survey.

The jobless rate for adult men, 2.4 percent in November, was unchanged from the previous two months. However, a new low of 1.7 percent unemployment was recorded for married men. This was the lowest rate since statistics were first kept for this group in 1955.

Also at a record low was the number of persons working a short workweek because full-time work was not available. Adding the

Free World Labor Calls For Rhodesia Sanctions

The Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions has called on the United Nations Security Council to invoke worldwide sanctions against Rhodesia and pledged the support of free world labor in implementing them.

The ICFTU cabled all members of the Security Council on Dec. 7, prior to the council's scheduled meeting on the Rhodesian situation. The cable, signed by ICFTU Gen. Sec. Omer Becu and the organization's representative at the UN, Irving Brown, declared:

"ICFTU representing over 60 million workers in the world urges all-out support for worldwide sanctions against Rhodesia's illegal regime.

"ICFTU stands ready in cooperation with the Intl. Transportworkers Federation (ITF) and its affiliated seamen and dockers unions to implement all mandatory sanctions against Rhodesia which the United Nations Security Council should invoke."

In a separate cable to UN Sec. Gen. U Thant, Becu called attention to free world labor's position on Rhodesia as recently reaffirmed at the ICFTU executive board meeting in Barbados.

The board's resolution said that sanctions so far imposed "had obviously failed to establish fundamental human, political and trade union rights of all Rhodesians" and declared that the speediest and most forceful action was needed now to ensure that the people of Rhodesia as a whole can govern themselves freely on the basis of universal suffrage.

The resolution urged the UN to give immediate consideration to all measures and sanctions for obtaining this objective and pledged full support of the international trade union movement for all actions designed to help the people of Rhodesia in their struggle for human and political dignity.

Great Britain has taken the Rhodesian question to the UN after Prime Minister Harold Wilson made a final effort to settle the crisis peacefully. The Rhodesian white minority regime rejected Wilson's terms.

The crisis erupted last year when the white minority in Rhodesia declared its independence from Great

Chicago — An about-face by the Chicago City College System on terms for bargaining with the Cook County College Teachers Union sent 648 striking teachers back to their junior college classrooms after a three-day walkout on eight campuses.

Local 1600 of the American Federation of Teachers agreed not to strike or disrupt classes for the system's 38,000 pupils so long as good-faith bargaining continues. The college Board of Education withdrew its demands for a no-strike pledge and its refusal to negotiate a written contract.

"The board has committed itself, in writing, to reach a collective bargaining contract," Local Pres. Norman G. Swenson said, "and not to exact any reprisal of any sort against any faculty member, against any clerk or against any student who supported the strike."

Federal Funds Released To Bolster Construction

The Administration acted to loosen the mortgage money squeeze which has pushed the home-building industry into a serious recession during a period of general prosperity.

Pres. Johnson announced the latest move at his Dec. 6 news conference—a decision by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board to advance $500 million to savings and loan associations that have run out of funds for home mortgages.

The additional money, the President said, will help "ease the shortage" of mortgage funds "that has depressed the housing and construction industry."

Johnson noted that a few days earlier the Federal National Mortgage Association had made available an additional $250 million to finance mortgages on houses in the low and moderate price range.

The presidential comments came as an employment decline in the construction industry went into the fifth consecutive month.

While the shortage of lendable money has been a major factor in the homebuilding slump, another important element has been high interest rates which have priced many potential buyers as well as builders out of the housing market.

The AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., in a recent statement, blamed the interest rate spiral for the "chaotic condition" of the construction industry.

It traced the housing decline to the action of the Federal Reserve Board in September 1965, when it raised the key discount rate from 4 to 4.5 percent. This touched off higher interests costs on all types of borrowing and a competition for deposits which drained large sums from savings and loan associations —the principal source of mortgage money—to commercial banks.

Johnson credited legislation passed by Congress last year that set tighter controls on interest paid on savings certificates for halting the drain on savings and loan association deposits.

He said this made possible the action of the home loan bank system in advancing the additional $500 million. These "advances" are in effect loans from the reserve system to member banks and must eventually be repaid.

Mainstream of Kenyan Life Absorbs U.S. Longshoremen's Training Unit

Mombasa, Kenya—The husky U.S. dockworkers who came here to instruct East Africans in speedy cargo-handling are not likely to be accused of living behind walls in an American enclave.

Richard A. "Sugar Lips" Robinson of New York, once a sparring partner of former heavyweight champion Joe Louis, spends his days instructing stevedore supervisors on the docks and his off time teaching boxing to local youths in the Mombasa Municipal Stadium.

William L. Mason of New Orleans teaches Sunday School classes in the church-going community, while his wife, Elnora, is in demand among African women's groups for talks on Negro life in the U.S.

Carl Briseno, who learned judo in New York City and holds the Black Belt signifying his proficiency in the Japanese art of self-defense, runs four judo sessions for men and one for women at the Mombasa Judo Club on Kilindisi Road. He and his wife Jo have been drawn into African social life in large part through Mrs. Briseno's ability to speak Kiswahili, the popular language of the Kenya coast.

All the men are members of a bi-racial team recruited by the Longshoremen for a stevedore improvement project sponsored and financed by the U.S. Agency for Intl. Development and East African Cargo Handling Services, a joint agency maintained by Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania to develop this port, the principal outlet for freight in East Africa.

All team members are veterans of ILA Local 1419 in New Orleans or of ILA locals in the port of New York. They are here with their wives and children for a two-year stay on the project, managed by Porter Intl. Co. of Washington, D.C., under an AID contract.

Primary purpose of the project is to restore port productivity, interrupted by the withdrawal of European supervisors after Kenya achieved its independence. AID has given a $360,000 grant to assist an on-the-job training program, and the Moore-McCormack, Farrell and Lykes shipping lines made a contribution also.

But the community relations work was developed by the dockworkers on their own, with the encouragement of the sponsors.

Capt. Charles W. Wright of Washington, D.C., team chief, has made talks before the Kenyan Supervisors' Association and other local groups. Other team members have their own ways of communicating—Michael J. Galecki, Brooklyn, N.Y.; Thomas C. Healy of Woodside, N.Y.; Edward Foley of Rego Park, Queens; Richard Harris of Astoria, N.Y.; James J. Kirby of East Keansburg, N.J.; and Isaiah L. Harris of New Orleans.

Boxing Team

Kirby has been helping Robinson teach boxing. When the local boys get proficient enough they plan to challenge a team from Nairobi for a match. The club has the support of Lance Jones, director of Mombasa social services.

Robinson once fought the late Gus Lesnevich, former world light heavyweight champion, and compiled a record of 62 wins in 65 professional bouts, he says.

Briseno learned judo while a student at New York University. He is the first Black Belt holder to live in Mombasa.

The ILA work team has been concentrating on good housekeeping, clearing the docks of obstructions which may impede movement or cause accidents. Two other team members, Healy and Richard Harris, have shown talent in designing inexpensive cargo-handling gear to speed up coffee loading in U.S. and other vessels without major new investments.

Guild Washington Pact Sets $233 Editorial Scale

General increases totaling up to $33 a week over a three-year period were won by the Washington-Baltimore Newspaper Guild in new contracts with the Washington Post, locally owned morning daily, and the afternoon Daily News, a Scripps-Howard newspaper.

Minimum pay for experienced employes in key classifications will rise to $233 a week—highest in any daily newspaper contract—at the Post, and to $228 at the News. Another high mark was set at the Post when a $93 raise in the weekly minimum rate was won for experienced outside classified salesmen.

Both settlements, reached with the aid of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service on the brink of strike deadlines, gave ANG Local 35 union security in the form of a partial Guild shop. The agreement was that seven out of 10 new Post and News employes must join the Guild—a formula established by an arbitration board in last year's Baltimore Sunpapers strike and later incorporated into the Guild's contract with the Washington Star.

Minimums for experienced reporters, deskmen and photographers at the Post and News and for display salesmen, administrative clerks, principal clerks and librarian at the Post will rise in four steps of $8.25 each at nine-month intervals.

The resulting $233 minimum for reporters and display ad salesmen is $23 higher than the highest previously negotiated in any daily newspaper contract—$210 at the Washington Star.

The new top minimum for outside classified and real estate salesmen at the Post gives those employes wage parity with reporters and display salesmen. For experienced workers the rate raises $68.25 a week now to $208.25, and by three nine-month stepups to $233.

Some 75 to 100 other Post employes will be raised $53 a week to reach parity with newsmen and display salesmen by March 1, 1969. Establishment of a new editors' classification at 20 percent above the top reporter minimum will produce a new minimum of $279.60 a week at the final step—the highest in any Guild daily newspaper contract.

Employes in all other categories and in lower steps of the major categories will receive four increases of $5 a week over a three-year period.

The modified Guild shop represents a long-sought breakthrough at the Post and News. Under it, management may designate three of each 10 new employes for exemption but the three may join the union if they so choose.

Buckmaster Hailed For URW Service

Cleveland, O.—Hearty thanks for the 15 years' service of L. S. Buckmaster as president of the Rubber Workers was expressed by the union's executive board at a meeting here. A resolution paid tribute to Buckmaster's contributions and hailed him as "a man of integrity, a man of courage . . . who all of his life has given so much of himself to help others."

Buckmaster, also a former AFL-CIO vice president, retired at the age of 66 in 1960 and now lives in Largo, Fla., with his wife, Olive.

"May you find that inner comfort and satisfaction," the resolution said, "that comes with the knowledge that you have done so much for so many in the true spirit of brotherhood."

United Funds Expand Labor Liaison Staffs

Ten new full-time AFL-CIO Community Service liaison representatives have been added this year to the staffs of local united funds and community chests to raise the total to 140 in 108 communities, Dir. Leo Perlis of the federation's Dept. of Community Services said.

An additional 13 full-time AFL - CIO - CSA representatives serve on a national level and five function statewide in Michigan and Pennsylvania. The total of 158 does not include community services representatives employed directly by the AFL-CIO and affiliated bodies, Perlis said.

He said the function of such representatives is to work closely together "to help meet the personal and family needs of union members and other citizens; in community organization and social action; in providing services for the poor; in consumer and health and welfare counseling; in youth and senior citizen activities; in blood bank work and disaster relief; in strike assistance and fund-raising for voluntary health and welfare agencies."

Perlis predicted that 1967 will witness the continued growth of the program. Three more communities have agreed to employ full-time labor representatives next year and others are expected to follow suit.

The board presented counter-proposals at a first negotiating meeting to Swenson and other union bargainers. The union called that a step toward its goals but not necessarily the end of the struggle.

The next move, the teachers said, depends on the board, the city budget-drafters and the city fathers headed by Mayor Richard Daley. There is no money to date in the budget for raises, the union's major objective.

Local 1600 won collective bargaining rights for 684 full-time junior college faculty members in an election last summer. When its representatives asked for a package of benefits including a pay hike of $200 a month in the next school year, the board set 17 pre-settlement conditions, including the no-strike guarantee.

All but 36 faculty members picketed at six day colleges and two evening colleges. They were out for three school days, but returned when the board agreed over the weekend to start bargaining.

Meanwhile AFT Local 1, representing 22,000 Chicago city teachers, announced that it will conduct picketing demonstrations the week of Dec. 12 at each of the city's 600 schools in turn in support of its campaign for improvements.

The local wants a full contract next September supplanting the memorandum of understanding with the School Board which expired Nov. 9.

German Actors Backed in Strike

Hollywood—The Screen Actors Guild has cabled a pledge of "full support" to a newly-formed German Actors Union which is striking for higher pay for performers who dub the voices of American actors into German in movie and television films.

More than 700 German actors stopped all dubbing work on Nov. 1, SAG Pres. Charlton Heston was informed by Helmo Kindermann, a board member of the German Actors Union. There is more than a trade union bond between the two actors. Kindermann is the voice of Heston when his films are shown in Germany.

Grievance Accord Reached at GE Plant

Cincinnati, O.—Agreement on machinery for disposing of more than 5,000 unresolved grievances was the key to settlement of a contract dispute between the General Electric Co., the Auto Workers and the Machinists in GE's jet engine plant at nearby Evendale.

A Taft-Hartley injunction ended a strike of 6,400 union members Oct. 17, but another walkout was in prospect at the end of the 80-day injunction period. Dir. William E. Simkin of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service called the negotiators to Washington, D.C., where agreement was reached Dec. 4, subject to membership approval.

Members of UAW Local 647, representing 4,800 workers, ratified the three-year pact by a 5-1 margin. IAM Lodge 912, representing 1,600 others, was to vote Dec. 11.

The Evendale contract settling local issues was keyed to the national agreements reached in October with GE and the Westinghouse Corp. by 11 AFL-CIO unions that coordinated their bargaining through a national committee.

The committee announced that two additional unions recently reached agreement on local supplements at the Westinghouse plant in Sunnyvale, Calif.—the IAM and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers—but that 15 other locals with 16,000 members remain on strike over local issues. They are:

Still on Strike

Against Westinghouse, IBEW locals at San Lorenzo, Calif.; Bloomington, Ind.; Athens, Ga.; Richmond, Ky.; Upper Sandusky, O; Portland, Ore.; Dover, N.J., and Cheswick, Pa.; Local 1013 of the Flint Glass Workers at Bath, N.Y.

Against GE, more than 12,000 members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, the Plumbers and the Technical Engineers at Schenectady, N.Y.; AFTE Local 1013 at Pittsfield, Mass.; Carboloy Local 771 of the Auto Workers at Warren, Mich., and UAW Local 716 at GE's small appliance plant in Fort Smith, Ark.

At GE's Evendale plant, the UAW won skilled rate adjustments of one to 10 cents an hour; formation of a safety committee with three union members on duty 24 hours a week on company-paid time; a new grievance procedure under which joint committees have from Jan. 3 to April 3, 1967, to settle a backlog of 5,000 grievances, after which a strike may be called.

Also the UAW settlement makes the nationally negotiated wage increases retroactive to Oct. 17 and provides two cost of living adjustments keyed to the index of the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor statistics, with a guaranteed raise ranging between one-half of 1 percent and 1.75 percent.

IAM members have been offered establishment of a 60-day grievance period during which 400 unresolved grievances must be processed before a strike may be called; a study of 13 skilled trades classifications; a joint safety committee; upgrading of workers in two classifications, and other gains paralleling the UAW agreement. New wage rates at Evendale will range from $3.265 to $4.16 an hour in the first contract year, the IAM said.

At Sunnyvale, 1,300 members of the IBEW won an additional wage hike of five cents an hour; narrowing of seniority units from eight to two; and a language change to base upgrading mainly on seniority. Terms of the IAM settlement were not reported.

soldiers faced the demonstrators." The result was "bloodshed, violence and bitterness."

Since Congress enacted the Wagner Act of 1935, the concept of collective bargaining has won acceptance as a "peaceful and orderly way" to settle industrial arguments, he declared, to the end that "hundreds of thousands of labor-management contracts are testimony to the law and order" now existing.

Non-Unionists Benefit

"The impact of collective bargaining has not been limited to the organized," he declared. "It has forced major improvements in working conditions for the unorganized as well" by firms seeking to remain unorganized, and by labor's legislative efforts in putting floors under wages and getting safety standards into law.

As conditions of employment improved, some workers began to question the need for joining a union and thus made unions "the victims of their own success." But recent union gains indicate a turn in the road, Zagoria said.

AFL-CIO Organizing Dir. William L. Kircher reported recently that affiliated unions in fiscal 1966 won 57.8 percent of the elections they took part in, the best mark in a decade. Unions took part in 5,461 representation elections and won 3,159—the highest number in 13 years for both categories.

Zagoria said the AFL-CIO victories won bargaining rights for 243,994 workers, the greatest number in seven years.

He predicted that collective bargaining will grow as unions attract more white collar workers. Arbitration of grievances, now required in 9 of every 10 contracts, will continue to gain in popularity, he said.

As to compulsory arbitration, he noted that a Gallup Poll showed a 54 percent segment of those polled suporting it. But "those who earn their daily bread and butter in industrial relations—lawyers for unions and managements—voted 2 to 1 against it in a recent American Bar Association discussions," Zagoria said.

Pan American Employes Vote On New Pact

New York—An agreement that headed off a strike of 13,000 members of the Transport Workers against Pan American World Airways was submitted to a vote of mechanics and flight-service employes at 128 company locations around the globe.

Details of the agreement were not released, pending ratification, but a union spokesman said the tentative settlement was a "very good" one with benefits exceeding those recently won by the same union for 12,000 TWU members at American Airlines.

The union said members were to vote at local meetings here and in Miami, San Francisco and other locations and by secret mail ballot of stewards, stewardesses and other flight service personnel.

Chairman Francis A. O'Neill, Jr., of the National Mediation Board assisted in negotiations when a strike deadline neared. Union representatives extended the deadline and TWU members remained on the job.

Earlier a presidential emergency board recommended wage increases totaling 15 percent over a 32-month period, with further bargaining by the parties on the question of reopening the contract in its later stages for a cost-of-living adjustment.

The presidential board included Chairman David H. Stowe, a member of the permanent Missile Sites Labor Commission; Charles H. Rehmus, co-director of the University of Michigan's School of Labor & Industrial Relations, and University of Texas Law Professor Jerre S. Williams.

The board pointed out in its report that the high rate of productivity in air transportation "creates an economic environment in which wage increases may be above average but price increases need not result."

First Contract Settles Potato Packers' Strike

Presque Isle, Me. — An 11-week strike that followed 11 months of alternate bargaining and court fights over a first contract ended successfully when American Bakery & Confectionery Workers Local 264 won a 36-cent package from Potato Service, Inc.

The fledgling local also obtained the union shop, dues checkoff, seniority rights and restoration of all strikers to their jobs without discrimination.

The package deal included 32 cents an hour in wage increases alone—12 cents retroactive to Nov. 1, another 8 cents a year later, and a second 12 cents on Nov. 1, 1968.

The victory was attributed by ABC Pres. Daniel E. Conway to the determination and fighting spirit of the more than 200 strikers.

The union organizing campaign at the plant was climaxed by a National Labor Elections Board victory in October 1965.

After a few moves in the direction of bargaining, the company announced it was challenging the NLRB certification. It lost at every step, but forced the NLRB to go into the courts for an injunction—the first it had had to seek in Maine—ordering the firm to comply with the law.

The company still continued to stall and finally the workers voted to strike. The firm freezes a wide variety of potato products sold under brand names throughout the country. A "don't buy" campaign was mounted with the help of the international union, which said that both national chain outlets and independent stores cancelled orders.

The settlement also provides for an additional paid holiday, raising the total to seven; one week vacation after a year of service and two weeks after three years; a full grievance procedure and a shop steward system, and company payment of the total cost of health and welfare programs already in effect.

George Meany at a meeting in Washington after the former had attended the Caracas, Venezuela, world congress of the Intl. Federation of Petroleum & Chemical Workers, of which he is a vice president. Sudano recently led his 3 million-member, democratic Indonesian labor center back into the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Printers Upheld on Right To Bargain Separately

The Supreme Court let stand a National Labor Relations Board ruling upholding the right of the Typographical union to bargain separately with seven New York newspaper publishers.

Local 6 of the ITU had for many years bargained with the seven papers jointly through the Publishers Association of New York City, but served notice nine months in advance that it desired to negotiate separate contracts for the period beginning March 30, 1965. The association refused to agree and the NLRB's ruling of a Taft Act violation was upheld by the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, New York.

The board, in a 2-1 decision, said the facts were identical with those in a Detroit News case, where the NLRB held unions have the same right as employers to withdraw from multiple bargaining units provided they give timely notice of intent.

The Supreme Court refused the publishers' petition for a review of the Appeals Court decision.

The high court also refused to review decisions in three other labor cases. One was a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia upholding an NLRB finding that the Aero Corp. of Lake City, Fla., should bargain with a union possessing authorization cards signed by a majority of employes even though a note at the bottom of each card stated they were for use in support of a request for an NLRB election as well as for company recognition of the Auto Workers as bargaining agent.

In another case, the Supreme Court ruled that a railroad worker did not have to exhaust all federal arbitration and contract grievance procedures before bringing suit for wrongful discharge. The 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, Richmond, Va., had set aside a $4,500 damage verdict won by Fireman Roy Walker from the Southern Railway System on the ground that he had not exhausted all procedures under the road's contract with the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

The court majority noted that Congress revised the Railway Labor Act last June, but that the revisions did not apply to Walker, who lost his job in 1957. It returned the case to the appeals court for a ruling under another line of decisions. Three justices dissented from the ruling—John M. Harlan, Potter Stewart and Byron R. White.

Shoe Workers Win 3 Brockton Votes

Brockton, Mass. — The United Shoe Workers has won bargaining rights in three plants here whose 1,200 workers have been represented by an unaffiliated union since 1933.

Labor board votes were: Knapp Shoe Co., 303 to 230; Dartmouth Shoe Co., 187-124, and Commonwealth Shoe Co., 157-103. Loser in each case was the Brockton Brotherhood.

Who's Carrying the Load?

THE AVERAGE factory worker, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is actually in worse financial shape now than he was last year.

That's not the comment of liberal economists or labor analysts; it's the comment of a leading business publication, "Business Week."

The magazine, in an analysis of "why there's less left to spend," notes that though average weekly take-home pay for a worker with three dependents stood at a record $100.33 in September, this was only a few pennies more than he was earning last December.

"And when the BLS works a cost-of-living adjustment into its index of 'net spendable earnings,' that minor gain is replaced by a significant decline. Last December 'real' earnings after taxes came to nearly $89.75 a week. In September they were $87.93, a decline of 2.1 percent."

Business Week says that despite record incomes and employment, U.S. consumers "are having their troubles finding money to make ends meet." Most of the trouble comes from a very slim gain in what is termed "discretionary purchasing power"—the income consumers have left after meeting basic and unavoidable living expenses.

While personal income for the third quarter of 1966 was running 5.8 percent ahead of the final quarter of 1965, discretionary buying power has risen only five-tenths of 1 percent, the magazine says.

Part of the difference is ascribed to the $7.5 billion rise in tax collections by the federal and state and local governments. Living costs are also eating into income left over for purchase of durable goods, and the tight money, high interest rate situation is boosting costs for mortgages and consumer loans.

"Low and middle income families apparently are bearing the brunt of this year's squeeze," says Business Week, while the affluent are reaping higher dividend and personal income payments.

This analysis by a leading business publication leads to but one conclusion; that consumer purchasing power must be maintained and expanded if economic growth and prosperity are to continue. And the first step is to restore the loss in real earnings by American workers.

Broadcasting Fairness

WHEN A RADIO or television station is granted a license to broadcast on a certain wavelength in a specific geographic area during a specified number of hours daily, that's an exclusive franchise. With it comes a right to speak editorially, but also a responsibility as to the treatment of issues and individuals and organizations.

If a station chooses to express a certain viewpoint, then it must expect to air the views of those who hold contrary beliefs; if the station is critical of an organization or individual, then it must expect that a request for air time to answer will be made by the injured party. This is the Federal Communication Commission's "fairness doctrine."

In most instances it works well. Among those who have utilized the doctrine to build a better community understanding of their views are civil rights groups, United Nations supporters, church organizations, anti-defamation groups and unions.

When unions find themselves under attack, they have the duty to seek air time. To fail to do so is to cede the issue to the opposition and deny the community a full airing of the issue. And, fully as important, where a station refuses to meet its community responsibility, it is the duty of those denied the use of the "fairness doctrine" to lodge a full and documented complaint with the FCC.

Federal-State Tax Sharing Plan Shapes Up As Key GOP Plank

A PROPOSED federal tax sharing with the states may be a key plank in the Republican program for the 90th Congress.

Spurred by their successes in winning an additional 47 seats in the House and three more in the Senate, Republican leadership has decided to make the proposal a major objective next year.

The idea, originally given prominence in 1964 by Walter Heller, then Pres. Johnson's chief economic adviser, was considered by the Democrats for a time, but dropped.

Now there would appear to be a strong chance that it will become a hot battleground. Here is the story:

For many years the states have found themselves under increasingly heavy burdens to provide the public services required by their growing populations. These include education, roads and highways, sanitation, police and fire protection, health and hospitals. Costs have gone up enormously and the states and local communities have been finding it increasingly difficult to find the revenues that they need.

As a result they have been looking more and more eagerly to the federal government to bail them out, and a great deal of the so-called federal "interference" with the states is simply based on the fact that the states have been asking for it.

However, the basic question that must be asked is, "How well are the states facing up to their financial responsibilities themselves?"

The answer is a mixed one. At least a dozen states have no income tax at all. Others have small income taxes. Tragically for working people, most of them depend heavily on sales taxes which hit the low-income worker far more heavily than the wealthy consumer.

Despite the fact that the states still have a long way to go in tapping the tax sources that are still available to them through a more equitable system of income taxes, the drive is on to use, in effect, the federal government as a tax collection agency with the federal government returning to each state a percentage of the federal taxes raised in that state. There are many objections.

In the first place, the states are already getting a share of the federal income tax—or at least their wealthy citizens are. The federal government permits deduction of state income taxes in computing federal taxes. This means the saving of many millions of dollars to state residents and a decrease in income for the federal government.

THE FEDERAL government already puts many billions of dollars into state treasuries in the form of matching grants—in the case of highways as much as 90 percent—and the amount of such returns to the states increases each year.

However, the matching grant and direct federal subsidy system involves one factor that many of the states don't like. They involve federal standards and federal oversight as to how the money is spent.

Without restrictions on their use:

- Such funds might be used by one state to lure industry from another through a corresponding reduction in state taxes.
- They might be used to replace federally-supported expenditures in the states to enforce anti-discrimination and minimum wage legislation.
- The unrestricted use of federal funds might well encourage some states to relax efforts to face up to their own tax problems.
- A return of a fixed percentage of federally collected taxes would benefit the wealthy states which need help the least at the expense of poor states which need it the most.

There are two formulas that would be preferable in giving aid to the states where they undoubtedly need it. One would be to make a substantial increase in federal grants-in-aid with the present system of federal standards, and two, an outright federal tax credit in income taxes paid to the states would encourage a more equitable state income tax system. (PAI)

Morgan Says:

25 Years Blur War's Horror As Nations Play with Matches

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

IT SEEMS a little incredible to those citizens with a certain age seniority in the American population that there are millions of voters alive today who were unborn on Dec. 7, 1941. Yet there it is. Time keeps passing without a stop.

There is a powerful magnetism to reminiscence. Maybe one of the reasons old soldiers never die is that they enliven their fading memories with heroic battle exploits bigger than life. There is one thing about recall—anything short of total recall, that is—which deals both mercifully and treacherously with past experience: Almost invariably the thrill comes through and the horror is left behind. The pleasure is preserved and the pain slowly ebbs away. There are exceptions of course but on the whole this is the way the human nervous system is built to operate. Life is a tough enough proposition as it is from day to day without a person's having to tote around a true impression chamber where private tragedies of the past, in peace or war, are turned on periodically in the vivid totality of their torture.

Morgan

But the treachery of this phenomenon of remembered experience lies in the distortion which its very pain-killing mercifulness renders. The security of mutual terror, which the theoretical nuclear standoff between the opposing great powers may be said to provide, rests on the premise that neither side dare employ its weapons first because both are agonizingly aware of the holocaust that the first nuclear strike and the answering reprisal would add up to in this age of the hydrogen bomb. This precarious balance of terror on a leash is the nearest thing the world has for the moment to a system of arms control. But it is not a substitute we should settle for. For one thing the terror may not be enduring enough.

We scare ourselves periodically with visions of an incinerated planet. But does the fright add real drive to our declared determination to "do something" about disarmament? Or does our conscientious nightmare shrink obligingly, after a moment of projected reality, into the category of, say, The Man From U.N.C.L.E., to be continued as a serial of fantasy on the television screen of the imagination?

The latter is more likely because, ironically, nobody knows anything about nuclear holocaust personally except the surviving victims of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Time cannot have mellowed their memories much. But they represent an almost microscopic proportion of the world's population. World War II provided numerous non-atomic horrors, before and after Pearl Harbor, which should be unforgettable but they are not.

Furthermore, as I indicated at the beginning in relation to Pearl Harbor alone, there is not only blurred experience a quarter of a century after the event but non-memory. Some 96 million Americans have been born since that December day, 25 years ago. Of that number 69 million were born after Jan. 1, 1950. Before very long, more than half the population of this country will be composed of people to whom both World War II and the Korean War are nothing but history lessons.

THE AWFUL DANGER is that no nation has learned these lessons well enough. Compared to the tortuous options of today, the decision which Pearl Harbor compelled the United States to take was supremely simple. There was nothing to do but declare war and fight until the enemy was vanquished. Now the countries that harbored the enemy, Japan, Italy and Germany—the free part of it—are all our allies. And two former allies, China and the Soviet Union, are in varying degrees in the enemy camp.

Nothing is simple and the war in Viet Nam is proving about as easy to solve as the most difficult jigsaw puzzle ever devised—with the key pieces missing. There are some dubiously reassuring factors in the chaos that passes for today's international scene. Between 1918 when World War I ended and 1939 when World War II began, 21 years elapsed, a generation. It was an interlude of fumbled political opportunities and the Depression, the greatest economic failure the world has ever known.

Strangely, it has been just 21 years since World War II ended. Korea and Viet Nam have intervened, not to mention Hungary, Suez, the Congo, Cyprus and Malaya. But this same span of years has also seen the greatest global prosperity—never forgetting the impoverished exceptions—since the beginning of civilization, coupled with a sunburst of scientific achievement so vast that it makes the industrial revolution of the 19th Century look like something Rube Goldberg invented.

Yet we are still children playing with matches. The Soviet Union is deploying an anti-missile system and the most multi of the multibillion-dollar decisions confronting the Johnson Administration is whether to devise one too and dig the fallout shelter system that is supposed to be de rigeur with it. In France, Soviet Premier Kosygin said there was a "community of interest" between Russia and the United States. As things stand it's the world community, and that should interest everybody.

Equity President Charges:

Union Ban on Race Bias Resisted By Some Theatrical Producers

THE PRESIDENT of Actors' Equity said in a recent radio interview that while the union has won non-discrimination clauses in all of its contracts, some resistance to lowering racial bars persists in the business end of the theater.

"Where we run into difficulty is with the 'powers that be'—the producers—the people who run the show" as a commercial venture, Equity Pres. Frederick O'Neal said.

"There are these kinds of things not only in our own field . . . but in many other fields as well," he noted.

"This is stupid" and is only "prolonging something that must eventually come to pass," O'Neal declared on Labor News Conference, a public service production of the AFL-CIO heard weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

DISCUSSING the current state of the theater, O'Neal said the increasing interest of colleges and universities in education and training aimed at performing arts careers is a good sign.

He cited the recent Capahosic, Va., conference among representatives of several major colleges and leaders from the professions as an example of new interest and growing harmony. The conference was sponsored by the National Association of Dramatic & Speech Arts and the Phelps-Stokes Fund, to explore the extension of opportunities for professional training through education and the theater.

"The very fact that we were able to establish some kind of communication was significant in itself," he said. "This does not mean that there were not differences of opinion expresssed, and expressed very strongly, but there was not the kind of hostility that existed before."

O'Neal noted that growth of regional theaters around the country has boosted "professional theater activity by more than 30 percent" in the last two seasons.

Questioning O'Neal were John Carmody, author, lecturer and long-time former drama editor and critic for the Washington Evening Star, and Roy Meechum, drama critic for the Post-Newsweek stations.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE SUPREME COURT produced a whopper of a decision in ruling that the Georgia House of Representatives had denied the constitutional rights of Julian Bond by refusing to give him his elected seat because of Bond's public opposition to the military draft and the Viet Nam war.

The Georgia legislators were wrong, of course. Bond had unpopular views, he expressed them, and the House of Representatives decided he was unable conscientiously to take an oath of office to uphold the federal and state constitutions.

Since when is some outside body authorized to pry into any other person's conscience and good faith in taking a simple oath of office? Can good faith be measured by the bushel or weighed by the pound?

There are 50 state legislatures. It would be astonishing if there were not some incumbents, who have already taken an oath of office, who also are critical of the draft and other policies.

This is minority dissent, but dissent is one of the basic rights of all.

Bond was duly elected from an Atlanta district, elected again, and now has been elected a third time. Surely no one can believe that his presence in the House chamber would taint that body.

The high court had to set a precedent in its ruling. Under the constitutional system familiar in this nation, each legislative body is the sole judge of its own members. The U. S. Senate, for example, has what has been considered a clear constitutional sanction to seat an applicant for membership, reject him or, if he was seated, to expel him, with the courts barred from interference under the doctrine of the separation of powers. So did the Georgia House of Representatives, it was believed, no matter how outrageous and unwise its judgment might seem.

The Supreme Court has now said that this is not necessarily so—that if the basic free speech right is violated when a legislative body denies an elected member his seat, the action is void.

The Georgia attorney general had conceded that the court could interfere if the reason for denying Bond his place had been that he was a Negro.

Chief Justice Earl Warren in his opinion observed that if this was so the court could take action to defend Bond's First Amendment free speech right.

Other points should be noted:

- The court carefuly refrained from a direct declaration that the Georgia House must admit Bond; it simply said that the refusal to admit him had been unconstitutional.
- The decision was unanimous.
- Bond himself had most vigorously argued that he could take the oath in good faith and conscience.
- The upcoming Speaker of the newly elected House, convening in January, said that so far as he knew no further effort to bar Bond would be made.

THE COURTS were required to act in another political case a couple of years ago—in California.

This one involved Pierre Salinger, already a member of the Senate by appointment, who was running for election for a full term. California officials refused to certify his name for the ballot, ruling that Salinger did not qualify under the state's one-year residency law.

It was a stupid ruling; Salinger had indeed lived in and around Washington rather than in California for eight years or so. But he was a native Californian, he had grown up and worked as a newspaperman in the state before going to work for the Kennedy brothers. "Domicile" is a tricky word.

The California Supreme Court pointed out that qualifications for Senate membership were set by the U. S. Constitution (30 years of age, nine years a citizen, inhabitant of the state at the time of election). No state by residency laws could expand the qualifications, the court ruled.

INTEREST in providing education in the performing arts is on the rise among colleges and universities, Pres. Frederick O'Neal (center) of Actors' Equity Association said on Labor News Conference. Post-Newsweek Stations' Drama Critic Roy Meechum (left) and John Carmody, author and lecturer, questioned O'Neal on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, broadcast nationwide each week on the Mutual radio network.

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS in AFL-CIO policies and programs were spelled out for the labor attaches of other countries at a meeting in Washington. Shown at the session are, from left, J. J. Watson of Great Britain and Lukas Burkhardt of Switzerland with three AFL-CIO staffers: Education Dir. Walter G. Davis, Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone and Harry Goldberg of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs.

Labor Costs Hold Steady in U.S., Rise Sharply in Other Countries

Unit labor costs in the United States and Canada remained almost unchanged since 1957 despite a sharp rise over the same period in seven other major industrial countries.

A new Dept. of Labor study provides the first set of statistics comparing both unit labor costs and productivity in the principal nations of the free world. Its title: "Unit Labor Costs in Manufacturing: Trends in Nine Countries, 1950-65."

The unit labor cost represents the ratio of employe compensation to production. It includes wages, fringe benefits and legally required employer payments such as social security taxes. Productivity measures the output per man-hour, without regard to the changes in the labor cost for an hour of work.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics study divides the period covered into two parts: from 1950 to 1957 and from 1957 to 1965. In the earlier half, unit labor costs in the United States rose by about the average for the other countries in the survey.

During the latter half of the survey period, however, the stable unit labor costs in the United States and Canada compared with rises of 39 percent in the Netherlands, 35 percent in West Germany, 19 percent in France and Great Britain, and 18 percent in Japan. Sweden and Italy also had significant increases in unit labor costs over this period, the Bureau of Labor Statistics noted.

Recent statistics, reported since the period covered by the survey, show a moderate upward trend in unit labor costs in the United States. The Commerce Dept. said its index of labor cost per unit of manufacturing output rose in October to 102.1 percent of the 1957-59 average, the highest since March of 1961.

The BLS study also compares productivity—the output per man-hour—from 1950 through 1964. During this period productivity increased about 45 percent in the United States, but well over 100 percent in West Germany, Italy and Japan.

All three of the nations showing the largest productivity increases suffered heavy damage to manufacturing plants and equipment during World War II, the study notes.

Low Base

"Their rapid increase can be explained in part by the abnormally low levels of output that prevailed as late as 1950, when these countries were still restoring their economies," it notes.

The BLS further points out that many of the industries in the three nations were rebuilt with newer and more efficient equipment than that of other industrial nations.

Between 1950 and 1964, hourly compensation in manufacturing at least tripled in France, West Germany, Japan, the Netherlands, Italy and Sweden. It almost doubled in the United States. But despite the slower rate of pay growth, the U.S. worker still earns more than his counterpart in any of the other nations surveyed, the BLS observes.

9 White Collar Unions Form Coordinating Unit

Formation of a council of AFL-CIO unions for professional, scientific and cultural employes was announced at a Washington, D.C., meeting attended by spokesmen for nine affiliated unions representing more than 1 million white collar workers.

The council said in a statement that its objectives include improving the effectiveness of professional unions—not only by encouraging the unorganized to join existing unions but in the following ways also:

- Preparing informational material explaining the place of professional, scientific and cultural employes in the labor movement.
- Conducting research on problems common to all white collar unions—work standards, portable pensions, fringe benefits, the growing role of federal, state and local governments as employers, and the place of the worker in policy determination.
- Conferences to further the interest of professional workers.
- Information on legislation involving union members.

The AFL CIO Executive Council at its August 1966 meeting adopted a report of a subcommittee approving creation of a council of professional workers composed of members from different unions who fit that classification and have common objectives and problems. The report specifically recommended a coordinating council of unions rather than the creation of a new AFL-CIO department.

The council has a potential of 10 million white collar workers, including some 7 million who are presently unorganized, Pres. Charles Cogen of the American Federation of Teachers told a press conference.

"This is one of the important areas where unions of the AFL-CIO have a potential for real growth," Cogen said.

Represented on the council steering committee are members of Actors Equity, the Musical Artists, the Musicians, Technical Engineers, Insurance Workers, Airline Pilots, Government Employes, Broadcast Employes and the Teachers.

Debs Home Given Landmark Status

Terre Haute, Ind. — The National Park Service of the Dept. of the Interior has designated the Eugene V. Debs home here as a National Historic Landmark, declaring it of "exceptional value" in illustrating a phase of American history.

Debs, five times the Socialist Party candidate for President, is singled out in the citation as the founder of industrial unionism and head of the American Railway Union.

The Debs home is maintained by the Eugene V. Debs Foundation, which also carries on an educational program in cooperation with Indiana State University. The home was designated last year as a state historical site by the Indiana legislature.

Rail Workers Hail Stand:

ILO Transport Unit Affirms Strike Right

Geneva—The full right of railway workers to strike was proclaimed by the Intl. Labor Organization's Inland Transport Committee in the conclusions it adopted at a two-week session that just ended here.

This recognition that the public service nature of the railway industry is no ground for denying its workers the right to strike was welcomed by the two-man AFL-CIO delegation as the "greatest single achievement" of the 28-nation conference sponsored by the ILO, the United Nations specialized labor agency.

Eli Oliver, economic adviser of the Railway Labor Executives' Association, stressed that the proclamation represented the first outright affirmation of the strike right by an international body consisting of government and industry representatives as well as union spokesmen.

Another major labor victory was the committee's adoption of the principle that the minimum guaranteed wage in the railway industry must assure the worker a reasonable standard of living.

This provision was viewed by Lester L. Zosel, international affairs director of the Railway Clerks, as the foundation for the "coherent pay structure" that the committee said the industry should have.

At the session's outset Rudolph Faupl of the Machinists, U.S. worker delegate on the ILO Governing Body, praised the Inland Transport and other ILO industrial committees for their work "to assure the greatest possible agreement between workers and employers on how to most effectively improve living and working conditions."

Faupl had been named by the worker members of the Governing Body, the ILO's executive board, to represent them at the transport meeting.

The efforts of the industrial committees, Faupl said, contributed toward the ultimate goal of a "dynamic, worldwide prosperity."

On the question of walkouts, the committee ruled that being employed by a railway should not deprive workers "of the right which other workers have to go on strike in defense of their occupation interests."

This did not necessarily exclude prior arrangements concerning such matters as the giving of strike notice or the maintenance of certain transport services.

But, as the worker delegates stipulated, even such arrangements would be unacceptable if "not agreed upon through collective bargaining."

The worker group also declared that it was "directly opposed to the use of injunctions" aimed at curtailing "the effectiveness of strike action" and would continue "to press for the elimination of such action."

Family Needs

The committee agreed that in determining the "reasonable" standard of living that should be guaranteed at even the minimum wage level factors such as the family needs of workers should be considered.

The committee also said that another starting point in establishing a balanced pay structure was the elimination of all discrimination whether it be based on race, color, sex, religion, political opinion or any other factor that would deny in any way "equality of opportunity or treatment in employment."

It was likewise agreed that pay scales should allow for "progressive improvement in the workers' standard of living."

The basic guidelines drafted for the railway industry by the committee were viewed by the AFL-CIO delegates as particularly important to young unions.

IUE Names Bartelli To Legislative Post

Osmero Bartelli, assistant to Organizing Dir. Dan Arnold of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and a staff member since 1957, has been named to a new IUE post in which he will assist local unions and district councils requiring assistance with federal agencies.

He also will be responsible for cooperating with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, and was charged by IUE Pres. Paul Jennings with fashioning and working for the enactment of a legislative program tied directly to IUE needs.

Rhodesia Sanctions Urged by ICFTU

Britain rather than go along with a new government that would have included representatives of the African majority in the country.

At its December 1965 convention the AFL-CIO called upon the U.S. government "to initiate moves that will quarantine the Ian Smith racist regime and bring to a speedy end the pretensions of this insane power-drunk clique."

NEW HEADQUARTERS of the Barbados Workers' Union, in Bridgetown, was the scene of the recent convention of the Caribbean Congress of Labor.

Higher Standards Proposed:

Labor Dept. Urged to Curb Farm Worker Importation

The AFL-CIO asked the Labor Dept. to end an Immigration Act loophole that allows foreign farm workers to be brought into the United States for temporary harvest work.

Conditions of U.S. farm workers have improved greatly since the end of the bracero program two years ago eliminated the largescale importation of foreign farm workers, union witnesses testified at a Labor Dept. hearing. They cited evidence that there is no shortage of domestic farm workers when decent wages and working conditions are offered.

If the Immigration Act loophole is not closed completely, AFL-CIO spokesmen urged, at least the Labor Dept. should raise the minimum wages employers must offer U.S. workers before applying for the admisson of alien labor.

Current standards, set by the secretary of labor on a state-by-state basis, range from $1.15 to $1.40 an hour. The Labor Dept. hearings are to consider changes in the existing standards.

AFL-CIO Position Spelled Out

AFL-CIO Assistant Research Dir. Frank Fernbach and Arnold Mayer, legislative representative of the Meat Cutters and chairman of the AFL-CIO farm labor legislative subcommittee, presented the federation's position. Also testifying for an end to the use of alien labor was Kerry Napuk, research director of the Packinghouse Workers.

The biggest step toward ending the importation of farm workers came in 1964, when Congress—at the urging of labor and church groups—refused to renew the bracero program. Since then, smaller groups of foreign workers have been admitted under a section of the immigration law that allows temporary importation of workers when the secretary of labor certifies the need and determines that it would have no adverse effect on U.S. workers.

The number of alien farm workers dropped from 200,000 in the last year of the bracero program to 35,000 in 1965 and 25,000 this year.

As an alternative to complete elimination of all foreign labor, Fernbach proposed the following standards that growers would have to meet before they could apply for admission of workers from other countries to meet a labor shortage:

- An hourly wage rate that would not be below $1.55 an hour in any state. Even this, Fernbach noted, is "barely" above the poverty level.
- A higher minimum rate in states with better conditions. "In states where minimum hourly rates are established by collective bargaining—in California, for example—the adverse-effect rate should be at least equal to the negotiated minimum," including fringes.
- A weekly wage guarantee not less than $62 in any state.
- Higher rates for farm jobs that are "particularly hazardous or arduous."

Fernbach warned that "to do less would further degrade employment opportunities for Americans in agriculture, properly lead to the rejection of substandard farm jobs by Americans when better alternatives are available, and thus inevitably restore cheap imported labor as a major source of manpower in our fields."

Gains Emphasized

Mayer stressed the gains that had come to U.S. farm workers since the end of the bracero program.

An estimated 80,000 to 100,000 new jobs were created for U.S. workers, he said. Farm wages rose an average of 15 percent in two years, with the biggest gains in jobs formerly done by braceros. "U.S. workers flocked to the crops when the higher wages were available," he noted.

Another important development, Mayer said, is the growing organization of farm workers into unions, now that "foreign strike breakers are no longer available."

Despite warnings that crops could not be harvested without imported labor, "not a single major crop failure occurred because of a lack of labor," he pointed out.

Napuk testified that although major improvements resulted from the end of the bracero program, "much higher and much better living and working conditions are desperately required" for U.S. farm workers. He warned that importation of foreign labor would "undercut" efforts of farm workers to improve their conditions and turn the power of government into "an anti-labor instrument."

Mounting Rail Accidents Held 'National Disgrace'

A 32 percent increase in railroad train accidents over two years is a "national disgrace," the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen declared in a letter to Alan S. Boyd, designated by Pres. Johnson as the nation's first secretary of transportation.

BLF&E Pres. H. E. Gilbert, citing the latest train accident statistics compiled by the Interstate Commerce Commission, urged Boyd to make the improvement of railroad safety one of the primary aims of the new department when its begins functioning in January. The safe operation of common carriers and the reporting of accidents will come under the control of that department at that time, he noted.

Gilbert said rail accident statistics for the January through April period of 1966, in comparison with those for the same periods of 1964 and 1965, document the "almost complete deterioration of rail safety." He said they show that collisions increased 26.7 percent, derailments 35.1 percent and accidents from miscellaneous causes 21.6 percent. The over-all increase was 32 percent.

"In other industries, a 32 percent increase in the number of accidents would be cause for great concern," Gilbert said in a letter congratulating Boyd, now Under Sec. of Commerce, on his appointment, and offering the BLF&E's "full cooperation."

Railroads Silent

"Crash" programs would be called for in other industries with a poor safety record but in railroading, "the opposite seems true," said Gilbert. He added: "Except for employe organizations, no voice in the industry is raised to plead for better safety programs, less hazardous working conditions, and more attention to safe operation than to profit."

The BLF&E president said he is convinced that the removal of thousands of firemen and train service employes from their jobs in 1964 has a direct relation to the "huge increase" in accidents, though unions are "accused of self-interest" because they point out that relationship.

"Whatever the cause," he declared," the government cannot ignore the death and destruction" reflected by a one-third increase in accidents in a two-year span.

Gilbert called for "searching investigations," strict control of reporting and enforcement of the indicated changes. He expressed the hope that Boyd will "guide the department into a meaningful role in this essential work."

TWUA Calls for Boost In Lagging Hosiery Pay

Charlotte, N.C.—The hosiery industry was urged by its unionized employes to raise general pay levels when the wages of its lowest-paid employes are boosted to $1.40 an hour next Feb. 1 under the new federal minimum wage law.

The pay increase was backed by 60 delegates from 13 states representing hosiery workers affiliated with the Textile Workers Union of America who met at a two-day conference here.

It came after TWUA Pres. William Pollock in his keynote speech blamed the textile industry in general and hosiery manufacturers specifically for the fact that North Carolina factory wages are the lowest in the country.

As the state's largest employer, Pollock said, the textile industry "keeps North Carolina glued to the bottom of the ladder because its $1.91 average lags 71 cents an hour below the national manufacturing average of $2.62."

The state's hosiery mills, which account for 55 percent of the national production, "deprive their workers even further because their wage structure lags between 79 cents and $1 an hour behind national factory standards."

Average pay in women's and seamless hose is but $1.83 an hour, he added, and in children's and men's hosiery, it "drags far behind at a shameful $1.61 an hour."

"Ironically enough," Pollock continued, "when the key vote to raise the federal minimum wage to $1.40 next February and to $1.60 a year from then was taken, not a single North Carolina congressman voted for the measure and only one congressman supported it in South Carolina, which is third from the bottom of the national wage ladder."

Dir. Adolph Benet of the TWUA Hosiery Division, the conference chairman, reported that 1966 was "one of the best" years in many for hosiery workers with "substantial gains" in every contract negotiated.

"Even so," he added, "hosiery workers have a long way to go in their quest for working conditions which approach those prevailing in enlightened industries."

EXPO 67, Canada's way of celebrating the 100th anniversary of its confederation and Montreal's 325th birthday, is 100 percent union made. It is keyed to the theme "Man and His World," and the top photo shows one of six pavilions being built to house exhibits on sub-themes. In the middle is Habitat 67, a pyramid cluster of 158 homes illustrating a new concept of family life in a high density urban development. Below, workers erect the West German pavilion, a giant tent-like steel mesh supported on eight masts, with a plastic skin suspended from it. Expo 67 opens next Apr. 28 and will have a six-months run. It is expected to attract some 35 million patrons who will reach the fair site on a new high-speed rail transit system from downtown Montreal.

Labor Challenges Fitness:

FCC Hearing Urged On Station's License

The AFL-CIO has challenged the fitness of an Ohio radio station to retain its license as a result of its refusal to correct inaccuracies in a series of critical editorials or to allow the federation air time in which to reply.

In a complaint to the Federal Communications Commission, the AFL-CIO charged radio station WMRN, Marion, O., with flagrant violations of the government's "fairness doctrine" in denying a "discussion of conflicting views on an issue of public importance" and for failure to give the AFL-CIO an opportunity to reply to personal attacks.

The complaint climaxed a two-month-long exchange during which the AFL-CIO sought to prove by documentary evidence that editorial statements critical of the federation were based on misinterpretations. Each attempt to correct the record was rejected, the federation charged, only to be followed by another editorial more critical of organized labor and AFL-CIO leadership.

The complaint asked that an FCC hearing be held to consider revoking or not renewing the station's license when it expires on Oct. 1, 1967. The letter to the FCC was signed by AFL-CIO Public Relations Dir. Albert J. Zack.

The dispute began on Aug. 14 when a station editorial claimed that Pres. George Meany had threatened Congress with political retaliation if airline anti-strike legislation were enacted. The editorial declared that when Meany urged Congress not to "pass legislation that you will regret for the rest of your lives" he was threatening the constitutional rights of freely elected representatives. The editorial accused Meany and other union leaders of exercising "dictatorial power undeserved and unjustified in a free society."

The AFL-CIO responded by offering for the station's examination a transcript of the question-and-answer period which followed the Meany statement, in which he specifically ruled out political retaliation. Meany told reporters, the transcript showed, that his statement was a caution to Congress of the long-range effect such legislation could have on the nation and the threat it posed to our democratic structure.

The station ignored the documentation and the request that the "erroneous implication" be corrected. Instead, a second editorial was broadcast that repeated the charge and accused the AFL-CIO of speaking from "prejudiced interests."

The AFL-CIO again attempted to set the record straight and again was ignored. Two weeks later the station broadcast a third editorial assailing AFL-CIO personnel.

'Attack' Charged

The editorial charged that the AFL-CIO's reaction to the editorials was typical of labor. "If you can't argue issues, attack the individual. If a congressman or senator votes contrary to what labor wants he is not granted the courtesy of having a mind of his own, principles and ethics of his own, he is supposed to do just what labor wants and that is all," the editorial declared.

At this point the AFL-CIO abandoned its plea for editorial corrections and asked that the station provide air time under the provisions of the "fairness doctrine" for a presentation of the federation reply. When the station failed to respond, the complaint was filed with the FCC.

The AFL-CIO bases its complaint on the "fairness doctrine" provision requiring that where organizations or individuals are attacked or controversial issues are aired, the station has an obligation to broadcast opposing opinions. The doctrine is based on the principle that the station owner has a public trust in using the airwaves and his license requires that he serve the entire public, not himself alone.

Kircher of the Dept. of Organization at a three-day conference of AFL-CIO regional directors and their assistants in AFL-CIO headquarters. ## Labor's Role in U.S. Praised by Church

Providence, R. I. — The recent convention of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO here was hailed as "a splendid manifestation of the increasingly articulate role labor has come to assume in American life" in an editorial in the Providence Visitor, published by the Catholic diocese.

"To trace the history of American labor is to trace a parallel course in the history of America itself," the editorial said. "No other agency on the American scene can take comparable credit for the long, progressive thrust from the days of row houses and robber barons to the present level of economic affluence. We salute the AFL-CIO for their vital part in this."

3-Year Pact Solves L.A. Orchestra Crisis

Los Angeles—A three-year package nailing down outstanding conditions for symphony musicians has been won by Musicians Local 47 for the 100-man Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

The pact ended a 20-day dispute which had blacked out the philharmonic's 48th season, due to open Nov. 1.

With federal mediation aiding settlement, the Local 47 contract with the Southern California Symphony-Hollywood Bowl Association provided, among other things:

- Minimum weekly pay rates of $200 this season, $210 next year and $225 the third year. The old minimum was $180.
- A guaranteed 37-week season, plus one week paid vacation, expanding to 43 weeks and three weeks vacation in 1968-69.
- Pro rata vacation pay, instead of the minimum rate, which means each player will receive his own base rate.
- An increase in individual insurance from $1,000 to $5,000.
- An increase in pensions from $110 to $175 a month.
- An increase in sick leave to four weeks a year after four years.
- A basic work week of four concerts and four rehearsals.

The contract also was virtually overhauled as to language. Pres. John Tranchitella of Local 47 declared the new wordage made the pact "one of the best agreements in the U.S. symphony field."

Local 47 had contended its members were locked out by the symphony association. The association cancelled rehersals and its season after orchestra members rejected management's "final" offer Oct. 31.

Orchestra members picketed the swank Music Center, site of the symphony season, on an informational basis.

The National Labor Relations Board obtained a temporary injunction against the picketing after other entrepreneurs at the music center filed a secondary boycott charge, claiming the picket line interfered with an operatic concert.

Symphony management said an emergency 90-day loan made the new contract possible.

Tranchitella indicated the union sympathizes with management's fiscal problems but orchestra members in the past had, in effect, subsidized their own work.

Molders Hold Ontario School On Arbitration

Toronto, Ont.—The Molders through their Ontario Conference Board and many of their employers in this province joined to stage a school on arbitration which was attended by more than 90 union shop stewards, grievance committee members and management officials.

The program was set up by Ray MacDonald, Molders' research and education director. A morning session was devoted to a discussion of the pros and cons of arbitration between Drummond Wren, labor consultant, and Don Pyle, management consultant from the Central Ontario Industrial Relations Institute.

At an earlier session, MacDonald detailed the steps in the grievance procedure and Wren outlined the presentation of an arbitration case.

Jobless Rate For November Dips to 3.7%

work-hours lost by this group to the time lost through unemployment, the Bureau of Labor Statistics came up with a figure of 3.9 percent of the economy's man-hours lost through joblessness and under-employment.

Nonfarm payroll employment, which usually declines between October and November, rose by 100,000 to 65.3 million. On a seasonally adjusted basis, this is equivalent to an increase of 275,000 jobs. The big gains were manufacturing employment, up 100,000; an 80,000-job increase in government employment, and a pickup of 65,000 jobs in service trades.

Employment in construction fell by 150,000, more than the seasonal pattern. The tight-money market and soaring interest rates are generally blamed for the continuing decline in construction jobs.

Over the past 12 months, civilian employment has expanded from 72.8 million to 75 million workers, and unemployment has declined from 2.97 to 2.64 million. The largest part of the civilian labor force expansion took place among adult women.

There was no significant change in the factory workweek or in average earnings of manufacturing workers over the month. The hourly rate was up 1 cent to $2.76 in November, 11 cents higher than a year ago. The average weekly earnings of $113.99 were 14 cents above October and $4.28 more than in November of 1965.

Mine-Mill Session To Vote on Merger

The top officers of the Steelworkers will attend a special convention of the Mine, Mill & Smelter Workers in Tuscon, Ariz., Jan. 16, 1967, called to act on ratification of a merger agreement.

The steel union announced that Pres. I. W. Abel, Sec.-Treas. Walter J. Burke and Vice Pres. Joseph Molony have been invited and will attend the convention. The recent convention of the USWA formally endorsed the merger proposal and gave the union's officers authority to complete the details.

If the Mine, Mill convention approves the merger agreement, it will become affiliated with the Steelworkers on Feb. 1, 1967. Together both unions represent about 80 percent of the organized workers in the non-ferrous metals industry.

Guild Contract Settles BNA Strike, Boycott

Support from the labor movement—in the form of hundreds of cancelled subscriptions — was credited by the Newspaper Guild with bringing about a settlement of a 210-day strike against the Bureau of National Affairs, which publishes a number of labor-management reports.

Members of the Washington-Baltimore Guild local returned to their jobs at BNA after signing of a new contract providing improvements in wages and working conditions and a step toward the union security goal sought by the union.

Non-strikers at BNA withdrew a decertification petition, paving the way for the contract signing.

Top officers of the Newspaper Guild announced that the ANG is renewing its own subscriptions to BNA publications and in a letter to other unions recommended it as "the only all-union service in the labor-management reporting field."

Major Job Centers Post Best Mark in 15 Years

Sixty-five of the nation's 150 major industrial centers had an unemployment rate under 3 percent in October, the Labor Dept. announced. This was the largest number in 15 years.

Six large communities moved in October from the moderate unemployment bracket—3 to 5.9 percent—to the low unemployment rating of 1.5 to 2.9 percent. All six had been in the moderate unemployment category for at least four years. They are New Haven, Conn.; Louisville, Ky.; Shreveport, La.; Syracuse, N.Y.; Winston-Salem, N.C.; and Fort Worth, Tex.

A year ago, only 46 major centers were in the low unemployment group while 19 were in the substantial unemployment categories of 6 percent jobless or more.

There was no change from September to October in the listing of substantial unemployment areas. Still with 6 to 8.9 percent jobless were Fresno, San Bernardino-Riverside-Ontario, and Stockton, all in California; Fall River and Lowell, Mass., and Altoona, Pa. Two Puerto Rican areas still have unemployment over 9 percent, Mayaguez and Ponce.

No city is yet in the Labor Dept.'s labor shortage category of less than 1.5 percent unemployment.

Unions Widen Direct Role As Job-Training Sponsors

NEW MOBILE UNIT has been acquired by the Central Westmoreland County (Pa.) AFL-CIO for "Project H.E.L.P.," its share in the war on poverty. The council has a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity to operate a central service referral agency to help low-income residents obtain the services outlined in the project's initials—health, education, learning and planning. Admiring the new unit are (from left) John Truxell, project director; Ralph Orbin, Sr., president of the central body; Chairman Anthony Pedelle of the council's Community Services Committee, and Frank McGrath, former council president during whose tenure the project was initiated.

Make New Use of U.S. Programs

By David L. Perlman

Unions are moving into large-scale participation in the federal government's most ambitious manpower program — on-the-job training designed to give a foothold on the job ladder to the hard-core unemployed and upgrade the skills of thousands of workers dead-ended in low-paying jobs.

The latest in a series of national training contracts awarded unions under the Manpower Development & Training Act is ready for the final signing ceremony.

It spells out a commitment by the Carpenters to arrange with employers in 48 states for on-the-job training of 2,000 unemployed workers—half of whom start off with such educational handicaps that they will need eight weeks of job-related schooling before starting training.

The program also calls for 1,000 journeymen carpenters to be given advanced training in skills that will increase their job opportunities and wages.

Seven-State Program

Earlier this month a similar contract was signed with the Auto Workers covering the training of 2,000 jobless workers at auto part supplier firms in seven states.

The Operating Engineers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, Machinists, Barbers and Laborers have all begun or completed national training agreements with the Labor Dept.

Locals and district councils of many other unions have been sponsors of training programs; city central bodies have participated in communitywide programs, and the West Virginia State AFL-CIO has matched trainees and employers on a statewide basis.

Nine-Year Jobless Aid Fight Won

The Auto Workers won a nine-year battle with General Motors Corp. over unemployment benefits for 4,800 union members as the U.S. Supreme Court declined to involve itself in an interpretation of a state's unemployment compensation law.

Refusal of the high court to review a Michigan Supreme Court decision paves the way for payment of more than $500,000 to members of two UAW locals at Flint who were laid off in 1957 because of a parts shortage resulting from a local issues strike at a GM plant in Ohio.

Second Refusal

In another action, the U.S. Supreme Court also refused to review an appellate court decision upholding a long-standing policy of the National Labor Relations Board.

At issue was the right of a union—in this case the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers—to require a company to open its books if it pleads poverty as justification for changes in work rules and schedules.

The NLRB, as it has in other cases, ordered the Celotex Corp. to open the books on its Marrero, La., operations to the union to justify its loss claim. The company appealed the decision but the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the NLRB and the union. The case dates back to 1961.

The Michigan unemployment benefits case involved issues comparable to those in an earlier precedent-setting case between the Ford Motor Co. and Ford employes.

Here, too, the Michigan Supreme Court had upheld the UAW's position and the Supreme Court refused to review the case.

The GM case was somewhat complicated by a switch in the state court's position. In 1965, with only five justices participating, the Michigan Supreme Court voted 3-2 to uphold GM's position. Last June, after the case was reheard with two additional justices taking part, the decision was 4-3 against GM and for the workers.

Michigan's unemployment compensation law was modified by the 1963 legislature to limit the conditions under which workers idled by a strike of a local of the same international in an out-of-state plant can qualify for unemployment compensation.

The change did not apply retroactively, so the GM case was considered under the former law. UAW experts say the GM claims would still be valid if the same situation were to occur today.

Medicare Approved For All Canadians

Ottawa, Ont.—The House of Commons has given final approval to a government bill setting up a system of medicare for all citizens of Canada.

The measure was enacted by a 177-2 vote after the Liberal administration had defeated a series of efforts to broaden its coverage beyond the final government draft and also moves by both the New Democrats and the Conservatives to restore the original effective date of July 1, 1967.

The target date at first was set to coincide with observance next year of the centennial of Canadian confederation, then put off until 1968 as an anti-inflation move.

Last-minute efforts were successful in amending the bill to permit the federal government to include funds for the services of dental surgeons, optometrists, podiatrists, psychologists, physiotherapists, chiropractors, osteopaths and naturopaths, all of which would have been excluded.

The bill requires the government to pay half the cost of approved programs set up by the provinces. At an estimated $34 for each of Canada's 20 million citizens, the cost is expected to be around $680 million a year.

Four criteria are set which the provinces must meet if they are to share in the plan. They are:

- Coverage of at least 90 percent of the province's population, with the figure rising to 95 percent over the years.
- Coverage of all services by physicians.
- Guarantees of protection for persons moving from one province to another.
- Direction of the program by administrators responsible to each provincial legislature.

The Canadian Labor Congress favored the bill despite a feeling that it had been "watered down" from the original draft.

A spokesman said the CLC felt too much latitude was left to the provinces and that federal standards should have been stricter; that

Study Finds Union Dues Reasonable

A detailed examination of local union dues structures has led Leon Applebaum, associate professor in the Labor Education & Research Service of Ohio State University, to the conclusion that they "tend to be" on the low side.

Applebaum examined reports that included dues and fee structures which were filed with the Labor Dept. under the Landrum-Griffin Act by 3,461 locals in the major Great Lakes port cities of Chicago, Detroit, Duluth, Superior, Milwaukee, Toledo, Cleveland and Buffalo. The results of his study are published in the current issue of the Labor Dept.'s Monthly Labor Review.

He found that of 2,689 locals with prevailing-fee schedules,

Georgia Legislature To Elect Governor

Election of a new governor of Georgia will be made by the state legislature, convening Jan. 10, under a Supreme Court decision.

The popular election of Nov. 8 threw the state into confusion because neither of the major party candidates, Democrat Lester Maddox and Republican Rep. Howard (Bo) Calloway, won a flat majority. Calloway had a narrow lead of 449,894 to 448,044 in the unofficial tally, but 57,832 write-in votes were registered for a liberal Democrat, former Gov. Ellis Arnall.

The Georgia state constitution has long provided that a candidate must win a flat majority and that, failing such a majority for any candidate, the legislature shall choose between the two with the highest popular vote totals.

The right of the legislature to exercise this power in relation to the 1966 election was challenged in two suits. Calloway argued that the legislature was overwhelmingly Democratic, with all Democrats having been pledged to support the party ticket. The American Civil Liberties Union in a separate action charged that election by the legislature would violate the Supreme Court's "one man, one vote" doctrine, since its members are admittedly still chosen from grossly malapportioned districts.

The Supreme Court ruled in a 5-4 decision that there is nothing inherently illegal in the Georgia pro-

D.C.'s Elderly Poor Get Aid from Fellow Seniors

By Eugene A. Kelly

A group of senior citizens in the capital of the U.S. has enrolled for volunteer service in a unique project which fittingly seeks to aid other senior citizens.

Twenty latter-day Good Samaritans, appalled by the unmet needs they found among the elderly poor in last summer's medicare registration program, have offered their hands—and their hearts—to the job of aiding some of the most desperately deprived oldsters.

Companionship, they discovered, is the most urgent need of the aged poor who live lost to sight in the poverty pockets of big-city slum areas, such as Washington's Cardozo School neighborhood. But companionship leaves many other needs unmet.

So the National Council of Senior Citizens, in cooperation with the United Planning Organization, launched "Operation Find" to locate the most urgent needs of the elderly—retirees, those living on social security benefits or private an-

Musicians Union Upheld In Bandleader Dispute

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has ruled that Musicians Local 802 was within its rights in changing its bylaws to raise the minimum rates below which its members were prohibited from working on single engagements or "one night stands."

Examiner Paul Bisgyer recommended that the NLRB dismiss a complaint issued against Local 802 on a refusal to bargain charge by Ben Cutler, orchestra leader, that the rates were raised after he asked the union to negotiate contract terms with him in 1965.

AFT Pres. Herman Kenin called the decision a "welcome vindication" of local union practices and a rebuff of those he said are "engaged in a campaign of harassment" against the AFT.

The examiner reported after hearing testimony that Local 802 raised its rates for one-night stands, and required leaders to make a $1 payment into the union welfare fund for each "sideman" in their orchestras, after Cutler requested negotiations. But the changes had been under consideration by the Local 802 executive board long before Cutler made his request, he noted.

The union met once with Cutler and laid its proposal also "on the table" at that time, the examiner said. Cutler's attorney promised to come back with a counter-proposal but never did so. When the union seemed ready to withhold its members' services, Cutler filed an NLRB charge but agreed to put the disputed funds into escrow pending the outcome of the case.

The examiner said the legal action was "one of a long series of cases instituted by orchestra leaders . . . to test the lawfulness" of the union's conduct. He added: "It is well settled that the withholding of services, like a strike, is not only . . . protected by the Act but also is consistent with a desire to reach agreement."

Bias Against Unions Found In Profit Plan

A National Labor Relations Board trial examiner has found the Kroger Co. guilty of discriminating against union members in the operation of its savings and profit-sharing plan.

Examiner Thomas A. Ricci ruled that the big grocery chain had violated three sections of the labor law by maintaining since 1956 a profit-sharing plan "which by its terms automatically excludes from participation employes covered by a pension plan" negotiated by a union—in the cases in dispute, the Retail Clerks and the Meat Cutters.

For nearly 10 years, Ricci reported, Kroger negotiators have successfully insisted that the union agree to contracts which barred their members from sharing in company profits while they are covered by a union pension plan.

All attempts by the unions to negotiate a pension plan separate from the savings plan were refused "adamantly" by Kroger negotiators, Ricci said. Finding the company guilty of refusal to bargain in good faith, he ordered it to cease such refusal and to restore to good standing in the savings plan all employes who were excluded from coverage because of union contracts executed after Mar. 13, 1965—the date the unions filed charges of bad-faith bargaining.

For the year 1965, Kroger trustees reported that the firm contributed $4 million to the profit-sharing plan, the equivalent of 67 cents for each $1 of employe savings. Employes who withdrew from the plan in 1965 gave up $3.2 million of credits, they also reported.

Moyers Quits As Johnson Press Aide

Bill D. Moyers resigned as White House press secretary and one of Pres. Johnson's special assistants to become publisher of Newsday, a major New York metropolitan area newspaper, effective Feb. 1.

He will be succeeded by George Christian, a Texan serving as assistant press secretary since last summer.

The 32-year-old Moyers, rated as among the ablest in the group of intimate White House advisers, has had responsibilities in almost all the fields of major national policy—foreign affairs, the development of a school aid program, the anti-poverty program and many others.

He took on the additional duties of press secretary when George Reedy, another long-time Johnson aide, took leave of absence in July 1965 for surgery and later resigned from the White House staff.

Jake Jacobsen, legislative counsel, also is leaving the White House staff, Moyers told reporters.

Statistics Show Half Century Of Job Trends

For people who like to browse through 820 pages of almost pure statistics, the Labor Dept. has its annual compilation. It's called Employment & Earnings Statistics for the United States, 1909-66, Bulletin 1312-4, and it sells for $4.50 from the Superintendent of Documents.

In it are such tidbits as:

- Today's factory worker puts in about 10 hours a week less work and earns 12 times as much as his counterpart in 1909.
- Women now hold more than 5 million factory jobs, 22 percent above their 1961 level. Total factory employment is up 17 percent over the same period.
- Employment in state and local government jobs has risen 31 percent since 1961 and employment in service industries has gone up more than 25 percent.

Mercy Ship Marks 6 Years of Service

For six years now the S.S. HOPE has been carrying American medical and health standards to needy nations. It has given away nothing but knowledge and skill, and it has asked for nothing but hard work from the physicians, dentists, nurses and technicians of countries where death is always just around the corner and hunger is the way of life.

The HOPE is a floating medical center which ties up in remote ports and carries a complement of medical and health experts in all fields who pass on their techniques to their counterparts in the nations it visits, leaving knowledge that will improve the health of present citizens and safeguard that of future generations.

Former Sec. of the Air Force Eugene M. Zuckert, a member of the People-to-People Health Foundation, Inc., which operates the HOPE (Health Opportunity for People Everywhere), looks back over the first six years of operation in the current issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO monthly publication.

". . . it just may be America's most effective effort in international understanding," he concludes.

The project was conceived by Dr. William B. Walsh, Washington, D.C., physician whose idea was that "a floating medical center, on station in a developing country, would provide the most effective answer to the critical need for medical teaching and treatment," Zuckert writes.

Meany A Director

Walsh set up the People-to-People Health Foundation, whose directors also include AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and Rep. Harry Goldberg of the Dept. of Intl. Affairs. In 1960, he cadged a mothballed hospital ship from the Navy and outfitted it as a combined hospital and medical school.

On its first voyage, Zuckert summarizes, the HOPE carried out training programs in Indonesia and South Viet Nam. Since then it has spent 10 months to a year in Peru, Ecuador, Guinea and Nicaragua. Asked "what impact has she had on the developing nations and their people?" he replied:

"The figures are impressive: In six years HOPE doctors, nurses and technologists have trained more than 3,300 medical personnel, treated over 100,000 patients, conducted some 8,300 major operations and benefited more than 1 million people through immunization, examination and other services. As part of a nutrition program, HOPE has distributed more than 2 million cartons of milk.

"Figures, of course, cannot tell the full story. And, since HOPE deals largely in intangibles, the 'full' story may never be told. There is no way, for instance, to mark down the value of a child's life which has been saved. Figures cannot accurately measure the value of a personal act of kindness."

When the HOPE docked in Peru it was greeted by six bearded men and a grey mare with "Yankee, go home" signs and a loud supply of pro-Castro slogans. When it left 10 months later, 45,000 Peruvians waved goodbye, Zuckert writes.

"There is nothing reaches a man in a developing nation so much as the knowledge that someone in a far-off land is concerned with him as an individual," he quotes Walsh as saying.

The East "forgets many things," the Times of Indonesia said when the ship departed, "but never, never loses its reverence for a teacher . . . Those on the HOPE will linger long in our memory."

The training given in Ecuador, Zuckert writes, advanced "by years" medical knowledge that had lagged behind U.S. standards.

Zuckert notes that the HOPE medical team consists of a permanent staff of 100 doctors, nurses and technicians augmented by 30 physicians—many of them specialists—and dentists who serve without pay for two months and then are replaced by another rotating team of volunteers.

Labor Shares Cost

Commercial ship lines operate the HOPE at cost, with the government sharing this expense. The petroleum industry donates the fuel and about 1,000 companies give drugs, medicines and other supplies. The annual operating cost is about $5 million, a substantial part of which comes from organized labor.

The union crew is as much a part of the operations as the doctors, nurses and technicians, Zuckert indicates, and has taken on " 'above-and-beyond-the-call' assignments to donate blood, visit with patients and help the hospital corps."

Serving on the last mission, to Nicaragua, were 78 members of the National Maritime Union, six of the Marine Engineers, five of the Masters, Mates & Pilots, two of the Staff Officers Association (Seafarers) and one of the American Radio Association.

The HOPE is now being overhauled at Philadelphia for her 1967 mission to Colombia.

SURGICAL TECHNIQUES that had proved successful in the United States were carried to Ecuador by doctors aboard the S.S. HOPE and passed on to their colleagues in the operating room. The ship is operated by the labor-backed People-to-People Health Foundation and has proved during its six years of service to be an effective instrument for winning friends for the United States.

Operative Potters Elect New Secretary-Treasurer

East Liverpool, O.—George Barbaree, fourth vice president of the Operative Potters with headquarters in Trenton, N.J., has been elected international secretary-treasurer by the union's executive board.

He succeeds Charles F. Jordan, who is retiring. A member of the union since 1946, he formerly was president of his local in Camden, N.J., and has been an international officer since 1957.

5% Offer 'Not Enough':

Strikes Authorized By 11 Rail Unions

Members of 11 railroad unions negotiating for 450,000 off-train workers have voted by overwhelming margins to authorize a strike, if necessary, against 190 U.S. railroads.

The 11 unions—six shopcrafts and five other non-operating unions bargaining in two separate groups—have been offered a 5 percent wage increase in a one-year settlement. Spokesmen said the management offer is "entirely inadequate."

In a parallel development, Canadian railroads offered a package of increased benefits valued at 30 percent of present rates to members of seven shopcraft unions. The offer, on which members are now voting, includes wage boosts of 18 percent over a two-year period—upgrading for a group of mechanics; job security and job stabilization provisions; and improvements in the health-welfare program and the vacation schedule.

Emphatic Votes

A spokesman for five U.S. unions said members voted for strike authorizations by these margins: Railway Clerks, 87 percent; Maintenance of Way Employes, 98 percent; Transportation-Communication Employes, 96 percent; Railroad Signalmen, 97 percent; Hotel & Restaurant Employes, representing dining car crews, 99 percent.

"The 5 percent offer is not enough," said Chairman George E. Leighty of the committee negotiating for five unions.

"The cost of living has risen 3.5 percent in the past year, or 10 cents an hour," Leighty explained. "That ate up our last increase. If the living-cost index goes up another 3 to 5 percent in the coming year, what good is an offer that leaves the worker no better off than he was before?"

Leighty's group has asked for a wage escalator clause tied to the cost of living, and several other contract improvements. Management's offer ignores these proposals, the committee chairman said.

Negotiations for the five non-operating unions are being conducted with the aid of the National Mediation Board. Six other off-train unions, the so-called shopcrafts, have asked that mediation by the NMB be resumed after a recess, according to Pres. Michael Fox of the AFL-CIO Railroad Employes' Dept.

The shopcraft group includes the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Boilermakers, and the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers. Strike authorizations were voted by margins ranging up to 98.5 percent.

Rail management previously made the same 5 percent offer to members of five operating unions, negotiating separately. Two of the five have accepted—the Railroad Trainmen, and the Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen.

Despite the strike authorization votes, rail unions have found by experience that many delays will frustrate use of the strike weapon.

After lengthy negotiations they must go through mediation, and after setting a strike date must wait to see if federal intervention is invoked by the White House in the form of a presidential emergency board.

In 1963, Congress broke a pending strike of the BLF&E by passing a law compelling the union to arbitrate the issue of train crew sizes.

The result of all the delays facing rail unions, they say, is that the wages and working conditions of rail workers lag behind cost of living rises and the benefits enjoyed by other unions.

WORLD PROBLEMS that concern workers were examined at a meeting in Washington of directors of international affairs of AFL-CIO affiliates sponsored by the Dept. of Intl. Affairs. From left are AFL-CIO Intl. Affairs Dir. Jay Lovestone; Intl. Affairs Dir. Meyer Bernstein of the Steelworkers; Irving Brown, director of the Afro-American Labor Center at the United Nations and UN representative of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and Pres. P. L. Siemiller of the Machinists.

Medicare Approved In Canada

restrictions "narrowed" the range of services by physicians, and that the original effective date of July 1, 1967, should have been retained.

The only province with an operating plan that presently meets the federal standards is Saskatchewan. Minister of Health & Welfare Allen MacEachen predicted that other provinces will quickly propose acceptable plans. The Medical Service Insurance Plan in effect in Ontario, the nation's most populous province, could qualify with minor changes, it was pointed out.

The Saskatchewan program was inaugurated by the former Canadian Commonwealth Federation (CCF) provincial government with a combined hospital and medical insurance premium of $72 a year for families and $36 for single persons. After experience, the costs were cut to $52 and $26, respectively.

When the Liberals took over the provincial government in 1964 they raised the fees to their original levels. The cost of operating the program has since then been going down. The province is now making a profit and has announced that no further increase in rates will be made in 1967.

Alberta has a voluntary medicare plan which does not meet federal standards because it covers less than 90 percent of the population. Premier Ernest C. Manning, a vociferous "free enterprise" advocate, says the province wants no part of federal aid in financing the program.

Stronger Action Sought To Curb Air Pollution

A growing feeling that air pollution can be curbed only by a federal government armed with the power to enforce controls dominated a three-day National Conference on Air Pollution in Washington.

Some 3,000 persons, including union health and safety activists, attended the sessions, which were called by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner to seek ways of improving and stepping up the national fight on the problem.

Significantly, Sen. Edmund S. Muskie (D-Me.), chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Air & Water Pollution, called for a "national clean air goal" with federal standards based on "airsheds," or areas comparable to watersheds through which air moves naturally.

"The federal government is the logical entity to develop the criteria, with the cooperation of public and private groups," he said.

"The ultimate goal should be to approach a level at which man will have to cope with little more than the 'natural background level' of pollution."

Gardner, the keynote speaker, warned that the nation is "actually losing ground" in the pollution fight, adding that "the smog continues to grow more dense even as we talk about it."

He put into words the belief inherent in the remarks of many other speakers that "state and local governments have been slow-acting . . . lack adequate authority and resources," and "regional programs are virtually nonexistent."

"Most industries," he added, "have yet to take vigorous leadership in combatting air pollution."

Vice Pres. Humphrey called for "non-diffusion treaties," between states sharing the same airshed just as non-proliferation treaties are needed between nations aware of the atomic fallout problem.

Partners Needed

"What we need here," he declared, "is a working partnership among all levels of government—federal, state and local—and with private industry as well."

Federal controls already on the statute books require that, beginning next fall, all new autos be equipped with U.S.-approved equipment to lessen the discharge of exhaust fumes that constitute a major source of air pollution.

The federal government also has a program of subsidies to states and local communities for up to 75 percent of their control expenditures, with $46 million appropriated for the current fiscal year and $66 million budgeted for next year.

The conference steering committee included George Taylor, economist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research.

Supreme Court Backs Georgia Election Law

vision for election of a governor by the state legislature if the popular vote doesn't succeed in choosing one.

In a decision written by Justice Hugo L. Black, the majority said that nothing in the Constitution would prohibit Georgia from abolishing popular elections entirely and having the legislature choose a governor "in the first instance." In our dual form of government, he said, "the federal government has certain powers—but does not have them all."

On the malapportionment issue, he noted that the high court had previously given Georgia until the 1968 election to get its legislative districts into conformity with the "one man, one vote" principle. It is thus functioning legally and cannot suddenly be said to have lost its legality in regard to a single issue.

The dissenting opinion by Justice William O. Douglas said that election by the legislature would be a clear violation of the "one man, one vote" rule even if the Georgia assembly were not grossly malapportioned. It could clearly result, he argued, in election of a minority candidate rather than the candidate who won a popular plurality.

Fortas Dissent

In a concurring dissent, Justice Abe Fortas noted that the Supreme Court in reluctantly giving Georgia until 1968 to reform its voting districts also placed some limits on the powers of the legislature during the interim—such as the power to propose constitutional amendments.

Had the court foreseen the present situation, he said, "I expect it would have included" the election of a governor as one of the "forbidden" activities.

In Georgia, citizens expect the heavily-Democratic legislature to name Maddox, although Calloway promptly began "campaigning" with each member, pointing out that he had received more popular votes and urging fairmindedness.

Calloway's one chance seemed to be that he might persuade enough members to refrain from voting to deprive Maddox of a majority of legislators "present." In that case, no one would be elected.

Social Security Leaflet Explains 'Extended Care'

A new phase of medicare comes into existence on Jan. 1, and the Social Security Administration has a leaflet available explaining its benefits.

Medicare will pay for "extended care" at an approved skilled nursing home for persons who need continued full-time nursing care following hospitalization. The benefits are available only to those requiring skilled care for the conditions which caused their hospitalization, not for resident or custodial care at a nursing home.

Details are contained in a free leaflet available at any local social security office.

Health Personnel Needs Up Sharply

Approximately 10,000 new workers will be needed each month for the next 10 years to fill expected job openings in expanding health services and medical care, according to the Labor Dept.

To meet the requirements of 1975, the department's Bureau of Employment Security discloses in the latest issue of its publication, the Employment Service Review, the number of dental hygienists must more than triple each year, medical technologists and X-ray technicians must double, and occupational and physical therapists must increase 10-fold.

In addition, the bureau says, medical record librarians must increase five-fold annually to meet the requirements of 1975.

University of Miami Hit On Non-Union Ship Use

Miami, Fla.—Three maritime unions have asked Pres. Johnson to check use of federal funds by the University of Miami for what they charge is "union-busting."

The oceanographic vessel John Elliott Pillsbury sailed from this port Dec. 11 with a non-union crew which walked through union picket lines to get on board.

Presidents Joseph Curran of the National Maritime Union, Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers and Lloyd W. Sheldon of the Masters, Mates & Pilots wired Johnson that the university refuses to bargain for crew members, who went on strike Sept. 28.

The union leaders asked the President to use his influence to persuade university officials to negotiate in good faith or to direct that federal assistance be withdrawn "so that the good name of this government will not be dragged through the Caribbean mud by this operation."

The Pillsbury is engaged in a survey financed by grants from the National Science Foundation and the Office of Naval Research. Its salary scale is $700 a month base pay for the first mate; $548 for first engineer, $320 for able seamen, with a daily bonus while at sea but no overtime or fringe benefits. This is some 25 to 50 percent below union standards on other American vessels, the union statement said.

The National Labor Relations Board ruled two years ago that the vessel, as a non-profit operation, is not covered by U.S. labor laws.

Thanks to Both

THIS YEAR, as for many years past, people from the entertainment world are traveling to far-distant lands to visit the American servicemen stationed there and bring to them the Merry Christmas greetings of the people back home.

The entertainment troupes include singers and dancers, musicians and famous comedy stars, and the back-of-stage crews who make things work—all of them union members. They leave their own homes and families during the Christmas season to carry on a labor of affection elsewhere. Their schedules are arranged through the USO, which seeks to make sure that no group abroad is missed.

To the servicemen, called upon to meet their country's need in troubled times, these annual visits bring the assurance that they are not forgotten but are ever-present in the minds of those whose immediate tasks are quite different from theirs.

To both—to the soldiers and sailors, the airmen and the combat Marines. and to the great stars of the entertainment world who bear our message of remembrance and good wishes—America owes its thanks.

Justice Fortas Dissents

THE GEORGIA legislature can elect the state's next governor, the U.S. Supreme Court has ruled. It may pick between the two candidates who ran highest—but got no flat majority—in the Nov. 8 popular election—even electing, if it chooses, the one who got fewer popular votes than his rival.

There is nothing in the U.S. Constitution to bar this, Justice Black wrote for the majority in the court's 5-4 decision. There is nothing that dictates the "method" a state must use in selecting a governor. He suggested explicitly that if Georgia abolished its popular-vote elections entirely and returned to the archaic method of having governors chosen by the General Assembly in the first place, "nothing" in the Constitution would prohibit it.

Another viewpoint was stated by Justice Fortas in a brilliantly-phrased dissent.

"If the people of Georgia—or Maine or California or New York, for that matter—should" now try to provide for election of a governor by the legislature alone, "I do not believe that the constitutionality of these measures could be cavalierly assumed," said Fortas.

The guarantees of equal protection of the laws, of a republican form of government in each state, require "something more than an adherence to form," he continued.

The court's many reapportionment and voting-rights decisions "have reinvigorated our political life at its roots" with respect to "the basic instrument of democracy—the vote," he declared.

To him, therefore, the court's Georgia decision was a "startling reversal, a belittling" of this majestic concept. It was "a retreat from constitutional principles so soundly and so proudly developed" for application "to the deepening moral and human principles of our time."

The majority opinion seemed to carry the echoes—so often heard—of decisions in a vacuum, a homage to form rather than spirit, that would make the Constitution a restriction on the people's rights rather than the basic guarantor of them. Justice Fortas took the opportunity to vindicate the Constitution's overriding creative function.

Meany Stresses Role of Unions In American Economic System

The following is excerpted from "Labor Looks at Capitalism," by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, which appears in the December 1966 issue of the AFL-CIO American Federationist.

IT HAS BEEN claimed that unions are too successful; they are just too strong. To weaken them, it has been proposed that collective bargaining be restricted to the local scene—each local union with its local employer—and that any other kind of union activity should be outlawed.

This totally ignores the essential facts of life about collective bargaining in the American economy. Collective bargaining reflects the changing character of the business enterprise with which unions negotiate — the changing nature of the American economy.

This economy has long since passed the day when the dominant form of enterprise was a small farm or a small, local business. Most of our industries are national in scope—they produce for national or at least regional markets. Vast, multi-unit corporations increasingly dominate the American scene. A recent article in Fortune magazine points out that the 500 largest industrial corporations account for 60 percent of all industrial employment and sales and 70 percent of all profits.

In this kind of economy, legal restrictions to limit collective bargaining to local unions and local plants would simply undermine, if not destroy, the effectiveness of the collective bargaining system. Obviously, that is what the advocates of such proposals want.

But there is no alternative in a free industrial society to free trade unions and collective bargaining. I do not maintain, of course, that trade unions have achieved perfection or that the system of collective bargaining is without flaws. No human institutions are in that category. However, I know of no substitute, in a free society, for the right of workers to belong to trade unions that can bargain with employers.

Take free trade unions and free collective bargaining out of the picture and you no longer have the American economic system or a free social order.

There are over 14 million members of AFL-CIO unions. But collective bargaining policies are wholly decided by the 129 autonomous, self-governing national and international unions affiliated with the federation and by their 60,000 local unions. These 129 national unions and 60,000 local unions bargain with tens of thousands of employers throughout the land. And they negotiate about 150,000 agreements.

This process of collective bargaining between free trade unions and employers involves the right to strike. Collective bargaining means that workers join together to say, in effect, to the employer: "We don't like the conditions, we don't like the wages, we don't like the hours, we want a better deal." And if collective bargaining is meaningful, it presupposes the right to strike.

That is part of the collective bargaining process. Without it, there is no free collective bargaining. Moreover, if the government takes away the right to strike by forcing free men to work against their will, the government also destroys the basis on which the enterprise or industry operates for the profit of investors.

No trade union leader worthy of his salt prefers a strike to an orderly and peaceful settlement. And very few workers prefer strikes and the sacrifice of income that is involved. Actual experience indicates that strikes are almost always a collective bargaining weapon of last resort, when workers and their unions decide there is no other choice.

LOOK AT THE RECORD. In recent years, only two percent of collective bargaining agreements have been affected by strikes and only about two-tenths of 1 percent of total worktime has been lost as a result of work stoppages. Eight times as much has been lost from accidents and illness.

The record proves that 98 percent of collective bargaining negotiations in recent years resulted in peaceful settlements.

That's not a bad record at all. Obviously, we should try to improve it, to do a little better. We all want to make the collective bargaining process work better than it does. But it is utterly destructive of economic freedom itself to destroy the right to strike.

Does the right to strike—and the exercise of that right—mean that unions want to put the employer out of business? Obviously, no. Does it mean that we want to do away with profits? Once again, the answer is no. All it means is that unions want a fair share for workers who make their contribution to the economic system.

In other words, we think that the American economic system, with its potential for progress, works quite well. We see no better system anywhere in the world today or in the history of the past.

Morgan Says:

More Candor in History Texts Might Make Future Believable

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

WHAT WOULD HAVE HAPPENED, I wonder, after Lee and Grant finished their business at Appomattox, if historians and textbook writers from North and South had met and agreed to exchange facts which would become the basis for their books on the Civil War?

Morgan

It is difficult, if not impossible, of course, to surrender passion and prejudice to reality. But if the country at large could have behaved with the dignity, understanding and respectful restraint those two great opposing generals showed, a century of agony would have been eased if not averted. Instead the bitter torture of a divided nation was heightened by the vengeful, punitive, self-justifying and self-glorifying distortions of both sides.

The war was a lollypop or a dash of sulphuric acid in the face, depending upon which hero was being immortalized, which villain condemned.

It is staggering to realize that these distortions continue to be taught as history in schools, both North and South, though it would appear that the southern sugar-coating of the Confederacy is thicker than the northern approach to Lincoln and the Union side.

For example, Virginia schools are still using in 11th and 12th grade history classes a textbook, specially commissioned by the state and revised as late as 1963, which, among other things, refers to slavery as a form of "comprehensive social security." It describes the feelings between Negroes and southern whites during Reconstruction as "cordial." One fulsome passage on slavery reads:

"We know that there was some cruelty and suspicion, but we also know that the relationship between the two races was governed by much kindness and mutual trust. Both understood that bondage as they knew it was not totally evil. . . ."

Now the state government seems belatedly preparing to make an honest, critical survey of its whole education program. Washington Post Writer Helen Dewar suggests it is time to make Virginia's vibrant history appear as vital and exciting as it was instead of a "sort of magnolia-scented adaptation of Camelot."

Change can be painful, however, especially when it involves the views of people addicted to a memory of a past that never was. Another Washington Post report revealed that drastic changes have been made in the portrayal of Negroes and other minority groups in many American history texts—only to encounter a violent backlash of protest from radical right sources.

"Many American youngsters are reading this year for the first time about the 14 Negro soldiers who won the Congressional Medal of Honor for heroism in battle during the Civil War," Post Reporter Gerald Grant wrote. "Or about the Japanese-Americans who were forced to leave their homes and go to detention camps in World War II."

A Washington conference on racism in education, sponsored by the American Federation of Teachers, heard evidence of the extreme measures extremist groups are taking against honest efforts to correct "America's image of its past." For example, one new textbook, "Land of the Free," used in almost 100 school systems, was removed from the California "approved list" after vicious film, phone and pamphleteering campaigns reviled it as Communistic and un-American. It was similarly attacked in Columbus, O. University of Chicago Prof. John Hope Franklin, co-author of the book and a noted Negro historian, indicates considerable sums of money are being spent to discredit the work.

PUBLISHERS, AUTHORS, schoolboards and teachers, however, are not all automatically caving in under pressure, though courage is required to withstand it. One Florida teacher had her car tires slashed and her windows soaped with threats because she used a revised text on the Civil War.

Let us not kid ourselves. The War Between the States is not the only event of history twisted to suit partisan convenience. In fact, it is probably safe to say that no major world event has escaped some gross and calculated distortion.

Communist editors, obviously, have the most difficult assignment in this field. No sooner have they scissored all heroic references to Stalin out of the Soviet Encyclopedia than the Kremlin redraws the line of gospel and they have to paste some back in again. At one point in the 1940s, Communist agents tried to penetrate U.S. government and university archives to filch documents that didn't square with Moscow's version of history.

American versions themselves, for that matter, are not always the most objective. Perhaps one of the most important preliminary steps toward real disarmament would be the disarming of chauvinistic historians of whatever nationality.

A nation's real motives—or at least opposing assessments of them—would make, on the whole, livelier reading than the glory words they are usually clothed in. And such candor about the past might make the future a little more believable.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

EVERY NEW CONGRESS brings to the leaders special tests of capacity and wisdom, of course, but the Republican House leaders of the 90th Congress will be in a somewhat unique position.

The sheer bulk of numbers in the augmented GOP delegation is a factor they must face. The unusual sense of having shared in a campaign ending in spectacular—and to them most satisfying—victories, is another.

The GOP House leaders, it must be remembered, have never been in this situation before. They are all new, only lately risen to positions of recognized party power.

Eight years ago, for example, their names would have gone unrecognized. People knew about Joseph W. Martin of Massachusetts, twice Speaker of the House, long-time floor leader, permanent chairman of two presidential nominating conventions, former chairman of the Republican National Committee.

They knew about Charles A. Halleck of Indiana, floor leader whenever Martin became Speaker, the canny midwesterner who wasn't canny enough to avoid being gulled by Thomas E. Dewey's people in 1948 into believing he had been promised the vice presidential nomination if he delivered the Indiana delegation to Dewey for President.

Gerald R. Ford of Michigan became Republican floor leader, however, only in 1965, and Melvin R. Laird of Wisconsin chairman of the party caucus at the same time, and Charles Goodell of New York became a key "research" task-force operator.

Now these younger men—ambitious, able, hard-driving—see themselves with much wider opportunities because they see themselves on a victory wave. They gained 47 new House members, net, to add to their previous 140.

The temptation may be to fling the weight of numbers around haphazardly just to show it can be done. It may be to yield more often than is wise to the enticing idea of putting something over.

The observation may be made that politicians who think that one election creates a wave of the future usually find that the future has left them behind. They have to start running hard again just to stay in the same place to which they slipped.

Messrs. Ford, Goodell and Laird found it easy to take over the party machinery two years ago, because with Halleck as House leader Republicans had lost, lost and lost. But they themselves haven't won anything yet—except a chance to show how effective they are in moving Republicans to responsible positions in meeting public needs.

If they seek to do this, they will find themselves earning respect as party leaders who think in long-range rather than narrow partisan terms.

BILL D. MOYERS, 32 years old, in three short years in the national spotlight showed himself to be that most cherished type of presidential assistant—knowledgeable, engagingly candid, attuned to the dual responsibilities of a White House confidante toward the public and to the President he worked for.

Every Chief Executive seeks people with these special qualities of character and personality as intimate advisers. Moyers recognized the single responsibility of the President to make decisions; he had, however, a respect for his own responsibility of advising on proper courses of action and of interpreting the decisions to the public after they were made.

His departure, to become publisher of Newsday, is perfectly understandable; no young man in Washington circles can spare time to think first of his family responsibilities, but as the children grow older, he must. Moyers was never pedantic, never timid about holding his job or losing it, never gloomy or swollen with self-importance, but forward-looking and creative in searching for practical solutions to whatever problem came along.

Continuing Mortgage Squeeze Deepens Home Building Slump

CONTINUING high interest rates and a shortage of mortgage money are deepening the depression in the home building industry, a union economist warned in a network radio interview.

October housing starts "reflect an annual rate of 850,000 new homes," which is a loss of 400,000 from "normal annual production," said Donald Danielson, research director for the Carpenters. His statements came on Labor News Conference, weekly AFL-CIO public affairs feature on the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Contract construction employment was cut by 116,000 during September, Danielson said, noting that since the construction industry as a whole "is in a boom," a large part of the job loss occurred among residential construction workers.

He blamed the slump on the present "tight money policy" and increased costs of home mortgages because of the higher interest rates.

MUCH OF the "normal supply of [mortgage] money" is unavailable to prospective home owners because they are "outbid by other sectors of the economy," he said. Recent federal actions to put more residential mortgage money into the market will help ease the situation, he said, but may not be enough to reverse the depression trend.

Danielson denied that labor costs have caused the rapid rise in home prices. He noted that a study just released by the National Association of Home Builders on the reasons for increased housing costs since 1950 makes no mention of labor costs as a significant factor in the rise.

Reporters questioning Danielson on Labor News Conference were Stanley Levey of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week magazine.

HIGH INTEREST RATES and the scarcity of mortgage money are deepening the depression in the home-building industry, Carpenters' Research Dir. Donald Danielson (center) told Stanley Levey (left) of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Alan Adams of Business Week on Labor News Conference. The weekly AFL-CIO-produced public service interview is broadcast nationwide on the Mutual Radio Network.

SENIOR CITIZENS of Washington offer companionship and help to the elderly poor who live in crumbling houses and one-room apartments in slum areas. Left above, Pres. William C. Jordan of the Washington area council visits elderly woman who lives alone much of the time in an apartment which has been her home for more than 50 years. Right, Laurence Cook of the seniors talks to a sightless man who repairs fence in house he bought for $3,500 in 1916. His only income is pension to his wife, a retired government employe.

nuities, and welfare recipients—all in their senior years.

The council got volunteers who worked even after a grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity ran out for "Operation Find." The UPO has announced that an additional $8,000 will be made available to enable 32 seniors to continue the visitation program for another 10 weeks. After that they may be "on their own."

The Senior Citizens Council is now seeking major programs to meet the needs of the aged. It will ask Congress to increase social security benefits (they average $71.59 a month for some 50,000 elderly in Washington). It wants the District of Columbia to enlarge its budget to enable the health and welfare departments to work with the NCSS in setting up neighborhood information centers. The centers would help the poor find services they may use, and in many cases are not aware of.

The 20 seniors enrolled in "Operation Find" as a local errand of compassion, but the need they discovered is a national one, Council Pres. John W. Edelman reported to the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Edelman, retired legislative representative of the Textile Workers Union of America and successor to former Rep. Aime Forand (D-R.I.) as head of the seniors' council, said the problems of the elderly poor pose an issue "of awesome proportions."

Varied Problems

Among the problems turned up by the "Operation Find" team were:

- Medicare will pay for a cataract operation but not the eyeglasses needed to provide better sight. It will not provide what most elderly persons need but which many cannot afford—teeth, hearing aids, spectacles.
- Housing for the elderly poor is unsatisfactory and rents are too high. Money that should be spent for food goes for rent.
- Many oldsters are too feeble to go shopping and must depend on neighbors to shop for them. Some cannot get to churches and hospitals and many are uninformed on the public services available to them.

The volunteer visitors include Pres. William C. Jordan of the Senior Citizens' area council, who drives his own car at 81 and is a retired postal employe; Miss Maude Smothers, a retired government employe who also drives her own car and was saluted recently for 36 years as choir director at Metropolitan AME Church; and Mrs. Sophie H. Rich, retired organizer for the Clothing Workers, who travels mostly by bus.

Edelman told a Senate subcommittee on District of Columbia appropriations of some typical cases of seniors in need:

- A 94-year-old man with one hand who works seven nights a week as a watchman and scours his neighborhood with a pushcart in his free time, looking for bottles and paper. His income consists of $41 a month in social security benefits and $60 a month in pay, plus a room in a shabby row house.
- A woman, 80, lives with a son, 60, who suffers from advanced diabetes. She gets $55 a month in Aid for the Aged. The son gets $75 a month in welfare payments. A roomer pays $35 a month in rent.
- A woman, 78, has lived 52 years in a disintegrating apartment and "has no intention of moving" to better quarters. Her income is $45 a month from social security, $126 in an annuity and she pays rent of $92.50 a month. A niece, 69, lives intermittently with the aunt, who gets around with the aid of a metal walker.
- An aged couple, their daughter and her five children pay $120 a month rent for a row house badly needing repair. The gas heating plant is not working, and cold air leaks in from a broken window.
- A 75-year-old retiree cares for a brother who is helplessly paralyzed. They get $126.40 a month in social security payments and rent is $80—leaving $46.40 for food and all other expenses.

The District of Columbia had 42,000 household heads and single persons over 65, according to the 1960 census. A fifth of the couples have incomes under $3,000. More than half the single persons living alone make less than $2,000. More than 84 percent of non-white females living alone have incomes under $2,000, according to testimony before the Special Senate Committee on Aging in 1965.

Welfare Chief Spurs Slum Service Centers

Faster state and local action to locate public welfare centers in low-income neighborhoods has been urged by U.S. Welfare Commissioner Ellen Winston.

Dr. Winston recalled that Pres. Johnson has advocated the establishment of such centers in "every ghetto of America" and that the same move was recommended by the Advisory Council on Public Welfare in a recent report. She said money and legislative authority have been provided and "all that is now needed is state and local leadership backed by greater public awareness of the need" for such centers.

The trend toward first-hand involvement of labor and other agencies in the problems of low-income areas was reported recently by Pres. Joseph A. Beirne of the United Community Funds & Councils of America, who heads the Communications Workers. Beirne said the United organization has moved into the slums in cooperation with five government agencies and the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee, of which he is chairman.

Dr. Winston, in letters to all directors of state public welfare agencies, urged a speedup in the trend toward locating welfare and related services in the heart of the slums. She said federal grants to states for welfare can finance much of the cost.

Guide materials prepared by the staff of the Welfare Administration are based on studies of successful programs. They describe types of services that can be provided in public centers, including these:

Types of Services

Financial aid, employment counseling, family problems, protective services for children, the aged and handicapped, foster child placement and adoption, child day care, legal services, consumer education, family life education and community organization aids—all available with the help of a neighborhood advisory committee working with each center.

Describing typical operations, Dr. Winston said: "Giving some persons information about a service is enough" but others may need help such as making an appointment, providing bus fare, arranging for baby-sitting, accompanying the person to the agency or intervening with the agency.

Federal funds that can be used for the centers include public assistance funds to pay for 75 percent of the cost of service and 50 percent of administrative costs, Children's Bureau grants for child welfare and maternal and child health, and demonstration grants financing up to 100 percent of cost.

In addition, federal grants administered by the Dept. of Housing & Urban Development can be used to help finance the cost of equipment, renovation, rent, purchase or construction of a center, Dr. Winston noted.

Laundry Pact Boosts Wages For 15,000

New York — A new three-year agreement giving 15,000 laundry workers substantial wage increases was reached by bleary-eyed negotiators after a 29-hour bargaining session that narrowly averted a strike.

The pact covers 400 laundries in New York City and Long Island and parts of Westchester County, N. Y.; Connecticut and North New Jersey under agreement with the Laundry Workers Joint Board of the Clothing Workers.

The settlement gives inside production workers a total of 32.5 cents an hour over three years; engineers and maintenance personnel get 47.5 cents; non-commission route men $20 a week and office employes $12 a week.

The union also won liberalized pension benefits for both present and future retirees.

Louis Simon, joint board manager and chief union negotiator, described the contract as "better than any other agreement during our 30 years' history."

On the bargaining team with Simon were Assistant Manager Bert Jemott and Counsel Jack Harris of the joint board, and from the ACWA national office, Vice Pres. Sol Brandzell, General Counsel Jack Sheinkman and Dr. Vera Miller, research assistant.

Rubber Union Wins $1 Million Award

Members of the Rubber Workers employed by three big companies will receive an extra $1 million in bonuses as the result of an arbitration case won by their union.

The dispute involved contributions by B. F. Goodrich Co., Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. and U.S. Rubber Co. to the supplemental unemployment benefits fund. When the fund reaches more than $250 per employe, the extra amount goes into "spillover benefits" passed on to workers as bonuses.

Minimum Pay Increased for N. Y. Hotels

Albany, N.Y.—Higher base pay and revised allowances for tips and meals in specific service industries were announced by State Industrial Commissioner M. P. Catherwood to take effect when the state minimum wages goes from the present $1.25 to $1.50 an hour on Jan. 1.

The changes were those recommended by a tripartite General Industry Minimum Wage Board except in minor instances. Pres. Raymond R. Corbett of the New York State AFL-CIO had asked Gov. Rockefeller to support them instead of the tip and meal allowances sought particularly by hotels in the Catskills resort areas.

Present regulations permit most service industry employers, including those in hotels, to pay 90 cents an hour in wages with 35 cents presumed to be income from tips. Under the new code the wage base goes to $1.05 on Jan. 1 and the tip allowance to 45 cents. The wage will rise further to $1.125 and the tip allowance to 47.5 cents in February 1968, when the statewide minimum goes to $1.60 an hour.

Employers at present are allowed to deduct 50 cents from the wages of employes for each meal provided them. Catherwood rejected the wage board's recommendation that the figure be left unchanged and boosted it to 55 cents effective Jan. 1.

The ruling particularly affects thousands of waiters, busboys, bellhops and other hotel service workers.

ELECTRIC COIL and hotplate are the only sources of heat in three-story house for family of three adults and five children. Central heating plant is out of service and the family wants to move but cannot find adequate quarters, woman in picture tells Senior Citizen Cook as grandson listens. Rent is $120 a month.

Alaska Labor Expands State Operations

Fairbanks, Alaska—Delegates to the convention of the Alaska AFL-CIO approved a sweeping reorganization of the state body under which new full-time posts of executive president and secretary-treasurer were created.

Business Rep. Dwayne Carlson of Carpenters Local 1243, Fairbanks, was elected executive president, with duties to include legislative and public relations work.

Business Mgr. Henry Hedberg of Laborers Local 341, Anchorage, for the past 10 years the central body's legislative representative, was chosen secretary-treasurer.

Sec.-Treas. R. E. McFarland of Laborers Local 341, president of the state body for 12 years, was named president emeritus. Mrs. Lorena Showers of the Anchorage Hotel & Restaurant Employes, who was state secretary-treasurer for the past 12 years, was elected secretary-treasurer-emeritus.

Chosen vice presidents for their respective areas were:

Fairbanks, H. A. Weir, Bartenders, and Julius Kornfiend, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Anchorage, M. F. Alewine, Operating Engineers; Mel Evans, Plumbers, and W. G. Turner, Carpenters; Ketchikan, John Mott, Laborers; Sitka, Mary Leith, Hotel & Restaurant Employes, and Marvin Kenberg, Pulp-Sulphite Workers.

Unions Taking Bigger Role As Job-Training Sponsors

Most training contracts have been with employers, community organizations and trade associations, but a large portion of these have been with union participation. The Labor Dept. requires employers to secure the approval of unions holding bargaining rights at any establishment where on-the-job training is given.

Direct union-sponsored programs are helping to meet a nation's need for truck mechanics and cooks, for skilled janitors and pipelayers, for hospital technicians and bricklayers—and for workers who are skilled in half-a-dozen machines instead of just one.

The training programs, with emphasis on skill upgrading as well as entry-level jobs, have prodded employers to look at the uptapped potential of helpers, assemblers and punch press operators. The inducement: the federal government will pay the cost of training them in higher skills.

Unions that pioneered in pre-apprentice training have found that school dropouts can often learn fast if they see a meaningful goal ahead.

A typical class of 39 trainees which was graduated from a training program sponsored by the Bricklayers Joint Apprenticeship Council of Washington, D.C., included 27 Negroes and 15 school dropouts. They moved from training into the regular apprenticeship program, at union wages.

In the heart of the explosive Watts community of Los Angeles, two locals of the Building Service employes joined in a training program that has placed hundreds of hard-core unemployed in decent-paying jobs.

The on-the-job programs, administered by the Bureau of Apprenticeship & Training, at first represented only a small part of the government's manpower development effort. The bulk of programs were of the institutional type, classroom and vocational school approaches to teaching skills.

Trainees in institutional programs receive subsistence allowances, based on state unemployment benefits, with extra amounts for those with dependents. On-the-job trainees are paid by the employer at regular rates for the work they do. The government pays the actual cost of instruction and training equipment and reimburses the sponsor for administrative expenses.

Currently 113,000 on-the-job trainees are learning a skill in more than 2,400 programs. An estimated 75,000 workers have completed their training programs and a sampling shows that more than 89 percent of them are employed, nearly all in jobs directly related to their training.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Stanley H. Ruttenberg, the government's manpower administrator, is actively encouraging "coupled" programs, under which disadvantaged applicants would be given a combination of classroom and on-the-job instruction.

Ruttenberg has also issued stricter rules on hiring for federally-financed on-the-job training to prevent employers from skimming off the cream of the job market, leaving out the hard-core unemployed the program is most seeking to help.

The hiring will still be done by employers, but training reimbursement will be made only for those who are certified by the local public employment office as coming from the target group of the disadvantaged. This group includes older workers, persons with low education and those who have come out of Neighborhood Youth Corps and Job Corps programs.

More Receptive

Part of the increase in on-the-job training reflects the improved economic picture since the manpower program started in mid-1962. Employers building work forces and running into skill shortages are more receptive to training.

There is no technique for judging to what extent employers would have expanded training at their own expense in the absence of a government subsidy. But the Labor Dept. does require that employers, unions and other groups maintain at their own expense at least their current level of spending on job training and skill upgrading. Bureau of Apprenticeship staffers who are closely involved in approval of training programs also point to the fact that thousands of small and middle-sized employers are starting training programs for the first time.

While the normal pattern of a union-sponsored program is for the union to arrange with its employers to provide on-the-job training and skill upgrading, one of the big programs has been run exclusively by the Operating Engineers. Because of safety hazards in teaching the use of massive equipment at busy construction sites, the union set up special camps with rented equipment for training limited-skill union members whose earnings averaged about $2,700 a year. They were trained as grading equipment operators, heavy duty mechanics and technicians engineers. By-products of the training included new roads, airstrips and other community facilities.

The program was more costly than most job training because of the high cost of equipment rentals—but follow-up surveys showed that increased income taxes paid by graduates moving into higher paying jobs will soon surpass the federal investment.

In fact, government surveys show, on-the-job trainees repay the federal government through income taxes in less than two years of earnings.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY DAY plaque of the National Urban League was presented to Pres. Joseph A. Beirne (left) of the Communications Workers by Pres. Frederick O'Neal of Actors' Equity, last year's winner, at a meeting in New York.

Pan American Pact Sets 18 Percent Wage Hikes

New York—The Transport Workers won increases of up to 18 percent in a 30-month agreement and the right to reopen wage talks 18 months from now for 13,000 employes of Pan American World Airways, the union said here.

TWU Pres. Matthew Guinan and Vice Pres. James F. Horst announced the details of the settlement, which averted a strike Dec. 2. Results of a world-wide membership referendum, now being conducted on ratification of the new contract terms, will be announced Dec. 23.

Under the settlement, wages of mechanics will rise 59 cents and hour to $4.18 in three steps, with the first step retroactive to July 1, 1966. Fourth year stewards and stewardesses will get an increase of $97 a month for 80 hours of flight service, with a rise of $122 a month for top-paid personnel.

The union also negotiated an additional paid holiday, double and one half time for work performed on a holiday, substantial pension plan improvements with a 50 percent reduction in employe costs, and fully paid group insurance and medical coverage for employes and their dependents.

Among other contract improvements are a supplemental medical insurance plan for employes and dependents; 70 days cumulative sick leave; better emergency work provisions, and a plan for arbitration of daily duty time limitations for flight personnel before a three-member panel—a first in the airline industry, TWU said.

TWU said the contract package will add more than $33 million to the pay of Pan Am ground service, maintenance, steward and flight service employes. It was achieved after a Presidential Emergency Board recommended the parties settle their differences at the bargaining table.

Job Programs Shifted from OEO to Labor

The Labor Dept. will operate several new work and training programs set up under the anti-poverty program.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz and Office of Economic Opportunity Dir. Sargent Shriver announced the shift of programs budgeted at $98 million from OEO to the Labor Dept.

Most of the funds are earmarked to finance jobs for the hard-core unemployed in health, education, welfare and neighborhood development field—primarily with public and non-profit agencies. Also involved in the transfer are several existing programs including Green Thumb, which provides services for community beautification.

The Labor Dept. already operates the OEO's Neighborhood Youth Corps program. It will combine the Youth Corps and the now OEO-job-project operations into a new Labor Dept. Bureau of Work Programs.

Neighborhood Youth Corps Administrator Jack Howard has been named to head the new bureau.

William McCrone Dies, Headed Cleveland CSA

Cleveland, O.—William G. McCrone, community services director for the Cleveland AFL-CIO and full-time labor consultant for the Cleveland United Appeal, died unexpectedly at 46 after a heart attack.

McCrone joined Local 32 of the Auto Workers after becoming an assembler at the White Motor plant in 1941. After World War II service in the Navy he served as a union steward. He was full-time president of Local 32 from 1952 until his appointment as director of AFL-CIO community services in 1963.

Two College Groups Hit St. John's Policies

New York—St. John's University, where union teachers are nearing the end of the first year of a strike, has been warned by the Middle States Association of Colleges & Secondary Schools to correct its "institutional weaknesses" by Dec. 31, 1967, or face the probable revocation of its accreditation.

At the same time St. John's came under another sharp attack by the American Association of College Professors, which dismissed the university's adminstrative changes as inadequate, accused it of doing a "massive wrong" when it ousted 31 professors without hearings, and declared it "should not have accredited standing."

The twin blows at St. John's were welcomed by the United Federation of College Teachers, which called the strike last Jan. 3 to protest the firings in December 1965, of the 31 instructors without stated reasons and without the opportunity to defend themselves.

However, union spokesmen said the "show cause" order does not go far enough because it does not specify what reforms it demands, and that based on the evidence it had, the association would have been justified in rescinding accreditation at this time. Also, it does not call for reinstatement of the dismissed faculty members, or hearings on charges against them.

Loss of accreditation means that other colleges and universities could refuse to accept the academic credits of St. John's students in case of transfer or on application for admission to graduate or professional schools.

The association's warning was issued in a report by its commission on institutions of higher learning presented to the annual convention in Atlantic City by Chairman Albert E. Meder, Jr.

"The commission regards such an order to show cause as comparable in kind to revocation and only slightly less severe," he said at a press conference.

The report said:

"The unfortunate events at St. John's University are symptomatic of serious institutional weakness that cannot be allowed to continue. Indeed if this weakness is not corrected, it is predictable that there will develop such deterioration of educational effectiveness that loss of accreditation would almost inevitably ensue. . . ."

The union said the university professors' association statement amounted to an affirmation of its own position that accreditation should be revoked because of failure to meet accepted standards of academic freedom and due process.

The union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers, marked the first anniversary of the firings with a mass picket line at the university's Brooklyn campus, co-sponsored with the New York City AFL-CIO and the AFT on Dec. 15.

The first anniversary of the strike will be observed Jan. 3 with a rally at Roosevelt Auditorium in New York.

Transit Pact Yields $400 In Back Pay

Chicago — Some 2,500 elevated-subway employes were to get an average of about $400 for their Christmas shopping under an arbitration award that gives them retroactivity to Dec. 1, 1965.

Members of Transit Union Div. 308 rejected two Chicago Transit Authority offers before the contract dispute went to final and binding arbitration.

The three arbitrators awarded a package of 40 cents an hour to motormen, switchmen, yard foremen and track repairmen and 35 cents to conductors, agents and some other classifications in a three-year agreement.

The first wage raise of 8 cents an hour was retroactive to the expiration date of the previous contract, as were cost-of-living allowances that totaled an additional 11 cents over the year. The second pay boost of 11 cents became effective Dec. 1 of this year and the third, of 12 cents, starts Dec. 1, 1967.

In addition, motormen, switchmen and yard foremen were awarded 5.5 cents above the general increases divided into three increases on the effective and anniversary dates; and track maintenance workers were given another 5 cents retroactive to Dec. 1, 1965.

Freedom Award Presented:

Dubinsky Honored For Aid to Refugees

New York—David Dubinsky, who escaped from Czarist tyranny as a youth to become a leader of the American labor movement, received the Freedom Award of the Intl. Rescue Committee for having helped thousands escape from Nazi and Communist oppression.

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, winner of last year's Freedom Award, led a series of tributes from notables in all walks of life who crowded the ballroom of the Americana Hotel.

There were messages from Pres. Johnson and Vice Pres. Humphrey and recorded commentaries from public figures in a 40-minute, film-illustrated narration of the highlights of Dubinsky's career.

But the highlight of the evening was Dubinsky himself, the AFL-CIO vice president who was arrested at 16 for union activity, escaped from Siberia and joined Local 10 of the Ladies' Garment Workers in June of 1911, six months after arriving in the United States.

Dubinsky, who served as ILGWU president from 1932 until his retirement last spring, spoke of the concept of unionism as embracing "the cause of human dignity and freedom everywhere."

"Tyranny continues to rule large regions of the world," he observed. "A symbol of our terrible time remains the refugee who refused to knuckle under to dictators and is ready to fight—even to die—for freedom.

"Those who fight for freedom fight for us," he said. "When we offer them asylum, we add glory to this country for they have shown how greatly they value the freedom some of us take for granted."

Johnson said both the IRC and Dubinsky have "represented the American ideal" and "extended the hand of freedom to men who sought its haven." The President said he joined "with pride in this tribute to an old friend of eternally youthful spirit."

Meany spoke to the audience of the "many Dubinskys"—the warm friend, the dedicated trade union leader, the good government advocate, the internationalist and the 20th Century American.

He told of how Dubinsky had helped set up labor's Anti-Nazi League within 90 days after Hitler came to power, how he had protested the Communist murder of European labor leaders during the war and how Dubinsky viewed the labor movement as "a means for doing good."

Five-Continent Program

The Freedom Award was presented by Leo Cherne, chairman of the board of the Rescue Committee, which provides relief and rehabilitation services to democratic refugees on five continents. The scope of IRC activities was described to the gathering by Harold S. Geneen, chairman of the Intl. Telephone & Telegraph Corp. Francis Cardinal Spellman delivered the invocation.

The tribute to Dubinsky, titled "The Man Who Would Not Bargain," included commentaries by U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Arthur J. Goldberg, ILGWU Pres. Louis Stulberg, Norman Thomas, and Senators Jacob K. Javits and Robert F. Kennedy.

Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, Sen. Paul H. Douglas and Roy Wilkins of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People were among those sending messages to the gathering.

FREEDOM AWARD of the Intl. Rescue Committee was presented to AFL-CIO Vice Pres. David Dubinsky, retired president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, in recognition of his many years of fighting for liberty. Shown at the dinner in New York at which he was honored are, from left, Harold S. Geneen, IRC Board Chairman Leo Cherne, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany—a previous recipient of the award—Dubinsky and IRC President. William J. vanden Heuvel.

Two More Cities Enact Curbs on Strikebreakers

Ninety cities have now adopted ordinances barring the use of professional strikebreakers in labor disputes.

The Battle Creek, Mich., City Commission, which had initially rejected an anti-strikebreaker law, passed the ordinance unanimously after a campaign by the Calhoun County Labor Council and the local Typographical Union.

Johnstown, Pa., became the 90th city to ban professional strikebreakers when the City Council dusted off a labor-supported bill which had been pigeonholed for two years.

Study Finds Union Dues Reasonable

2,241 had rates of $5 or less a month, 277 charged more than $5, and "approximately" 1 percent had rates of more than $10.

Of 772 unions using ranges-of-dues schedules, 509 list the maximum at $5 or less and 263 had a top of more than $5. About 6 percent, Applebaum noted, charged a maximum of more than $10.

"Dues of $5 or less per month," he concludes, "appear to be well within the average rank-and-file member's ability to pay."

Another Myth

Applebaum similarly explodes the myth that union initiation, transfer and work permit fees are excessive.

Of 2,739 locals reporting, he found, 148 listed no initiation fee, 1,232 had fees up to $5; 846 were in the $5.01 to $20 range; 261 from $20.01 to $50; 240 over $50, and 12 had indeterminable fees based on a variable such as earnings.

"Charges that labor unions exact exorbitant initiation fees are not substantiated by the data from these reports," he writes.

No transfer fee was listed by 2,900 locals, Applebaum found; 114 locals reported fees up to $5; 59 had fees higher than $5, and 23 reported fees based on earnings or another variable.

A total of 3,435 locals reported work permit fees at a standard rate, but 3,239 of them said they collected no fees. Of the remainder, 114 locals got no more than $5. Eleven locals reported a range up to a maximum of $5 and 15 locals had levies of more than $5.

Applebaum summarizes:

". . . regardless of the type of structure, initiation fees and dues tended to be low; and transfer fees and work permit fees were relatively low and apparently infrequently used."

Chicago Campus Sets Union Studies

Chicago — A proposed Chicago Program of Labor Studies for trade union officials, scheduled to start next spring on the University of Illinois' new Chicago Circle campus, was examined in detail at a meeting between the Chicago Labor Education Advisory Committee and university officials.

The committee was named to advise the UI Institute of Labor & Industrial Relations and the Division of University Extension on the program.

High Court Upholds Conviction of Hoffa

The federal court conviction of Teamsters Union Pres. James R. Hoffa on jury-tampering charges was upheld by the Supreme Court.

Hoffa thus faces the probability that he will have to serve the two consecutive four-year prison terms to which he was sentenced in 1964 after a Chattanooga district court conviction. He still may ask the Supreme Court for a rehearing, however, and his lawyers may further seek a stay pending final decision on two motions for a new trial now at the Circuit Court of Appeals level.

In addition, the Teamsters president faces a five-year prison term on conviction of mail fraud and conspiracy charges in connection with the union pension fund. This conviction was upheld Oct. 4 by the U. S. 7th Circuit Court of Appeals.

The Chattanooga case involved charges that Hoffa had sought to fix the jury in an earlier trial, in Nashville, where he was accused of illegal acceptance of gifts from an employer. That trial ended with a hung jury and no verdict.

'Spy' Charge

In the Chattanooga case appeal, Hoffa's lawyer contended that his constitutional rights against illegal search and seizure were violated by government use of a secret informer, a "spy" in his camp, to testify about Hoffa's activities during the Nashville trial.

The witness, former Teamsters official Edward Grady Partin, was himself facing various but unconnected criminal charges.

The Supreme Court split several ways in upholding the conviction. Four justices voted to affirm and two others said the court should never have accepted the case in the first place. Two disqualified themselves—Justices Byron R. White and Abe Fortas—apparently because of previous involvement as lawyers in charges aimed at Hoffa.

The court's ruling opinion, by Justice Potter Stewart, bluntly rejected arguments that government use of an undercover informer violated Hoffa's constitutional rights. "Courts have countenanced the use of informers from time immemorial," he said. Justices Hugo L. Black, John M. Harlan and William J. Brennan joined in this ruling opinion.

Chief Justice Earl Warren wrote a solitary dissent.

Justices William O. Douglas and Tom Clark were the two who said the case had no standing in the court at all.

In a related case involving informers, the court also upheld the conviction of a Nashville lawyer, Z. T. Osborn, Jr., on charges of trying to tamper with the jury in the Chattanooga trial. The decision was 7-1.

Labor Dept. Issues Guides To Wage Law

The Labor Dept. has published two new guides outlining the effects of 1966 amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act which change minimum wages and maximum hours beginning Feb. 1, 1967.

A "Handy Reference Guide to the Fair Labor Standards Act as Amended in 1966" covers wage floor and overtime schedules, overtime pay computation, equal pay for equal work and similar subjects. It is WHPC Publication 1159.

The second, "Hired Farm Workers Under the Fair Labor Standards Act as Amended in 1966," explains the application and exceptions of farm labor coverage and indicates other pertinent requirements.

The amendments initiated minimum wage requirements for an estimated 390,000 farm workers of $1 an hour effective next Feb. 1, rising to $1.15 a year later and $1.30 the following year. The pamphlet is WHPC Publication 1161.

Single copies may be obtained without charge from the Labor Dept.'s Wage-Hour & Public Contracts Divisions' national office, Washington, D. C. 20210, or at regional or field offices.

Hidden Idle Ratio High, Study Finds

A door-to-door canvass of three Chicago poverty neighborhoods disclosed evidence of considerable "hidden" unemployment that doesn't show up in the government's job statistics.

Its findings back up the AFL-CIO assertion that the government's unemployment figures are understated because of failure to include the "discouraged" unemployed, those who are without work but are no longer actively searching for jobs.

The research project, based on a suggestion by Labor Sec. W. Willard Wirtz, was undertaken by the Chicago Committee on Urban Opportunity in cooperation with the Illinois State Unemployment Service and the Cook County Public Aid Dept.

Interviewers questioned 4,900 persons, about three-fourths of them Negro, in poverty areas.

By the Bureau of Labor Statistics definition, 2,037 were employed, either full or part time, and 762 were unemployed but looking for work. This would produce an unemployment rate of 27.2 percent.

Higher Rate Seen

The remainder of those not working included housewives, students, persons who said they were unable to work because of illness and 458 "others," whom the researchers believe for the most part gave up the job hunt as futile.

Inclusion of these "others" as unemployed would boost the unemployment rate to 37.6 percent.

The research report added this comment on the basis of the interviews:

"Many of the unemployed, after spending long periods of time seeking work, may become discouraged and give up as jobseekers. These people are not counted in the civilian labor force and thus are not counted as being unemployed.

"They are really concealed unemployed. If these unemployed adults not encompassed in the labor force definition because they are not looking for work were included, the unemployment rate would be greatly increased and would probably more accurately reflect the magnitude of the unemployment problem in poverty communities."

The report also suggests that

80-Day Injunction Fought At Struck Carbide Plant

FIRST PHONE CALL out of Saigon in the Communications Workers 10th annual "Hi Mom" program was made by SP4 Joseph H. Pitts, shown talking to his mother, Mrs. Kathleen Pitts, in Winston-Salem, N.C. CWA locals throughout the country in cooperation with USO and the Defense Dept. sponsor thousands of free calls home for GIs stationed overseas, with Local 3060 arranging that of Pitts.

Steelworkers Told To Return to Jobs

By Eugene A. Kelly

A U.S. District Court judge, invoking the national emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act at the request of the Johnson Administration, ordered 2,150 striking Steelworkers back to work at the Haynes-Stellite plant of the Union Carbide Corp. in Kokomo, Ind.

Federal Judge Leonard P. Walsh issued an 80-day back-to-work order on the ground that the strike has had a "substantial effect" on the production of military jet aircraft engines.

The USWA challenged the ruling and asked the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia to set it aside.

Judge Walsh stayed the effect of his order to give the union time to appeal and a three-member appeals panel headed by Judge Charles W. Fahy further stayed the injunction to Dec. 23.

In a brief, union attorneys argued that the strike does not imperil the national health and safety, that other plants can produce the engine alloys processed at Kokomo and that the President has other remedies, including plant seizure, if he believes the national defense effort is affected.

The back-to-work order was the second recent instance in which the Administration sought an injunction to force strikers back to work at a single plant in a multi-plant strike. Earlier this year, a T-H injunction halted a strike of the

Broad Aid Urged for Consumers

By Gervase N. Love

A broad attack on the "confusion and ignorance, some deception and even fraud" that prevent the consumer from getting his money's worth was urged by the Consumer Advisory Council in its long-delayed report to Pres. Johnson.

The council unanimously urged consumer education programs in the schools, a re-examination of standards in the processed food, fabric and household equipment industries, and a state-by-state review of credit legislation to determine if it really protects the buyer.

It also proposed establishment of a Cabinet-level department to represent consumer interests.

Examiner Hits Firm's Tactics:

Damages Ordered as New NLRB Remedy

A National Labor Relations Board examiner has recommended that Zinke's Foods, Inc., Beloit, Wis., be required to pay "compensatory damages" to employes for the nine-month period following its successful efforts to destroy the union majority of the employes.

It is the first time in which a "compensatory damages" remedy has been ordered in an NLRB case to make employes whole for the difference between what they were actually paid and what they might have been paid except for the company's unfair labor practices.

The trial examiner, Josephine H. Klein, did not attempt to place a dollars-and-cents figure on the amount of damages the employes should be awarded, holding that this should be determined according to the nature of the union's evidence on the issue and in a supplementary hearing.

The facts of the case—conceded both by Zinke's and Local 1401 of the Retail Clerks—reveal that the union claimed signed authorization cards from 17 of 26 employes, demanded recognition and asked for a meeting for bargaining purposes. The company conceded that the union held valid authorization cards in an appropriate bargaining unit

2-Party Aid Pledged For Maritime Agency

Maritime labor and management, united in a drive to win independent status for the U.S. Maritime Administration, received bipartisan pledges of support at a day-long conference called by the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept.

Rep. Gerald Ford (R-Mich.) said GOP backing helped the MTD to fashion a 2-1 margin in the 89th Congress to keep the maritime agency out of the new Dept. of Transportation.

The House minority leader added that Republican ranks, increased considerably by the results of the November election, would "continue to support an independent Maritime Administration in the 90th Congress."

If the U.S. is to "revive its merchant marine and rebuild our maritime might," Ford went on, the Maritime Administration — now under the Dept. of Com-

Meany Cites Union Role In Broad Social Gains

New York—Organized labor's accomplishments in working for purely trade union aims and also for broad social goals of concern to the entire community were hailed by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany at the 25th anniversary observance of the Italian-American Labor Council.

The council's annual Four Freedoms award was presented to Vice Pres. Hubert H. Humphrey at the celebration.

"Increases in wages, shorter hours, pensions, protection against layoffs and other products of pure and simple trade union action are not to be scorned as instruments of creative social change or as weapons in the war against poverty," Meany declared.

"The establishment of a trade union and the negotiation of a collective agreement in an industry or area of employment where they did not exist before can have the most revolutionary effect upon the lives of working people and their position and role in the community. There is still no more effective way to convert a system of economic oppression into a rewarding source

THAT WINDOW CLEANER with the Beatle hairdo ought to get himself a haircut, a Syracuse, N.Y., office employe declared before she realized that "that man cleaning the window is a woman." The washer is Mrs. Charlotte Crowell, an apprentice member of Building Service Employes Local 200, who is believed to be the only feminine professional window cleaner in Western New York.

Woman on the Way Up Treats Job with Respect

Syracuse, N.Y.—The office worker looked up from her typewriter and idly stared at the cleaning rag going round and round the outside of the window. Suddenly she did a double take.

"The man cleaning that window," she gasped to the girl at the next desk, "is a woman!"

So it was—Mrs. Charlotte Crowell of Syracuse, an apprentice member of Building Service Employes Local 200 and, so far as is known, the only woman professional window cleaner in Western New York.

Her story is simple enough. She was studying humanities at the Adult Education Division of University College, Syracuse University, in preparation for an associate of arts degree and she needed a job to help support her children, Jennifer, 15, and Jay D., 10.

Among her classmates was Earl Buck, who with his brother, Philip, operates the New York Window Cleaners, Inc.

'I Applied for the Job'

"Earl told me about the chronic shortage of window cleaners and I applied for the job right on the spot," she said.

The Bucks and their general manager checked with Sec.-Treas. Samuel Villani of Local 200 to see if the union had any objections to a feminine window washer.

"Of course, we said absolutely not—we do not discriminate," Villani said. "And it has been a good move. Mrs. Crowell does her work very well. She'll go anywhere any other window cleaner will go. The journeymen enjoy working with her. They help her in very way possible and teach her the skills of the trade. We think she fits well into the ranks of the professional window cleaners of Local 200."

Mrs. Crowell goes where any other window cleaner goes. She does some of her work on the ground and some of it on high-rise buildings, on which she uses a safety belt like the rest of the pros.

"When people talk to me about my work," she said, "sooner or later they get around to the big question: 'Aren't you afraid going up so high?' "

She said any fear of high places has been overcome, but "I treat my work with the greatest amount of respect," and "I'm careful not to step back and admire it."

Mrs. Crowell works in loose blue jeans and a shirt. Her apprenticeship runs for two years, but any employer under contract to the union can recognize above-average application and accomplishment and pay the journeyman's rate before the full two years.

The journeymen with whom she has worked "go a long way to make my work pleasant," she said.

"I think they are very tolerant and their attitude is one of forebearance," she added. "There is more to this job than one might think. There's much more to it than swishing soap and water across a pane of glass and wiping it dry.

"There is much to learn and the journeymen I work with give me tips in helping me to master the special skills required in our work. They also help me to carry the ladders and other equipment, some of which is a bit on the heavy side. We work as a team."

The Buck brothers are happy, too.

"She does her work well," said Philip Buck. "We hired her to clean plate glass windows of stores, shopping centers and the like, and we have no fault to find with her work."

Michigan Bell Unit Ratifies CWA Pact

Some 17,000 plant, traffic and accounting employes of the Michigan Bell Co. have voted by a 7-2 margin to ratify a new contract negotiated by the Communications Workers after they had rejected an earlier proposal.

More than 220,000 Bell System employes represented by the CWA have now ratified settlements reached during the current series of negotiations, the CWA said.

BLS Projections Find:

Growth Rate of at Least 4% Needed to Bar Jobless Rise

By David L. Perlman

The nation's economy will have to grow by at least 4 percent a year through 1970 in order to keep the unemployment rate from rising, according to a Labor Dept. study.

Economists from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and other federal agencies take an educated guess at the employment pattern four years from now in the BLS study, titled "Projections 1970."

It takes into account the anticipated growth in the work force, the expected increase in worker productivity, possible changes in hours of work and the consumer demand generated by an economy with an unemployment rate of between 3 and 4 percent.

AFL-CIO Research Dir. Nathaniel Goldfinger says union economists consider the Labor Dept. estimates of the economy's growth potential and rate of productivity increase "on the conservative side."

Goldfinger's view is that "the rate of productivity advance will probably be greater than 3.2 percent a year if the economy maintains high levels of employment."

The study forecasts a small rise in the number of manufacturing jobs, but a decline in the percentage of factory jobs in relation to the entire economy.

In the blue collar fields, the largest job gain is anticipated in the construction industry, with "a very substantial increase in construction employment by 1970."

Basis for this prediction is "rising state and local government needs, increased housing requirements and expanding business investment in plants," plus a lower productivity increase than for the economy as a whole.

Growth in Jobs Varies

Employment in mining is expected to continue its decline, though at a slower rate. Transportation, primarily air and trucking, may rise numerically, but decline as a percentage of the work force.

The biggest increases are anticipated in trade, in state and local governments, and in services, a broad category which includes business, professional, private educational, medical and personal activities. About three-fourths of the projected employment gain would be in these categories.

Predicting continued high productivity increases in communications and public utilities, the Labor Dept. projection is that, "although services provided by these industries are expected to increase sharply, employment would remain at about the 1965 level and decline as a proportion of total employment."

Agricultural employment, the study anticipates, will continue its long-term decline. But the study predicts that most of the drop will be "among the self-employed and unpaid family workers, with the numbers of wage and salary employes remaining relatively stable."

The study bases its projections on "the assumption that there will be no military engagements in Viet Nam or elsewhere in 1970."

A continued slow decline in the workweek of three-tenths of 1 percent a year is projected to continue, with most of it in the non-manufacturing sector of the economy.

If the study's assumptions are accurate—and some have been questioned by union economists—the economy's course will be somewhere between the low growth rate of the late 1950's and the more rapid expansion of recent years.

The high birth rate of the late 1940's will be reflected in a rise in the number of new workers entering the labor market, the report indicates, and the number of new jobs that must be created to accommodate them.

A rise in the labor force of nearly 2 percent a year is predicted, contrasting with a postwar average increase of 1.3 percent.

A controversial estimate in the report places the annual productivity increase for the total private economy at 3.2 percent, made up of a 5.5 productivity gain in agriculture and 2.9 percent in the nonfarm sector.

This is the average for the 1957-65 period, the study's authors note, and they qualify the estimate with the comment that "the trend of output per man-hour is the most difficult element to project."

The Labor Dept. study is based on 1965 statistics, which do not take into account the reduction in unemployment from the 4.5 percent pattern of 1965 to the under-4 percent current rate. Thus the 1965-1970 projection was for a 4.3 percent annual growth rate for a 4 percent unemployment economy and a 4.5 percent rise in the gross national product each year to bring unemployment down to 3 percent.

The study declares, however, that once the 4 or 3 percent unemployment rate is achieved, "the continuing growth rate would be closer to 4 percent."

This would imply that a 4 percent rate would continue the economy on its present level of high but not full employment—a figure that trade union economists generally considered too low.

The study employs the input-output method of estimating employment by industry on the basis of the demand for the finished product. Thus, for example, estimated automobile production would be a basis for determining the employment impact on steel and glass suppliers as well as in auto manufacturing.

Alternatives Examined

Four alternative "models" of the economy in 1970 are projected—a basic 4 percent unemployment rate, a 3 percent unemployment rate, a 4 percent rate with continued high demand for durable goods, and a 4 percent rate with high services demand. Employment estimates are given for each of these contingencies.

The report notes that "expansion of defense expenditures, if the Viet Nam buildup continues, will involve increased employment in defense oriented manufacturing industries and their supplying industries."

It adds that an end to fighting in Viet Nam "would imply substantial reductions" in defense-related industries, but this slack may be taken up by employment growth in other durable production such as paper, printing, chemicals, computers and certain machinery industries.

Social Security Tax To Rise Slightly

The combined social security-medicare payroll tax will rise by two-tenths of 1 percent on Jan. 1 for both workers and employers—going from 4.2 to 4.4 percent of earnings up to $6,600 a year.

AFL-CIO Social Security Dir. Bertrand Seidman notes that the increase will amount to only 23 cents a week for the average factory worker.

Three-fourths of the increase is earmarked for the medicare basic hospitalization program; the balance goes to finance social security old age, survivors and disability insurance benefits.

Seidman describes the tax rise—a maximum of $13.20 a year for persons earning $6,600 or more—as "a small price to pay for the health and income protection social security makes possible."

IUD Opposes Cutbacks In Social Need Areas

The nation's economy is strong enough "both to defend ourselves abroad and to improve ourselves at home," the executive board of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. declared in a statement rejecting the "exaggerated fears" of runaway inflation.

Instead of a cut in essential social action programs or a planned slowdown in the economy, the board urged adoption of "precise measures to meet whatever specific problems may develop."

"Therefore," it continued, "we firmly support progressive efforts to end poverty, create full employment, improve our national health, social welfare, education and urban rebuilding programs, and otherwise provide to everyone in our nation the dignified and meaningful life that is every human's right."

What "simple decency demands," the board declared, becomes "economic necessity" if the country is to realize fully the potentials of its productive skills and social talents, as well as "preventing the imposition of the burden of ever more insoluble social problems on our future capacity."

In other statements the executive board urged the federal government to create productive work for all the unemployed who can't find employment.

The job statement called "inexcusable" the fact that nearly 3 million workers are jobless and 1.5 million are working part time.

"The federal government must establish a broad national program that will assure a job to everyone willing and able to work and that will provide training for those working in the program," it said.

"As a backstop and final reservoir of jobs, the federal government must stand ready to provide productive work for all who, because of lack of jobs or other factors, are unable to find gainful employment."

The board proposed to maintain income at "a decent, adequate and humane standard" by a boost in the minimum social security benefit for the disabled or retired to $100 a month, an increase of 50 percent in monthly benefits for others covered by the system, a substantial increase in the minimum wage, a minimum of 50 percent of the weekly wage in unemployment compensation and a revision of public welfare programs that would make adequate benefits available to all who need them as a matter of legal right.

ILGWU Opens Talks:

Dressmakers Seek 20 Percent Pay Hike

New York—A 20 percent wage increase for the 80,000 men and women who make $1 billion worth of dresses a year for American women was asked by the Ladies' Garment Workers when negotiations opened here with five employers' associations.

The proposals had been approved two days earlier at a rally of the ILGWU's Dressmakers' Joint Council where union Pres. Louis Stulberg pledged the "full financial and moral support" of the ILGWU.

The Joint Council consists of the New York Dress Joint Board; Locals 10, 22, 89, 60 and 60A; and the dressmakers' Eastern and Northeast Departments, representing 40,000 employes of New York City firms and 40,000 others in eight eastern states—New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Delaware and Maryland.

With current contracts due to expire Jan. 31, union negotiators headed by ILGWU Vice Pres. Charles S. Zimmerman presented proposals for these improvements in addition to a substantial wage hike:

- A stronger contract clause governing the importing of garments, or parts of garments, that can be made in union shops.
- Strengthened clauses on designation of contractors and on damage penalties for sending work to non-union, non-designated or non-registered contractors.
- An additional 1.5 paid holidays, consisting of Washington's birthday and the second half of Election Day, for a total of eight holidays, with a substantial increase in pay for work performed on such holidays.
- An increase in the minimum wage scale for workers in all crafts, and a provision requiring that all piece rates for finishers, operators and pressers yield not less than an average hourly rate substantially above minimum scale.

At the meeting for union negotiators, Zimmerman said the major goal of the new agreement is "money—more money" and declared that talks were starting under favorable economic conditions. The union wants a peaceful settlement but will "prepare for all contingencies," he said.

"Decent wages and assurance of year-round employment, not government-financed training programs, are the answers to the industry's manpower problems," he declared, adding that meaningful wage boosts will help end a shortage of workers in the dress industry.

Wage Statistics Cited

The ILGWU committee reviewed these statistics:

The average wage of all production workers in the New York metropolitan dress market is $77 for an average work week of 32.5 hours.

The union contract calls for a 35-hour week but, because of the highly seasonal nature of the dress industry, workers last year averaged only 42 weeks of work. The union has long urged better planning of production by the industry to achieve more continuity.

The Dressmakers' Joint Council is the largest single unit in the ILGWU. It is the first major unit to enter contract negotiations since the union's general executive board instructed all affiliates last September to press for substantial wage hikes.

The employers' group comprises 328 jobbers, 163 manufacturers and 1,280 contractors producing more than 50,000 different dress styles a year.

SANTA CLAUS joined Raytheon Co. strikers on a picket line of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers at Quincy, Mass., in a pre-Christmas visit. Santa's appearance, in the person of Louise Coletti of West Quincy, cheered the pickets in the fifth week of the strike of 9,400 workers at 11 Raytheon locations. Settlement was reached soon afterward. (Story this page.)

Rail Clerks Approve $5-$10 Raise For 200,000 on Major Carriers

Cincinnati, O.—The Railway Clerks announced here that they have accepted a wage settlement of 5 percent, representing boosts of $5 to $10 a week, for nearly 200,000 employes of major railroads operating in all parts of the United States.

At the same time the Switchmen announced in Buffalo that members on 35 southern and western railroads voted to reject the 5 percent offer. That left 13 unions still bargaining with management in the current round of negotiations, while three have settled—the Railroad Trainmen and Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen as well as the Clerk's, which was the first union of non-operating workers to conclude negotiations.

The Clerks also announced the signing of an agreement with the carriers on pension improvements and a new work rules pact covering 35,000 employes of the Railway Express Agency, Inc.

The retirement agreement gives an extra $45 a month to employes retiring after 25 years, with the amount increasing by $5 a month for each additional year of service to a maximum of $70.

The REA settlement updates work rules dating back to 1949 and gives employes a 5 percent wage hike next July 1 in addition to a 9-cent raise due Jan. 1 under a previously negotiated agreement. The new wage minimum will be $126 a week and the contract has protections for those whose jobs are moved or abolished—payment for moving expenses and losses suffered in selling a home, severance pay of $75 to $90 a week when jobs of those with two or more years of service are abolished.

Newly covered, Pres. C. E. Dennis said, are 4,000 REA employes who left the expelled Teamsters in a December 1965 election.

11 Unions Bargaining

The Clerks were one of 11 non-operating unions involved in national contract talks with management. Their acceptance of the carriers' wage offer left for mediation, or possibly for later arbitration, the issues of travel time allowances and expenses away from home. On June 1 the union is free to serve notice that it wants to reopen talks on holidays, vacations, health and welfare and job stabilization improvements, Dennis said.

The settlement was reached, he explained, "in keeping with the brotherhood's policy of settling all issues at the bargaining table without recourse to government bodies." It was the first settlement reached in recent years before expiration of the old contract. The current pact has a Dec. 31 expiration date.

Meanwhile a committee of four other non-operating unions—Maintenance of Way Employes, Transportation-Communication Employes, Railroad Signalmen and Hotel & Restaurant Employes—continued talks with the assistance of the National Mediation Service. Six shopcraft unions also are maintaining their drive for an improved contract offer. They are the Railway Carmen, Machinists, Sheet Metal Workers, Firemen & Oilers, Boilermakers and Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

Three of the five operating unions are continuing separate negotiations for better wages and conditions.

Union Policy Body Hits Oil Industry Proposals

Denver—The National Oil Bargaining Policy Committee of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at a meeting here said that none of the oil industry's proposals in the current round of bargaining provided an acceptable basis for settlement.

OCAW Pres. A. F. Grospiron announced Dec. 21 that the policy committee reaffirmed its original three-point negotiating program and urged each of the union's negotiating committees to work diligently toward achievement of the three goals before nearly 400 contracts covering 60,000 oil workers expire in less than two weeks.

OCAW's contract proposals to the oil companies include:

(1) Guarantees of continued employment for all present regular and permanent employes with no reduction in rate status.

(2) Increases of 18 cents an hour Jan. 1, 1967, and another 18 cents Jan. 1, 1968, with 6 cents of the first year increase diverted to higher company contributions to medical-hospitalization insurance; a small increase in night shift premium pay.

(3) Elimination of certain inequities growing out of 1964 negotiations to give employes the option of retiring any time after age 62 without reduction in pensions.

The OCAW committee reaffirmed its position on Points 2 and 3 of the bargaining program. On Point 1, it agreed to approve contract proposals providing for no layoffs during the period of the proposed two-year agreements and for retention of rates of employes who may be demoted.

The nearly 400 contracts involved in the negotiations expire either on Dec. 31 or Jan. 1.

New IBEW Pact Settles Long Raytheon Strike

East Boston, Mass.—The first strike against the Raytheon Co. by members of Local 1505, Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, ended when the strikers met at the Suffolk Downs race track the week before Christmas and voted to accept an improved offer.

The 39-day walkout by 9,400 workers at 11 locations in Massachusetts was settled with the aid of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service and the Massachusetts State Mediation Dept.

Union members ratified a three-year agreement providing wage increases of 11 to 16 cents an hour now, another 12 cents across the board in the third year, and a raise in company payments into the pension fund. In the final year of the agreement, pension fund payments will rise from $2.40 to $3 a month times years of service for every employe retiring during the contract term.

Raytheon management also agreed to make 34 language changes involving working conditions, job classifications, seniority and the grievance procedure. Grievance changes were among the major strike issues, union officers said.

The union walked out Nov. 14 after three months of unsuccessful negotiations. The settlement was reached after FM&CS Dir. William E. Simkin met with the parties in Washington and stressed the importance of Raytheon production to the defense effort.

The struck plants were in Andover, Bedford, Burlington, Lowell, North Dighton, Norwood, Lexington, Quincy, Sudbury, Waltham and Wayland, Mass.

Oil Local Wins 30c 'Catch-Up'

Santa Fe Springs, Calif.—A "catch-up" raise ranging up to nearly 30 cents a hour was won by Local 1-128 of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers for some 100 operating employes of the Powerine Oil Co., largest independent refiner in the West, the union announced.

Chairman Robert M. Dempsey of the OCAW negotiating committee said his group, responding to management's offer to meet industry standards, presented proposals reflecting the average wages of eight major oil companies in the area. The final agreement reflected this average, and raised all operators to the classification of stillman at a rate base of $3.809 an hour.

'Discouraged' Add to Count Of Jobless

many of the jobless who said they were not working because of illness could be a part of the work force through proper treatment and training.

The issue of counting the discouraged unemployed came to a head when the BLS recently announced changes in the measurement of employment and unemployment to take effect in January.

At present a person not actively looking for work is not counted as part of the labor force unless he volunteers to the census interviewer that he has stopped job-hunting because he didn't believe there was any work in the area.

The new BLS system will ignore any such comments and count as unemployed only those who actively looked for work sometime during the previous four weeks.

Union economists protested the change, calling it "much inferior" to the present system as a reliable indicator of the unemployment problem.

A key element in labor's concern is that understatement of unemployment, particularly during periods when joblessness is on the rise, could delay government action to avert a recession and stimulate the economy.

Although sticking to its decision, the BLS said it is currently undertaking sample interviews in depth to learn more about the extent of discouraged joblessness.

The Struggle for Peace

ON THIS CHRISTMAS 1966 we are still struggling to establish peace and freedom in the world, a struggle that has continued without real let-up since the end of World War II.

It is as clear now as it was in 1945 that there is no alternative to peace in this age of intercontinental missiles and space satellites; peace today is a condition of survival.

There are those, however, who have yet to understand this basic lesson, who use aggression and subversion to keep the world in a state of crisis. They are the blackmailers attempting to buy power by threatening to annihilate the peoples of the world.

They can be stopped only by a free world that continues to have faith in its own institutions, that will not bend to threats of aggression or aggression itself as the price for peace. The free world has the resources, the manpower and the ability to rid the world of hunger and disease and to provide the basis of social justice so that all men can taste of bread and freedom.

Communist subversion can take in only those who put a low price on freedom, liberty and human dignity. The blackmail terror of nuclear bombs can intimidate only the weak and those of feeble faith.

HERE AT HOME the spirit of the holiday season may reach out for a moment to comfort the one-fifth of the nation's people eking out a bare existence, caught in the web of poverty spun out of discrimination, illiteracy and age.

It is our task to turn with a will and vigor to the job of carrying through the programs and plans that will forever abolish poverty and want in the most prosperous nation in the world.

A fleeting moment of holiday spirit is no answer for those who must return to the grim, despairing world they know so well.

ON THIS CHRISTMAS it is important that we emphasize once again that the policies of this country are rooted in an attachment to liberty and a desire for peace. These are the purposes that are broadly shared by men and women in every continent. This is the greatest source of strength—the desire to build a peaceful world in an atmosphere of freedom.

The trade union movement believes as Dean Rusk has said:

"If there are those prepared to make peace, we shall be there, and we shall be a shepherd in trying to find the path to peace. If there are those who value their freedom, we shall assist them to preserve it. These are the things that this country is all about and this is what the rest of the world is all about . . . freedom and peace."

Senate to Seek Light:

'Age of No Privacy' Threatens To Erode Individual Freedom

THE CONTROVERSY between Sen. Robert F. Kennedy (D-N.Y.) and FBI Dir. J. Edgar Hoover over wiretapping and bugging may serve to bring out a little more in the open the steady erosion of the right to privacy in this country.

Sen. Edward V. Long (D.-Mo.), chairman of a Senate subcommittee probing into wiretapping, has promised to invite both Hoover and Kennedy to hearings he will hold in the 90th Congress. The hearings could throw a searing light on the entire problem of invasion of privacy.

Wiretapping, hidden microphones, spying devices and other gimmicks have long been used in both Washington and in industry. Organized labor has bitterly protested this growing invasion of privacy which constitutes a fundamental threat to our freedoms.

Rep. Emanuel Celler (D-N.Y.), chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, recently noted that official wiretapping in Washington was so widespread that no one could be sure that his telephones were really private.

Union leaders have testified before congressional committees on industrial spying and snooping on workers, and have offered some conclusive evidence that rights in this area are being severely undercut.

The other day Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas spelled out in graphic detail the full extent of this whole trend. He said, in part:

"We are rapidly entering the age of no privacy; where everyone is open to surveillance at all times; where there are no secrets from government. The aggressive breaches of privacy by the government increase with geometric proportion. Wiretapping and 'bugging' run rampant, without effective judicial or legislative control.

"Secret observation booths in government offices and closed television circuits in industry, extending even to rest rooms, are common. Offices, conference rooms, hotel rooms and even bedrooms are 'bugged' for the convenience of government. Peepholes in men's rooms are there to catch homosexuals. . . .

"Personality tests seek to ferret out a man's innermost thoughts on family life, religion, racial attitudes, national origin, politics, atheism, ideology, sex and the like. Federal agents are often 'wired' so that their conversations are either recorded on their person or transmitted to tape recorders some blocks away. The Food & Drug Administration recently put a spy in a church organization. Revenue agents have gone in the disguise of Coast Guard officers. They have broken into and entered homes to obtain evidence.

"Polygraph tests of government employes and of employes in industry are rampant. The dossiers on all citizens mount in number and increase in size. Now they are being put on computers so that by pressing one button all the miserable, the sick, the suspect, the unpopular, the off-beat people of the nation can be instantly identified.

"These examples and many others demonstrate an alarming trend whereby the privacy and dignity of our citizens is being whittled away by sometimes imperceptible steps.

"Taken individually, each step may be of little consequence. But when viewed as a whole, there begins to emerge a society quite unlike any we have seen—a society in which government may intrude into the secret regions of a man's life at will."

WHAT SO DEEPLY concerns Long, Douglas and many others is that when personal surveillance is accepted in this sophisticated age of Orwellian gadgetry, the walls of privacy become little more than a wispy curtain of air.

Invasion of privacy is not a latter-day problem. Indeed, it was very much a specter which haunted the founders of our government. It is not by accident that the Bill of Rights of the Constitution, especially in the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth and Ninth Amendments, concerned itself with this very same threat to freedom.

The first clause of the Fourth Amendment reads:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated . . ."

An exception is where national security is involved. But here, too, as Douglas points out, all three branches of government have a responsibility to ascertain that this exception is not used as the simple excuse for general violations of this clause of the Fourth Amendment.

Perhaps the Long hearing, with both Kennedy and Hoover appearing, can bring to the surface this disease which is so fundamentally eating at the body of freedom, a vital part of America in which most of us still take pride.

Morgan Says:

It's Hard to Bleed for Industry Over Costs of Ending Pollution

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

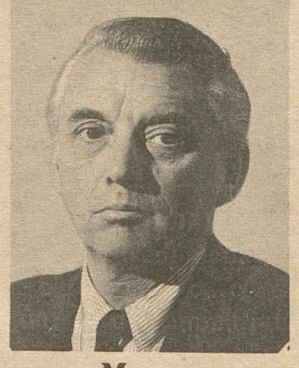
PITTSBURGH—The first national conference on air pollution, which wound up in Washington with a heavy saturation of wordy warnings but, unsurprisingly, little action, might better have been held here in Pittsburgh.

For this great industrial city vividly embodies both the positive and negative poles of the problem.



Morgan

A quarter of a century ago, give or take a year or two, if Smoky the Bear had wandered into this steel capital's famous Golden Triangle he might easily have thought he had stumbled upon a forest fire. Smoke from the steel mills and other sources swathed Pittsburgh in a smarting grime. Belatedly the community fell to dissolve the problem—only to discover, years later, it had a larger one.

The smoke pall was partially dispelled, the Golden Triangle had its urban face gloriously lifted in one of the first major metropolitan plastic surgery jobs in the country and civic pride rose along with the new architectural beauties. But, Pittsburgh found, where there was smoke there was also fire of another sort: invisible poisons in the air.

The smoke abatement battle itself is still far from over. The main pollutant besides smoke is sulphur dioxide, a by-product in the manufacture of coke, still vital to the extraction of iron "pigs" from ore. Refined detection devices have also identified nitro-oxide and other gases, plus a fallout of dust and various toxic particles.

Allegheny County is now on a drive to reduce these other pollutants. Individual householders have already spent an estimated $80 million converting their homes from coal to gas heat. Gas has been adapted for much steel production. Railroads switched from steam to diesel engines and so did towboats hauling ore on the Allegheny and Monongahela Rivers which merge at the Golden Triangle to form the Ohio. But diesel exhaust is not exactly as pure as the driven snow, either.

There was a good deal of viewing with alarm from industrial spokesmen at the Washington conference about prospective costs of air purification and governmental intervention to see that regulations were carried out.

Industry has some enlightened leadership which should be given credit where and when credit is due. Industry's cooperation in the decontamination of Pittsburgh is a case in point—but it is a qualified one. For Pittsburgh was contaminated by industrial carelessness and wantonness in the first place, abetted now and then by weather phenomena. We are, let's face it, a nation of litterbugs and spoilers. There has been such a cornocopia of natural riches to despoil and such a world of room to scatter the slag and the stumps, the wrappers and the beer cans in.

But American industry has exploited our national weakness for extravagance and waste. The motto has been, "Buy! Buy! Consume! Consume!" —and damn the consequences even though the consequential refuse dams and poisons streams, decorates the landscape from coast to coast with the rusting carcasses of junked cars and otherwise festoons the American way of life.

IT IS TRUE that Detroit did not launch a reign of terror to compel the population to buy the 90 million vehicles now moving, or locked in traffic jams, over the streets and roads of the country. But the growth of the auto industry has come to be almost a sacred symbol of the economic health of the country, although its collective exhaust fumes now menace the physical health of the entire population and the carnage on the highways has become a kind of reign of terror of its own. And if you think that Detroit has taken the lead in engineering cars for safety or has voluntarily pioneered in seeking solutions to the pollution problem, just ask Ralph Nader.

Private passenger cars have become a luxurious convenience. But the day may come, Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John Gardner warned the conference, "when we may have to trade convenience for survival." The plain implication: some restrictions on private transport, especially when the driver is the only person in the car.

Noting that by 1980 the U.S. population will increase by one-third, the number of motor vehicles by 40 percent, Gardner said "the truth is that we are actually losing ground in the fight against pollution. The smog continues to grow more dense even as we talk about it."

So under the circumstances it is hard to make one's heart bleed too copiously for the plight of industry in terms of costs and regulations to start unpoisoning the streams and lakes, decontaminating the air and conserving the other resources which, believe it or not, are not unlimited.

It is time to think collectively and act cooperatively to ease the nation's plight with more sense than we showed in causing it.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

THE NATION'S Democratic governors—nine of the remaining 24 of them, at any rate, and one of the nine a lame duck who was beaten for re-election—spent three and a half hours rehashing with Pres. Johnson their party's unhappy experiences on Nov. 8. They did not emerge breathing sweetness and light, exactly, but a general impression was created that they had uttered all the anti-Johnson sentiments they cared to utter when they met a week earlier with their Republican confreres in White Sulphur Springs, W. Va.

On that occasion, a special meeting of the Governors Conference, Gov. Warren E. Hearnes of Missouri publicly intimated that the President could not have carried his state had he been running last month.

Gov. Harold E. Hughes of Iowa, who carries his own credentials as a three-time winner in what used to be a solidly Republican state, remarked in White Sulphur Springs that Johnson, had he been on the ticket, would have had "a very tough race" against a "respectable" opponent. The election results generally showed an "anti-Administration, anti-Johnson vote," he added then.

Tempers seem to have cooled by the time the delegation of Democratic governors arrived at the President's ranch for consultations, although there was no indication whatsoever that the governors cared to retract what they had said in the first place.

Getting down to cases, which is perhaps the most useful function of gripe sessions, the Democratic governors appear to have presented these viewpoints to the President:

● Some of the governors do not like the federal guidelines on the desegregation of school systems and hospitals. To them, the positions taken by Sec. of Health, Education & Welfare John W. Gardner seem "arbitrary."

● The Democratic National Committee was almost useless to party candidates in the last campaign, preferring to devote itself primarily to raising money to pay off its debts from earlier campaigns.

● The anti-poverty program continues to give governors what they consider a good deal of difficulty, very largely perhaps because federal funds are channeled into specific projects without notification to the governors and without the elements of state approval and control.

● The governors have a strong distaste for any cutbacks in federal spending for the highway system and would prefer to see economies made, instead, in the new-fangled programs that make up what are generally recognized as Great Society programs.

The President himself commented that the states had experienced some difficulty in adapting themselves to the machinery of the new programs—which is certainly true.

TO SOME DEGREE, the troubles between the governors and the Administration would seem unavoidable. When a southern state does not wish to face a choice between desegregating its schools and hospitals or losing the federal funds it has enjoyed, nothing is more natural than that its spokesmen should say that Sec. Gardner is unreasonable.

The federally financed poverty projects upset established patterns of control for the mayors of cities as well as governors of states.

Highway-building is a well-understood federal activity, and when a road is built you can see it and drive on it, while the values of proverty programs are clearly less tangible, not to say novel in our experience.

As for the Democratic National Committee, the governors are experts in evaluating its services in their states, and the evidence is substantial that they didn't think much of its services in the last campaign. Considering the fact that the committee didn't do much of anything, any other conclusion by state party officials would have been astonishing.

Crotty 'Hopeful':

Retirement Benefits Improved, Rail Union Goes for Pay Hike

A TOP rail labor official hailed congressional approval of an amendment to the Railroad Retirement Act that makes long-service employes eligible for employer-financed supplemental pensions for the first time.

The new principle, approved in the closing days of the 89th Congress, means retirement pay boosts of $45 to $75 per month over and above those set under the old law for those "with 25 years of service or more," said Harold C. Crotty, president of the Maintenance of Way Employes.

Crotty was interviewed on Labor News Conference, a weekly public affairs feature on the Mutual radio network.

The new pension plan was developed in negotiations between rail unions and management, Crotty said, and presented to Congress with the urging of both that it be adopted. He noted that eventually 750,000 retired railroaders will draw the additional pension payments. The supplemental employer-financed pension principle has long applied to retirees from other industries who are covered by social security.

TURNING TO contract talks now under way between the non-operating rail unions and their employers, Crotty said that in eight months of negotiations, "railroad managements have not offered any settlement that would dispose of the existing dispute."

Cost-of-living escalators are among the principal aims for the new contracts, he said, pointing out that such provisions had been included in past agreements and "they worked well." But, he said, they were abolished "several years ago at the recommendation of an emergency board," which "was a mistake."

"We are hopeful that a settlement can be negotiated," Crotty declared, but noted that a strike ballot has been taken.

Reporters questioning Crotty on the AFL-CIO produced program were Neil Gilbride of the Associated Press, and Duane Emme of Labor newspaper.

PENSION GAINS won by railroad workers and wage improvements sought were discussed by Pres. Harold C. Crotty of the Maintenance of Way Employes on Labor News Conference. # 'Runaway' Sea Cruises Target Of NMU Suit

New York—The National Maritime Union has filed suit to compel the Maritime Administration to act against the owners of a "runaway" vessel engaged in advertising "hideaway" cruises.

NMU Pres. Joseph Curran in a suit filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia said the S.S. Regina, formerly the S.S. President Hoover, has scheduled 10-seven-day cruises this winter in cooperation with KLM Airlines and in competition with ships flying the American flag.

Curran said the transfer of the Hoover to owners registered under the Greek flag was permitted in 1964 on condition that the vessel not engage in trade to or from U.S. ports without the prior written approval of the Maritime Administration.

"By advertising and conducting the hideway cruises," he charged, "Chandris Cruises, Inc. is in violation of the Shipping Act of 1916 and the conditions of transfer of the Hoover."

The cruises are scheduled to begin Jan. 9, the union said. KLM is to fly passengers from New York and Miami to board the ship in Nassau and then fly them back after each voyage, it said. The combined air-sea cruises constitute trade out of U.S. ports and put the Regina "in direct competition with U.S.-flag vessels for the cruise trade," Curran charged in his suit.

The union asked for an order directing Acting Maritime Administrator James W. Gulick to enforce the provisions of the contract and the law by forfeiting the Regina to the U.S. and imposing fines up to $5,000 under the shipping act.

YEARS OF EFFORT to achieve equal job opportunities for all won for Pres. Gordon Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (second from right) a civil rights medal from the Electrical Industry Division of the Anti-Defamation League's annual appeal for funds. The presentation was made at a dinner in New York by Benjamin R. Epstein (second from left), ADL national director. Looking on are Sidney P. Lipkins (left), chairman of the appeal division, and Pres. Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of IBEW Local 3.

Social Justice Goals Stressed by Freeman

New York—Organized labor will continue its pursuit of social justice for all Americans to strengthen the advances scored during the Administrations of the late Pres. Kennedy and Pres. Johnson, Pres. Gordon M. Freeman of the Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers told the Electrical Division of the Anti-Defamation League in accepting its Civil Rights Award.

He lauded the league for its long fight against discrimination and promised that as it fights on, "you will have an ally—every step of the way."

"We will be helping you in exposing the rapidly growing groups of right-wing extremists," he declared. "These people are making a tremendous bid for political power. Their ways are insidious, their real motives hidden. The respectable source of much of their support is additional cause for alarm to democratic-minded citizens."

Freeman recalled that the ADL recently celebrated its 50th anniversary and the IBEW marked 75 years of service, and noted that "it was to fight discrimination of all kinds that the early pioneers of the labor movement fought and bled on picket lines."

"In many respects the work of your league and the work of our labor movement has been most similar," he added, "and I think we can both be proud when we review how far we have come."

He also hailed Samuel Gompers founder of the former AFL, as "the greatest pioneer of them all," and said that as he was Jewish, he "knew better than most what it was like to be discriminated against."

Devotion to Freedom

The ADL honored Freeman for "devotion to our American heritage of freedom."

As an IBEW international representative in the South during the 1930s, Freeman organized some of the earliest integrated locals in both his own union and the building trades as a group.

He strongly opposed discrimination on Tennessee Valley Authority projects and was successful in getting Negroes integrated into formerly all-white line crews with uniform rates of pay for all workers.

Injunction Fought By Carbide Strikers

Machinists and the Auto Workers at a General Electric Co. plant in Evendale, O., while strikes continued at several other GE locations.

The Kokomo strike against Union Carbide began Sept. 29. It was one of 11 walkouts triggered by the action of the billion-dollar carbide corporation in what a National Labor Relations Board trial examiner termed a lockout of 1,200 members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers last July at its plant in Alloy, W.Va.

When the President announced he was preparing to invoke T-H injunction procedures against the Kokomo strike, delegates from three Carbide unions met in Washington and vowed to continue their strikes at the 10 other locations to win a "decent contract" for the 6,000 strikers. Also they voted to continue labor's nation-wide boycott of Union Carbide products.

In November the AFL-CIO Executive Council voted full support for the strike effort and the boycott and urged all union members to refrain from buying Carbide products. These include Prestone anti-freeze, Eveready batteries and related equipment, Bakelite Glad Bags and Englander mattresses and sofa beds.

The council pointed out in a statement that Union Carbide, the nation's 10th largest corporation, has for years "insisted on making unilateral decisions" on wage rates, pensions, insurance, vacations and holidays even though workers in 50 of its plants are organized into locals of 14 international unions.

Meanwhile picket lines are being maintained by the USWA, the Chemical Workers and the OCAW at Carbide plants in Alloy and Sistersville, W.Va.; Ashtabula, Marietta and Upper Sandusky, O.; Speedway City, Hammond and Whiting, Ind., and Portland, Ore. The strike, and the bargaining effort, is being coordinated by the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

The injunction, if its issuance becomes effective, does not apply to the other struck plants but Elliot Bredhoff, special counsel for the Steelworkers, told Judge Walsh that it would have a "devastating effect" on the Kokomo strikers and their families.

The injunction, he argued, should be denied for these reasons:

- The T-H emergency provisions do not apply to every strike that affects national health or safety, but only to those affecting an entire industry or a substantial part of an industry.
- The Kokomo strike does not fit these requirements and therefore the President went beyond the authority granted by Congress in the Taft-Hartley Act.
- The government introduced no evidence that the strike will affect an industry or a substantial part thereof and therefore is not entitled to an injunction.

The government will not be left remedyless by a denial of the injunction it requested, said Bredhoff. He explained:

"If the products normally manufactured by the struck plant are absolutely essential for defense, as the government contends," there are other laws it may invoke. The President may seize a plant that "fails to produce goods required by the armed forces for national defense purposes," or he may compel any other plant or company to "put aside any less essential work and give immediate attention to the highest priority" defense requirement.

"If those requirements can only be met by the Kokomo plant . . . the President can take possession of the plant" to meet those needs, he added.

Union Donations Bring Santa Claus to Kingsport

Kingsport, Tenn.—A fat, jolly Santa Claus with a booming "ho! ho! ho!" and a generous hand distributed thousands of dollars worth of toys and candy to more than 1,000 children of Kingsport Press strikers at a Christmas Party held in the Municipal Auditorium.

The party, staged under the auspices of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trade Dept., was the fourth held for the youngsters since 1,200 members of the Bookbinders, Pressmen, Typographical Union, Stereotypers and Machinists walked out in March 1963.

Present were Sec. Joseph Lewis and Rep. John S. Lutz of the department; Pres. Anthony J. DeAndrade of the Pressmen; Pres. John Connolly of the Bookbinders and Pres. James H. Sampson of the Stereotypers.

AFL-CIO Support

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent a telegram for the occasion that was symbolic of united AFL-CIO support of the strikers. Read by Sec.-Treas. R. W. Ayers of the Allied Kingsport Press Unions, Meany's measage said:

"On behalf of trade unionists everywhere I wish to extend Christmas greetings to you and your families. Your courage and determination are an inspiration to all of American labor. The goals for which the Kingsport strikers have endured so many months of hardship represent the highest ideals of this great federation. I am confident that justice shall eventually be yours. I pledge to you all once again the complete support of the AFL-CIO."

The party was financed by a special Christmas fund collected for the strikers by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. Contributions came from every segment of the labor movement, including thousands of individuals—and also from the Encyclopedia Britannica, one of the publishers which pulled all of its printing from the struck plant because of the walkout.

State-County Wins Ballots In 2 Big Units

Same-day major election victories were scored by the State, County & Municipal Employes among Dept. of Public Works Employes in Detroit and non-professional personnel of Rutgers University, New Brunswick, N.J.

The Detroit election was won by a 1,200-575 margin over a coalition led by the Teamsters and gave the AFL-CIO affiliate representation rights for a unit of 2,300 workers.

The SCME had sought one city-wide bargaining unit for the department. But the Michigan Labor Mediation Board overruled a staff recommendation and carved out a separate unit for 1,040 truck drivers and equipment operators for which the Teamsters won representation rights, 581-344, in a second election.

The union's triumph at Rutgers, the state university, followed mutual agreement on an election with the university because New Jersey has no collective bargaining law for state employes.

The vote, conducted by the American Arbitration Association, gave the SCME 471 votes to 165 for no union in a unit of 815 members.

George Lynch Dies; Led Pattern Makers

George Q. Lynch, president of the Pattern Makers from 1934 until his retirement in 1959, died recently at his home in Sarasota, Fla., according to word received at international union headquarters in Washington. He was 88.

A vigorous advocate of craft unionism, he was credited with rebuilding the Pattern Makers into a strong, though small, union from the low estate it had reached during the depression.

He completed his apprenticeship in his native Perth Amboy, N.J., just before his 19th birthday and joined the union in New York as a journeyman in 1907. He was elected assistant business manager of his local in 1917. Five years later he was chosen business manager, retaining the office until he was elected international president.

Union-Blocking Tactics Draw Damages Order

but refused a meeting, suggesting that a representation election be held.

When the union secured a Mar. 15 date for an NLRB election, however, the company "embarked on an anti-union campaign," the trial examiner found, and the union lost by a 10-15 vote. It promptly filed charges of illegal coercion, asking that the election be set aside.

The company's coercion of employes, the examiner ruled, included these acts:

- The firm manager repeatedly and "coercively" interrogated the key union figure, threatening to discharge him and treating him to such a constant criticism that when he finally quit he could be deemed to have been "constructively discharged."
- The company threatened other employes, saying that if the union "came in" workers under 18 years of age would be fired and stockroom work thereafter would be done by adults at night.
- The company sent a series of letters to employes saying bluntly, "We do not want a union," and urging "no" votes in the NLRB election. The coming of a union would create a "dog-eat-dog atmosphere," it added.
- A short time after the election the company granted unilateral pay increases to 15 workers. This action by agreement was incorporated into the complaint of unfair labor practices.

The trial examiner summed up by findings that Zinke's had engaged in an "open-gauged campaign" marked by "flagrant conduct calculated to undermine the union's position" and "dissipate its majority status."

The trial examiner recommended that the Mar. 15 election be set aside.

In shaping a recommended remedy designed to prevent the employer from reaping benefits from the delay in bargaining, the examiner pointed out that union contracts with other stores in the area provided uniform wage scales and fringe benefits.

Union's Goals

It cannot be assumed that Local 1401 would "necessarily have bargained successfully" for similar wages and benefits at Zinke's, the report says, but "it cannot be assumed that the union would have been successful."

Even though the NLRB has ordered compensatory damages in other cases, such a remedy in the Zinke's case would prevent company profit from illegal conduct and avoid "the legal pitfall of having the board dictate the terms of a collective-bargaining agreement" applying to the future, the report continued.

"Evidence produced by the union is sufficient to indicate that in a supplemental hearing" precise evidence may be produced "to prove with the requisite degree of legal certainty the damages that have been sustained by the employes."

Urges Broad Attack:

Consumer Advisory Council Assails 'Confusion, Fraud'

In addition, the council examined in detail four areas of particular concern to consumers—household maintenance and repair, autos, health services and textiles, and made specific recommendations to protect the consumer.

The report was prepared by a 12-member committee that included Sidney Margolius, whose consumer column appears in the AFL-CIO News. It was submitted on June 12 to Chairman Esther Peterson of the President's Committee on Consumer Interests. There was no explanation for the delay in making it public.

Recommendations include:

- The injection of consumer education elements geared to the needs and resources of low-income persons into anti-poverty programs.
- Encouragement of schools to include consumer economics in their curricula.
- A review of present labeling requirements by the Food & Drug Administration and the Agriculture Dept. with the aim of making improvements to provide "more adequate disclosure of the actual amounts of the various ingredients in processed foods." In combination foods, the council favors separate listing of the weight of each component.
- Quality grading of foods with appropriate desgnations such as A, B and C, and of performance standards on clothing.

"To achieve a more consumer-oriented and directed economy a twin approach is needed," the report suggested.

"First, there should be more readily available easy-to-understand facts about goods and services, and they should be in every conceivable form—labels, packages, advertisements, credit contracts, newspapers and magazines, television and radio, brochures and books, government publications, and materials from private organizations and trade associations.

"Second, consumers must become more highly motivated to use this information. . . . Three key groups who might be strongly motivated to buy more carefully if the proper educational vehicles were found would be the poor, the elderly and the newly married."

In the specific areas it studied, the council was sharply critical of many industry practices:

- Home maintenance and repair: Fraud and deception were found to be widespread and to cost consumers up to $1 billion a year. The report lists the most common sharp practices in the field as "phony bargains, tricky financing, guarantees not honored, materials misrepresented, and performances exaggerated," and particularly referral selling, which it says should be outlawed.

"While voluntary codes of ethics and practices are valuable, the industry has shown that it cannot regulate itself," the report noted in calling for strict rules for sales and performances practices.

- Autos: A "complete study" of guarantees and warranties was urged for both new and used cars. Chairman Warren Magnuson (D-Wash.) of the Senate Commerce Committee has announced that hearings will be held on warranties. The council also proposed a series of safety measures which in effect became outdated when Congress enacted an auto safety law this year.

Auto Ads Hit

"If as much money were spent on consumer information about construction durability and safety features as the automobile manufacturers now spend on advertising other more subjective features . . . competition in the automobile market might be operating along somewhat different lines than is now the case," the report declares.

"Dealer advertisements are as uninformative as manufacturers' and sometimes as misleading. Manufacturers' advertisements tend to stress sex, status, thrills and luxury."

- Health care: The council pointed to "inefficient and wasteful" practices in the "organization and delivery" of modern health care to the consumer, adding as an example that "several hospitals in the same geographic area establish heart surgery units or procure cobalt bombs for prestige reasons, when the community really needs only one." The result, it says, has been "fragmentation, duplication and proliferation of specialized interests."

The fact that "group practice tends to make readily available family-type medical care" was stressed. The committee notes that organized labor, cooperatives and other consumer groups are stimulating the growth of prepaid group practice plans and quotes the 1963 AFL-CIO convention resolution endorsing the principle and pledging to help in its expansion.

The report endorses the Patman bill that would make federal loans and mortgage insurance available for the construction and equipment of group practice medical and dental facilities.

- Textile: The council endorsed recommendations handed down in April by the Industry Advisory Committee on Textile Information for permanently attached care labels on all textiles where special instructions are needed.

Performance and safety standards also were urged, as well as standards for body sizes, which are "by no means universal." Failure to utilize present uniform standards, the council observed, is costly to consumers, who "feel they are entitled to reasonable uniformity . . . no matter where they shop or what they pay."

The council's recommendations were unanimous except for the one on establishment of a consumer department in the Cabinet. A minority held out instead for an independent Office of Consumer Counsel and a Cabinet or sub-Cabinet coordinating group headed by a special presidential assistant.

Job Programs Helping Indians Battle Poverty

Chronic unemployment and poverty are still the lot of most American Indians despite considerable progress in recent years, Commissioner of Indian Affairs Robert L. Bennett reports in an article appearing in the American Federationist.

Bennett, the first Indian to head the Bureau of Indian Affairs, writes in the December issue of the AFL-CIO magazine of the special problems faced by the nation's 550,000 Indians, especially the 380,000 living on reservations.

Over the years, Bennett notes, the American Indian has been treated by the federal government in turn "as a conquered enemy, dangerous insurgent, childlike incompetent and laggard partner."

In Bennett's view:

"The government has the same obligation to the Indians of this country that it has to the rest of its citizens; namely that there be no families living in destitution, no children deprived of the fullest educational opportunity, no social or political discrimination and no fear and mistrust left to mar the relationships between Indian citizens and non-Indian citizens."

He suggests that the task ahead is to hasten the day of self-sufficiency for America's Indians.

In this endeavor, Bennett says, employment assistance, industrial development and improved educational opportunities all play important parts.

School Attendance High

As better schooling opportunities have been made available, "Indian children rushed in like air into a vacuum," Bennett notes. Almost 95 percent of school-age children now are in school, a sharp contrast with the situation a generation or two ago.

Tribes have developed tourist facilities to provide job opportunities, new plants paying prevailing wages have been located on or near reservations and public housing authorities have been established on reservations, including 23 "do it together" projects where Indians have built modern homes for themselves.

Vocational and on-the-job training have been greatly expanded in recent years and some have made the difficult transition from reservation life to an urban society.

For those who cannot make the jump to a totally different environment successfully, Bennett suggests, "both tribal and federal authorities must seek ways to expand opportunities nearer at hand."

Bennett sees "no magic solutions to long-standing problems" but he is convinced that "there are solutions."

In addition to the work of his own agency, he says, "there will be closer liaison with other governmental agencies whose activities benefit the Indians. . . . There will also be closer involvement with state and local governments in areas with large Indian populations."

From the Indians themselves, Bennett writes, "leadership of the highest order" is required to replace generations of federal paternalism and Indian dependency.

U.S. Appeals Court Declines to Block Count in Pan Am Clerks' Election

A ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia left in doubt the outcome of a National Mediation Board election involving a raid by the Teamsters against 7,000 clerical employes of Pan American World Airways represented by the Railway Clerks.

The appeals court held on Dec. 19 that it had no authority, at that stage of the proceedings, to enjoin the vote count or set aside any subsequent certification by the board.

At the same time, it rapped the knuckles of the Mediation Board for the lack of "forthrightness" in a letter to all Pan Am Workers which "explained" why an election last summer had been set aside when evidence of frauds and forgeries came to its attention.

The Railway Clerks charged that the ousted Teamsters had sent out letters purporting to be from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany and had forged two BRC circulars. The forgeries urged write-in votes for the BRC, although the union had chosen to stay off the government ballot.

A second election was scheduled by the board which the BRC argued was conducted too soon for the taint of fraud in the first vote to have been eliminated. The ballot count has been twice deferred since Dec. 12 by the Mediation Board and has now been scheduled for Dec. 27.

The appeals court left the door open for the BRC to seek redress at a later time if the vote count should favor the Teamsters. The three-member court shared a District Court judge's view that the delay between ballots was too short to forget the messages of the forged letter and circular. "We share his concern and we share his conclusions," said two members of the panel, Judges Charles Fahy and Harold Leventhal.

"We are concerned that the board may have cast its statement so blandly, perhaps in an overzealous effort to maintain the appearance of impartiality, as to be confusing where it should have been clarifying.

"It will not do to say that both candidates have been guilty of wrong when the fact is that one has been indicted for murder, and the other has only received a parking ticket."

Going even further than his two colleagues, Judge Warren E. Burger wrote:

"The board's curative efforts here were extraordinarily feeble when considered alongside the blatant fraud and forgery of the Teamsters. The board's complacency has a clear tendency to encourage the shocking conduct it purports to chide. If such tactics succeed, the victory of the Teamsters will be the fruit of gross fraud, forgery and chicanery."

Judge Burger said he would have recorded a dissent except for the likelihood that appellants may take steps to set aside the election, should it be adverse to them."

NLRB Advances 3 Trial Examiners

The National Labor Relations Board announced the promotion of veteran Trial Examiners Thomas N. Kessel, William E. Spencer and Harold X. Summers to the position of associate chief trial examiner with largely administrative duties. They have been serving the NLRB for periods ranging from 18 to 27 years.

The board has 80 trial examiners in Washington, D.C., and 21 in San Francisco. Kessel and Summers will continue to be based in Washington, Spencer in San Francisco.

Arywitz Voted Successor to Bassett in L.A.

Los Angeles—California Labor Commissioner Sigmund Arywitz was elected by acclamation as secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County Federation of Labor.

The 52-year-old former educational director here for the Ladies' Garment Workers succeeds W. J. "Bill" Bassett, who retired in November after 23 years of leadership.

Arywitz will officially take office Jan. 16 as full-time executive of the 500,000-member central body.

A native of Buffalo, N.Y., Arywitz came to Los Angeles in 1936 and became a volunteer worker with the ILGWU. After World War II, he was appointed an organizer with the union, and in 1949 became areawide education and public relations director. He has been a delegate to the central body since 1950.

He was appointed state labor commissioner by Gov. Edmund G. Brown in 1959.

During his administration, he was instrumental in collecting nearly $30 million in wage claims—exceeding all collections in the previous 75-year history of the division.

Bassett welcomed Arywitz' election as "a very fine choice of an outstanding and competent man."

Conference Pushes Maritime Upgrading

merce—must be free from the "domination" of any Cabinet-level department.

Three members of the House Merchant Marine Committee — Chairman Edward A. Garmatz (D-Md.), ranking minority member William S. Mailliard (R-Calif.) and Rep. Thomas M. Pelly (R-Wash.) pledged that their committee would give early consideration to legislation giving the Maritime Administration independent status. A similar measure won overwhelming committee approval in the 89th Congress, but failed to reach the floor in the rush for adjournment.

300 Delegates

The more than 300 delegates to the conference, representing 23 of the MTD's 33 affiliated unions, heard a parade of labor and industry spokesmen deplore the crippled state of the merchant marine and call for an intensive drive to revitalize this essential industry.

Paul Hall, president of the MTD, whose affiliates have 5.5 million members, described the 1966 effort to keep maritime out of the Dept. of Transportation as "a defensive fight."

"In 1967," he declared, "we go on the offensive as we write the next chapter in our struggle to build a better industry."

Hall expressed the hope that top Administration officials would "take a good look at the subjects discussed here today," adding that some of the decisions that have been made at the White House level concerning maritime "would not have been made if the Administration had been properly informed."

He added:

"Here you have a situation where labor and management are in overwhelming agreement on what should be done to save our industry. Members of Congress are in almost total agreement, as the vote on the Maritime Administration this year clearly showed. Yet we are denied the right even to present our point of view to the President."

Earlier, AFL-CIO Legislative Dir. Andrew J. Biemiller told the MTD conference that Federation Pres. George Meany had "reaffirmed the AFL-CIO position of full and complete support" for the independent agency concept.

Biemiller said the successful effort to keep maritime out of the Transportation Dept. was the result of "the greatest coalition ever put together," and he predicted that the coalition would hold together in the 90th Congress on this issue.

Longshoremen's Pres. Thomas W. Gleason, conference chairman, said creation of the independent agency is "the only thing that will help the American merchant marine and stop the decline of this industry."

Delegates heard Page Groton, director of the Boiler Makers Iron Shipbuilders Marine Council, call for an adequate maritime budget to accompany the new department —a plea echoed by several management spokesmen and congressional leaders.

In the past decade and a half, Groton said, the federal government has spent an average of $40 million a year on merchant ship construction in U.S. yards.

"By contrast," he continued, "our government is spending nearly 10 times that amount—or $400 million—for equipment manuals for the military establishment." He added that a ship construction program for the merchant marine "deserves at least the same level of budgetary support."

Management speakers at the MTD-sponsored conference included Ralph Casey, president of the American Merchant Marine Institute; Capt. J. W. Clark, president of the Committee of American Steamship Lines; Archibald King, president of the American Maritime Association; Marvin Coles, president of the Committee of American Tanker Owners; Edwin M. Hood, president of the Shipbuilders Council of America; and Richard Karras, general counsel of the American Tramp Shippers Association.

of employment and a dignified way of life.

"But by the same token we know that there are basic needs and aims that our members share with the community at large that cannot be met or met as well by trade union or private action alone, unaided by broader social programs. So we have moved and continue to move with all the strength at our command to carry out these broader responsibilities in the most practical and effective way through sustained political and legislative action."

Meany cited medicare as a major example of "creative social action" in this generation and declared that "it is no exaggeration to say that this legislation bears the label of the AFL-CIO."

"We held to this program and kept it alive through the lean, conservative years," he explained, "returning to Congress with it time after time, taking defeat after defeat, until success was finally achieved.

"We do not propose to rest upon that accomplishment. We are committed to the concept that the best medical care available is a basic right of all—the young as well as the old—and that this right is common to all regardless of means. We intend to fight along that line no matter how long it takes until that principle, too, is established as a fact in American life."

Meany listed other areas where AFL-CIO action was responsible to a greater or lesser degree for the enactment of legislation for the benefit of the entire community, and declared he was "proud" of the record.

"I do not like to see it smeared or misrepresented," he added. "It is not perfect, nor are any of us perfect. We are an imperfect body of imperfect men trying our best to do our duty in a complicated, imperfect and rather messy world."

He conceded that perhaps the AFL-CIO is not doing everything it should in terms of humanity's broad economic and social aims and goals.

"But I am sure of this—that without the AFL-CIO very little would be done," he went on. "We will continue in the most practical way to seek the most practical result in terms of human betterment."

Meany paid warm tribute to Humphrey, declaring that the labor movement has had "much in common" with him since his first appearance on the political scene.

"Hubert Humphrey was a militant in the cause of human rights long before it became fashionable on the campus and cocktail circuit," he said.

"He was there when most of the militants who now crowd the scene were otherwise occupied and I'm sure that he will still be at our side in the same cause when those whose liberalism is a passing fad have lost their taste for the battle.

'Staying Power'

"Progress will continue to depend upon the old pros' staying power year in and year out, long after today's Students for a Democratic Society have graduated to crew haircuts, grey flannel suits and the regular Republican ticket, and the heralds of the new Left have moved on like some of the old to sanctuaries within the foundations and the organs of conservative editorial opinion."

In his acceptance speech, Humphrey restated the Four Freedoms laid down by the late Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt and urged a fight for a fifth—freedom from hunger. He pointed out that 200 million children in the underdeveloped nations suffer from malnutrition, and hailed this country's Food for Peace program as "unprecedented in the history of mankind."

Today the output of one of every four productive acres on United States' farms is shipped overseas to help feed hungry millions," he observed.

The Vice President pointed out that world food production has been static for the past two years but that 140 million persons have been added to the population—80 percent in lands least able to feed them.

"If we do not find the answers," he declared, "I cannot have much hope either for world peace or for the future of the human family."

Rise in November Prices Wipes Out Earnings Gain

A drop in food prices slowed the rise in the cost of living in November as the Consumer Price Index edged only one-tenth of 1 percent higher, its smallest increase in six months.

The rise was sufficient, however, to wipe out the effect of a 1-cent rise in average hourly factory earnings, leaving purchasing power unchanged over the month.

The average weekly take-home pay for a factory worker with three dependents rose to a record $100.76, about 10 cents more than October and $2 above a year ago. But its buying power was $1.15 less than the average pay in November 1965.

At 114.6, the consumer price index meant that it cost $11.46 in November to purchase goods and services worth $10 in the 1957-59 base period.

Apart from food prices, which dropped seven-tenths of 1 percent, the price trend continued upward.

Housing costs rose four-tenths of 1 percent due to higher costs for mortgage interest, domestic service and home owners' insurance.

Medical care shot up seven-tenths of 1 percent, with hospital costs 2.5 percent higher, health insurance up 1 percent and doctor bills five-tenths of 1 percent higher.

Clothing prices rose eight-tenths of 1 percent for men's and boys' apparel, with a smaller increase for women's clothing.

Commissioner of Labor Statistics Arthur M. Ross termed the drop in food prices "a good deal more than expected" and "the most notable development" in the month's shifts. Grocery store prices dropped nine-tenths of 1 percent from October, but prices rose for restaurant meals.

The housewives' boycott of supermarkets may have helped bring down prices, officials said, but they noted that food costs dropped also in cities where there was no boycott action.

ACWA Drive Hits Hong Kong Imports

New York—The Clothing Workers have launched a nationwide drive against men's and boys' clothing made in Hong Kong with informational picket lines and pamphlet distribution in front of the Bamberger store in Newark, N.J., and the May Co. store in downtown Los Angeles.

The drive will be carried to additional stores in other cities which have either started to sell clothing made in Hong Kong or have increased their volume. ACWA Vice Pres. Howard Samuel, head of the Union Label Dept., said a study showed that imports have increased sharply this year.

U.S. Agencies Crack Down On Bank Ads

Four government agencies have issued "truth in advertising" standards in an effort to stop competition for bank deposits on the basis of misleading claims regarding interest rates.

The standards apply to all institutions whose deposits are insured by the federal government, including commercial banks and savings and loan associations.

Interest rates paid depositors or shareholders must be stated in terms of the simple annual rate of interest. Financial institutions will be required to state the fact if an advertised rate of interest is payable only on accounts of a certain size or held for specified periods.

Advertisements many not show how depositors may receive insurance on amounts more than the $15,000 federal ceiling through manipulation of accounts.

The word "profit" may not be used to describe the depositor's interest earnings.

The instructions were sent to financial institutions by the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp., the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and the Federal Reserve Board.

Union Hits Injunction, Halts Strike

Striking Steelworkers went back to work under a Taft-Hartley 80-day injunction at the Union Carbide plant in Kokomo, Ind., but expressed bitter resentment at the application of national emergency procedures to a single plant while the company "refuses to bargain in good faith" with unions still on strike at nine other Carbide plants.

Steelworkers, Chemical Workers and Oil Workers have been seeking new contracts through a coordinated bargaining approach and struck when faced with company representatives "who obviously have no authority to negotiate a settlement," Steelworkers District Dir. James P. Griffin said in a statement.

"We bitterly resent the imposition of an injunction breaking a legal strike" at Kokomo "while the company continues to be rewarded with the benefit of a government contract," Griffin said.

"There are other procedures the government should have invoked instead of a procedure that forces workers back under conditions they do not desire while no penalty is invoked against the company."

Unions 'Remain United'

Griffin noted that the Oil Workers, Chemical Workers and two locals of the Steelworkers "are standing fast and remain united" in the continuing strike at other Union Carbide locations. He also recalled that the AFL-CIO Executive Council had voted full support of the strikes and called for a boycott of Union Carbide consumer products.

The government sought the Taft-Hartley injunction, applying to the Kokomo plant alone, on the theory that the output of that plant was significant in maintaining the flow of military jet aircraft engines.

The union argued that a strike in one plant did not meet the law's requirement that an entire industry or substantial part of it must be affected before an injunction could be issued.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a

NLRB Rule On Election List Upheld

Detroit—A U.S. District Court has upheld the validity of a National Labor Relations Board subpena directing an employer to furnish a union with the names and addresses of workers in advance of a representation election.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Talbot Smith represents the first time the NLRB's new names-and-addresses rule has been upheld at the federal court level.

The labor board announced last Feb. 6 that in future board-directed representation elections it would require that names and addresses of workers eligible to vote in such an election be made available to a petitioning union.

The Auto Workers sought bargaining rights for 200 employes at a Wolverine Industries Division plant of Mid-States Metal Products, Inc., after a contract with the unaffiliated Mine Workers Dist. 50 expired last Nov. 1.

When the company refused to furnish the eligiblity list the NLRB subpenaed it but the company refused to comply. The board sought enforcement and Judge Smith held

Reaffirms Support on Viet Nam

The AFL-CIO will "exert every force" at its command in 1967 to prevent a retreat in the war to abolish poverty and create equal opportunity or to weaken the effort in Viet Nam to secure peace and freedom.

These were the twin themes sounded by AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany in his New Year's statement declaring that in 1967 the trade union movement's objectives of peace, freedom and progress are unchanged as is the "blend of hope and determination that typifies America." (Text on Page 4.)

Two 'Important' Wars

"Important as the war in Viet Nam is to the United States," Meany said, "it is not and cannot be the only war we wage. We must as well wage war against poverty and injustice, ignorance and discrimination."

In the last six years substantial victories have been scored in the war for progress at home "but it is far from won," Meany noted, adding: "In truth there is great danger now that America will move backward."

He cited the attacks on the fight to overcome the nation's social and economic problems and the calls for suspension of that fight because of the war in Viet Nam, and declared that those who advocate this approach are "absolutely wrong."

The United States is not faced,

Bargaining in 1967 To Cover 3.1 Million

Collective bargaining agreements covering at least 3.1 million workers will be up for negotiation in 1967 with most of the activity in transportation and manufacturing, the Labor Dept. reports.

About 4 million additional workers will receive deferred wage increases over the year under contracts negotiated in 1965 or 1966, averaging 7 to 9 cents per hour or between 2 and 2.5 percent.

A larger number of workers may receive cost - of - living adjustments during 1967 than in any year since 1962 as contracts negotiated in 1966 added about 265,000 workers to the coverage of escalator clauses, the department said.

The wage and bargaining outlook for 1967 is contained in the Monthly Labor Review's December issue and includes a detailed calendar on expiring agreements, reopenings and other wage adjustment provisions of major contracts.

In transportation, major trucking agreements will expire and railroad negotiations continue. Agreements for airline pilots will be negotiated, but airline mechanics will receive deferred increases negotiated in 1966.

The outlook article says that the volume of bargaining in construction will decline from 1965 and 1966 levels with about 900,000 workers covered by major agreements scheduled to receive deferred increases in scales. Telephone negotiations will extend into 1967.

Lake Disaster Spurs Call for Safety Laws

Cleveland, O.—Enactment of remedial legislation by Congress to prevent disasters similar to the sinking of the ore carrier Daniel J. Morrell in Lake Huron will be sought by Steelworkers Local 5000, Pres. C. T. Thompson announced here.

The vessel broke up during a storm on Nov. 29 and sank with the loss of 28 men—20 of them members of Local 5000. Only one crew member survived, Dennis Hall, Ashtabula, O.

Armstrong said Congress must assure than seamen in the future will have "readily available adequate and modern lifesaving equipment" and charged that present "archaic safety requirements" give Great Lakes seamen "less than a 50-50 chance of survival" in case of disaster.

In Pittsburgh, USWA Pres. I. W. Abel branded the sinking "a needless waste of human life and a most unfortunate tragedy." He and Dir. Matthew Armstrong of USWA District IV, which includes Local 5000, joined in pledging an increased union effort to get more and better safety equipment in Great Lakes ships.

Thompson, charging the loss of life to lifesaving equipment that was "only normal," whereas "maximum protection should have been required," said the union will ask Congress to order:

Appalachia Labor Sets 9-State Job Corps Drive

The West Virginia AFL-CIO has signed a contract with the Office of Economic Opportunity under which it will assume the responsibility for recruiting and screening some 5,000 young men for the Job Corps in the Appalachian areas of nine states.

Pres. Miles C. Stanley of the state labor central body, who also is chairman of the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council, said the program will cover West Virginia, Kentucky, Maryland, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, North and South Carolina and Ohio.

It will involve the expenditure of $270,630 in the period ending June 30, 1967, with the possibility of a year's extension, Stanley reported.

He said the AFL-CIO has held four-week training programs in all phases of the manpower and pov-

1966 Termed 'Mixed Year' for Labor

Gains Scored on Organizing Front, Setbacks Sustained in Politics

By Harry Conn

It was a year of no overall patterns, the year that is coming to an end.

There were times to cheer and and times to cry—good and bad, gains and losses. Here are a few:

- Exhilarating victories on the organizing front, but sharp setbacks in politics.
- Inter-union cooperation, never more pronounced, while legislation in Congress fell from the great heights achieved in 1965.
- An ominous threat of congressional intervention in labor-management disputes, thwarted in part at least by victories at the bargaining table.

The following highlights of the year were taken from the files of Press Associates, Inc.:

January

AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany, in a year-end message, says nation can afford to have guns as well as butter; warns against cutback in "Great Society" goals . . . Living costs up but economists see no cause for inflation worry . . . U.S. Employment Service modernization urged by panel . . . Johnson says unfinished business takes priority on domestic issues in new session; promises in letter to Meany to push "Great Society" bills . . . Guidelines come up for test in 1966 negotiations . . . NLRB approves settlement between UAW-Kohler . . . TWU wins bitter New York subway strike . . . Growers push strike-breaking to combat grape workers . . . J. P. Stevens textile company found guilty of illegal firings for second time.

February

The Picket

It Doesn't Measure Up

To Weigh All Factors:

NLRB Shifts Policy On Craft Separation

The National Labor Relations Board, announcing a major policy shift, said it will henceforth deal on a "case-by-case" basis with union petitions to separate units of craft employes from overall production units.

The board said it will no longer apply "rigid and inflexible rules" to craft separation petitions, but will weigh all factors, including bargaining history and the extent of the workers' integration in the plant production force.

The new board policy, announced by way of decisions in three cases, sharply modifies NLRB doctrine established in 1954 in the American Potash case. That ruling permitted the separation of true crafts or departments if the union seeking the new unit had traditionally represented employes in such a craft or department.

The NLRB said its new policy also revises the principles laid down in its so-called National Tube doctrine. Under that policy, developed in a series of cases dating from 1948, the board rejected all bids to separate craft units in four industries—basic steel, basic aluminum, lumbering and wet milling—primarily because of the high degree of integration of the work force in the production process.

Petitions for craft separation in these industries will now get the same "case-by-case" consideration given similar petitions in other industries, the board said.

In reaching its new policy, the NLRB said, its members reviewed the legislative history of the 1947 Taft-Hartley amendments to the National Labor Relations Act and a 1959 ruling in the Pittsburgh Plate Glass case in which the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals refused to apply either the American Potash or the National Tube doctrines.

The board majority concluded that Congress had not intended the NLRB to ignore bargaining history and other factors in acting on craft severance petitions.

Factors or "areas of inquiry" weighed by the majority in the cases establishing the new policy included:

- Skills and occupational separation.
- History of bargaining at the plant and whether this had produced stable labor-management relations.
- The extent to which employes have maintained a separate identity in a broader unit and participated in bargaining for such a unit.
- History and pattern of bargaining in the industry.
- The degree of employe integration in production processes.
- The representation background of the petitioning union.

The Intl. Brotherhood of Electrical Workers was involved in all three of the cases decided by the board. In the leading case, at Mallinckrodt Chemical Works, Uranium Division, Waldon Springs, Mo., the board denied a petition by the IBEW for a separate unit of 12 instrument mechanics currently represented by an unaffiliated union as part of a production and maintenance force of 280.

At Holmberg, Inc., a metal stamping plant in Brooklyn, N.Y., an unaffiliated union was turned down in a bid to carve out a unit of 25 tool and die workers from an overall unit of 75 employes represented by the IBEW.

At the DuPont Company's May plant in Camden, S.C., the IBEW was granted a petition for an election in a separate unit of 40 electricians out of an overall production and maintenance force of 950, none of whom is currently represented by a union.

The board's vote was unanimous in the DuPont case, but Member John H. Fanning said in a separate opinion that he would not have given the same reliance to the lack of bargaining history that the other four members did — Chairman Frank W. McCulloch, Gerald A. Brown, Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Sam Zagoria.

Fanning dissented in the Mallinckrodt and Holmberg cases, asserting that the majority had given too much weight to bargaining history.

MEMO OF UNDERSTANDING under which first aid training for union members will be expanded has been signed by Dir. Leo Perlis (left) of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities and A. B. # CarbidePlant Strikers Sent Back to Jobs lower court injunction, however, declaring that "any strike" affecting the military aircraft engine industry "falls within the reach" of congressional concern that gave rise to the Taft-Hartley Act's "emergency" provisions.

Citing the "magnitude" of the nation's effort in Southeast Asia, the court remarked that the availability of adequate numbers of military aircraft "rests upon a resource commitment of a very substantial nature."

There would be "an irretrievable loss of time" in the supply of combat areas if the strike continued, the court held in adopting the findings of fact of the district court that issued the injunction.

Coercion Cited

The three-union strike against Union Carbide was "triggered" when the company locked out 1,200 members of the Oil Workers at Alloy, W. Va., last July 2.

National Labor Relations Board Examiner George J. Bott ruled that the company had been guilty of coercion, refusal to bargain and illegal discrimination by insisting "to the point of impasse" on union acceptance of a company-altered pension-insurance plan "as a condition of settlement" of negotiations.

At other Union Carbide plants, 6,500 workers walked out. In some plants basic new contracts are up for negotiation, in others only the issue of pay scales under reopener clauses.

The Taft-Hartley injunction sent more than 1,000 strikers back to work at Kokomo.

In Sheffield, Ala., a small Steelworkers local reached a settlement with the company providing a 14-cent hourly wage increase under a reopener clause.

Red Cross Pact Spurs Union First Aid Training

AFL-CIO members will be offered broader opportunities for training in first aid under a statement of understanding between the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee and the Red Cross Safety Services program.

The agreement pledges AFL-CIO Community Services Activities to help in securing more first aid training for union members through an educational program carried on through affiliated unions and local central bodies, through joint sponsorship of training conferences and in development with the Red Cross of national goals for first aid training.

The Red Cross will recommend union representation on chapter Safety Services Committees, encourage special efforts to recruit and train union members as first aid instructors, and recommend identity and public recognition of cooperating union groups in community and on-the-job training programs.

The agreement was signed by Dir. Leo Perlis of AFL-CIO Community Services Activities and Dir. A. B. Murphy of Red Cross Safety Services.

It points out that first aid started with the needs of workers injured in industry, and cites the development of first aid training for building trades apprentices through the two-year-old joint program of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and the Red Cross.

Conferences Slated

The AFL-CIO and the Red Cross agreed to joint sponsorship of training conferences for first aid development, and to the involvement of Red Cross first aid staff and volunteers in the federation's CSA programs.

An annual review of developments under the program also is provided.

The understanding is the third of its type between the AFL-CIO and the Red Cross, the earlier ones covering blood banks and disaster services.

2 RCA Units Cap December Gains for IUE

Some 3,500 Radio Corporation of America workers in two plant locations won the right to be represented by the Intl. Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers in December.

In Memphis, Tenn., RCA workers voted for IUE by a near 3 to 1 vote in a National Labor Relations Board election.

In Lewiston, Me., the company agreed to recognize IUE after the union presented evidence to prove it represented an overwhelming majority of the workers.

IUE Pres. Paul Jennings called the December organizing achievements "a fitting culmination to the greatest IUE organizing year in a decade."

In addition to the two RCA plants, workers in six other shops selected IUE as their bargaining agent in December, including Aerofin Corp., in Lynchburg, Va. This was the second victory in IUE's Operation Shenandoah, an intensive drive to attract the thousands of unorganized electronics workers in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia.

Others who chose IUE in December were employes of Muebles Khury Corp. of Santurce, Puerto Rico; Redman Industries of Washington Court House, Ohio; A & S Mfg. Corp. of Moonachie, N.J.; Medco Processing of Lykens, Pa.; and Food Facilities Corp. of Southampton, Pa.

Lake Disaster Spurs Call for Safety Laws

- Immediate replacement of all old and outdated life jackets.
- Equipment of each Great Lakes ship with auxiliary power forward for use when the primary power source is damaged or impaired.
- Installation of life rafts with self-inflating covers for protection from the elements, emergency automatic radio equipment, adequate launch equipment and necessary supplies for survival.
- Authority for the Coast Guard to hold all ships in port pending more favorable weather conditions.
- Formation of a labor-management-government committee to recommend changes in present laws.
- A review of present rules and procedures that guide the Coast Guard in its investigations to determine their "adequacy and purpose."

Spark Plug Workers Given Yule Bonuses

Detroit, Mich.—Christmas bonuses ranging from $61.33 to $85.30 were paid 3,132 members of the Auto Workers in six Champion Spark Plug plants, UAW Sec.-Treas. Emil Mazy announced.

Mazey also is director of the UAW Champion Spark Plug Dept. The payments were made under the union contracts and come from the excess above maximum funding in supplemental unemployment benefit funds.

Court Upholds NLRB On Names, Addresses

that enforcement was a "valid aid to the board in administering the processes" it is called upon by law to administer.

The Wolverine case is one of only three involving the names-and-addresses rule to reach the courts. In an earlier case a U.S. District Court in North Carolina refused to enforce the NLRB's subpena while the third case is pending in District Court in Chicago.

The board in announcing the rule last February cited its mandate from Congress to see that representation elections are conducted fairly.

Such elections should give employes an opportunity to vote freely, without interference, restraint or coercion, and without subjection to "other elements that prevent or impede a free and reasoned choice."

It noted that names and addresses of voters are available in political contests and that stockholders' names are available in corporation proxy contests. It cited specifically a Landrum-Griffin Act provision under which any candidate for union office is entitled to have the union distribute his campaign statements to all members.

The AFL-CIO in a brief filed with the NLRB pointed out at the time that union organizing committees spend perhaps a third of their time trying to compile names and addresses but may lack half of them still at the time of an election.

"A fair and free election cannot be held when the union lacks names and addresses of employes eligible to vote," the federation brief declared.

Real Wages Show Big Gain in Japan

Real wages of Japanese workers, although much lower than those in the United States, rose by 54 percent between 1953 and 1964 compared to a 26 percent jump in the United States, according to a joint study released simultaneously by the two countries.

Sections of the report dealing with wages were prepared by the governments. The introduction and conclusions were prepared by the Labor Dept.'s Bureau of Labor Statistics with assistance from the State and Commerce Depts.

The Indivisible Goals

THE AMERICAN LABOR MOVEMENT, like Americans as a whole, looks toward 1967 in the same spirit, and with the same objectives, that have prevailed since leadership of the free world became this nation's lot, a generation ago.

The objectives are peace, freedom and progress for all the peoples of the earth. The spirit is the blend of hope and determination that typifies America.

The great majority of Americans have learned the unwelcome lesson that the pursuit of peace, freedom and progress must sometimes be defended by force of arms. They have learned that this is so, not only when the United States is subjected to direct attack, but also when freedom anywhere is attacked. For to paraphrase a motto out of labor history, a loss of freedom for one is the concern of all.

Because of that concern, Americans are fighting a bitter war in Viet Nam, half a world away. They are fighting for peace—a peace that will guarantee to the people of South Viet Nam freedom to govern themselves as they choose, and to search for progress in their own way.

It is precisely that peace in South Viet Nam that Pres. Johnson has been so earnestly seeking to achieve through negotiations with Hanoi. In this effort, as in all of his efforts to achieve peace and freedom for the people of that troubled land, the President has the heartfelt support of the AFL-CIO.

The stakes are far greater than South Viet Nam. By demonstrating its concern for freedom at so painful a price, the United States is preserving the peace, freedom and opportunity for progress of scores of other small nations which otherwise could have become victims of Communist aggression. And by so doing it is helping to assure its own freedom, security, and chances for true peace as well.

Important as the war in Viet Nam is to the United States, it is not and cannot be the only war we wage. We must as well wage war against poverty and injustice, ignorance and discrimination.

In the last six years, America has scored substantial victories in this war but it is far from won. In truth, there is great danger now that America will move backward.

Already there are some who proclaim that this campaign to overcome America's social and economic problems must be suspended; that the cost of the Viet Nam war is too great to permit further progress toward a better life in America.

They are absolutely wrong.

To be sure, the war effort has top priority and nothing can be allowed to weaken it. But the United States is not faced—nor could it be faced—with a "guns or butter" choice. This country has ample resources to prosecute the shooting war and still combat the shortcomings of our own society.

A retreat now—a failure to appropriate the funds needed to implement the new legislation—would dash the hopes of those millions of Americans who have yet to rise from poverty, who are still denied full and equal opportunity. This America must not do.

We in the AFL-CIO intend to exert every force at our command to prevent such a retreat. We are confident that the great majority of Americans share our objectives and our determination that the struggle to reach them must continue with undiminished force. And we are determined that in 1967 we will continue to pursue America's indivisible goals of peace, freedom and progress.

'The Other Side of the Coin':

Government Growth Can Mean More Freedom for Individuals

AN OFFICER of society checks health standards in the hospital where we are born. Another protects the family from fraudulent advertising when we die. There is no escape from ever-present government.

But before we accept the notion that George Orwell's "1984" and Big Brother have arrived to control our every move, it would be well to look at the other side of the coin, a prominent economist suggests.

Dr. Arthur R. Porter of Hanover College, a member of the National Academy of Arbitrators, says that both people who criticize and those who accept the inevitable growth of government in the 20th Century overlook this fact: "There has been a rapid growth of freedom for individuals and business units in our society."

Writing in the Michigan Business Review, published by the University of Michigan's Graduate School of Business Administration, Porter points out that not many years ago industrial workers "enjoyed the benefits of a 60-to-72-hour workweek. The only off day was Sunday."

The standard 40-hour workweek of today, he adds, offers time for activities unheard of a generation ago: "The tremendous growth of amateur symphonic orchestras, the development of spectator and participant sports such as professional football and bowling, of weekend camping and backyard barbecues are all indications of a freedom which was reserved at one time for the elite. Sailboating and golf are no longer the sports of 'gentlemen'; each is now a mass activity."

The word "vacation" no longer means Newport, Bar Harbor and Lake George for the few, Porter notes. Parks and playgrounds, recreation areas, wilderness regions, and mass resorts are all part of the growing tourist and recreation industry "which rests on the amount of free time enjoyed by the mass of population."

"Ninety percent of the contracts between companies and unions provide some measure of independent job protection for the individual worker," the veteran arbitrator notes. "No longer is an employe necessarily at the mercy of a supervisor who does not like his religion, personality, or the way he parts his hair."

Governmental controls paradoxically may mean greater freedom, says Porter. He cites increased freedom for women workers and members of Negro and minority groups that offsets the loss of freedom for the employer.

The author also doubts the "glorified" freedoms of small town and rural American life in earlier decades, saying:

"Careful observation of the rural society in the 19th Century indicates little freedom. The economic and social organization of the time meant rigid restrictions on the actions of the family unit. If a family wished to buy crackers, selection was limited to those from the cracker barrel from the local store . . . Many farm families made an annual or semi-annual trip to the big city for supplies and a taste of city life.

"THE CONTRASTS between this 19th Century 'golden age' of freedom and the 20th Century are amazing. The individual family on the farm or in the city has choices of goods and alternative purchases that seem limitless compared to a hundred years ago."

Today, urban sprawl and profusion of roads and parking lots are problems, Porter writes, but "the automobile has given a greater degree of flexibility and freedom of movement to the average citizen than ever before."

If corporations spend a great deal of time and money complying with government regulations, they also benefit from technology and advanced communications which open vast new markets to them, he adds. And the consumer with discretionary income "is not in bondage to his daily physical needs for food, clothing, and shelter."

"For the United States, unnoticed growth of freedom may have been as rapid as the noticed development of control," Porter concludes.

Morgan Says:

Folks Are Beginning to Notice Romney's 'Apt Generalizations'

By Edward P. Morgan

(This column is excerpted from the nightly broadcasts of Edward P. Morgan, ABC commentator sponsored by the AFL-CIO. Listen to Morgan over the ABC network Monday through Friday at 7 p.m., EST.)

DETROIT—Unsurprisingly, the Detroit papers and air waves are full of the latest news about George Romney, the firm-jawed, clear-eyed, cliche-inclined master of the apt generalization who, as the thrice-elected governor of Michigan, leads the field of prospects for the Republican presidential nomination in 1968.

Morgan

Both the morning Free Press and the evening Detroit News gave page-one play to the governor's appearance on ABC's Issues & Answers program. The lead in both stories was Romney's charge that Pres. Johnson should have raised taxes a year ago, but both accounts noted that the governor repeatedly dodged questions about what he would do on the tax problem now.

At the national governors' conference in White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., Romney himself made it plain that his "non-organizational" momentum would quickly have to be organized, so strong had the push of friends and well-wishers become, even though he still had not officially decided whether to throw his hat into the ring. This demure disclaimer is pardonable political double-talk, the translation of which is that the former motor car manufacturer had had an eye on the White House at least since his first run for the governorship in 1962.

The question now is how soon Romney will descend from the safe but unenduring atmosphere of general moralizations in which he can demand good government and condemn the common housefly with such ringing conviction, and get down to the dangerous but required ground of practical politics where he takes specific stands on specific issues.

Most recently he has refused to be drawn out on the war in Viet Nam, saying that it may require another trip to that embattled country before he can clarify his views. A number of observers, including some who are anything but hostile to him, predict that as Romney does become more involved in major issues a lack of political sophistication will show through and erode any chance of his projecting a national image as a powerful figure, knowledgeable in the wide areas of both domestic and foreign problems which a presidential candidate is expected to discuss.

Indeed the governor's possible Achilles heel was highlighted in a fascinating column by Bruce B. Van Dusen, editorial writer for the Detroit News. Van Dusen who, interestingly enough, is the brother of Richard Van Dusen, friend and one-time legal adviser to Romney, cited chapter and verse in a series of diametrically contradictory declarations the governor had already made about Viet Nam.

". . . It is not possible," the column said, "to report a 'Romney position' on Viet Nam—except to say he is both for and against the war and both for and against Pres. Johnson's method of waging it."

His views have been certain enough, Editorialist Van Dusen concluded, "but consistency is something else again." It is almost as if the News, which has been friendly to Romney in his governor's role, were trying to prompt him to pay more attention to his new and heavier script.

To the devastation and dismay of the Michigan Democratic Party, Romney proved his vote-pulling ability in November. But his record is not uncontroversial. Asked to rate his performance, a veteran nonpartisan follower of the Michigan political scene said, "strictly noise—a compulsive talker whose administration has been vastly helped by the country's prosperity."

THIS RAISES an issue that will tax the talents of Romney and every other candidate to handle. The automobile capital of the world, Detroit is a kind of barometer of American prosperity. Despite nervousness about 1967 car sales and the cost of meeting federal car safety standards, things don't look bad. But how do they look in terms of that phrase so dear to the hearts of so many Americans, notably including George Romney: "free enterprise"?

General Motors, the world's largest corporation, made the biggest profits in its history last year—more than $2 billion after taxes. How can a small firm compete with such a colossus, especially when the federal government itself has become such a huge spender and big business is usually the only one that can handle its big contracts?

Last year Defense Dept. contracts alone totalled $33.5 billion—much more than the British government's entire budget. The Pentagon's total budget for fiscal 1968 may hit $75 billion. According to Intl. Monetary Fund sources no nation on the face of the earth, except the U.S. and the Soviet Union, has a total budget that comes close to $40 billion (Britain's is $30 billion, Japan is $20 billion and China's is unknown).

Pres. Eisenhower warned of the growth of the "military-industrial complex" as he left office. Harvard Economist John Kenneth Galbraith has brought the warning up to date. Many big corporations, he said, are becoming so dependent on government orders and planning that they "will eventually become a part" of the state itself.

Wouldn't it be a good idea for everybody, politicians included, to drop all pretense and quit kidding about this staggering phenomenon, right now?

On Labor News Conference:

Abel Renews Call for Parley To Push Attack on Social Needs

PRES. I. W. ABEL of the Steelworkers renewed his call for a White House conference to bolster the attack on America's mounting social needs.

"Our society—with its natural resources, with its plants and equipment, with its skills and abilities—is quite capable of providing all of our people a modest, decent standard of living," declared Abel, an AFL-CIO vice president.

But efforts toward that goal will lag, he warned, unless there is stepped-up action to ward off attempts to slow down Great Society programs.

Abel said that more action is needed in three general areas: "Rebuilding our cities, wiping out our slums and ghettos, and providing educational opportunities" on a wider scale. His statements came during the weekly network radio interview, Labor News Conference.

He said that while few of those most seriously affected by these problems are union members, the labor movement has a responsibility "to our communities and our overall society to do what we can to improve the lot of all people." Industrial leaders are "responding to the need for this kind of activity and recognizing that industry too has a responsibility and a role," he noted.

THE STEELWORKERS' president urged that more be done to lift the comparative economic levels of the nation's poorest citizens.

"There is a very definite danger" in the rich getting richer while the poor get poorer, he stressed. He pointed out that some 50 million Americans are now near or below the poverty level, and even a "moderate reaction" in the economy would leave them in "dire straits."

Reporters questioning Abel on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program, broadcast on the Mutual radio network, were William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News and Neil Gilbride, labor reporter for the Associated Press.

IT'S YOUR WASHINGTON

by Willard Shelton

A GOOD MANY powerful congressional figures, including the Senate Democratic leader, Sen. Mike Mansfield of Montana, are speaking of a thorough restudy by the upcoming Congress of the many plans and programs initiated at the federal level in the past several years—and perhaps some initiated much longer ago.

There is nothing strange or unusual in this; Congress ordinarily spends a good deal of time reviewing the executive operations of the government.

Each house has a separate committee devoted to this specific purpose, and legislative committees frequently consider revising the basic structure of some federal activity, and every subcommittee on appropriations scrutinizes the policies and sometimes the personnel of agencies under its jurisdiction.

What is now being spoken of is, if it means what it seems to mean, a wholesale shaking up and reshaping of programs, operations and responsibilities in the interests of efficiency and economy.

Again, this involves nothing unusual or strange. A good many programs were started with a rush. There were the inevitable false starts and administrative ineptness. The apparent intent of Congress had to be stated through regulations having the force of law, and Congress may wish to take a new look at what it did or thought it was doing.

All of this being recognized, the cautionary observation must be added that there is a vast difference between restudying and "shaking up" what may need to be shaken up and a wholesale slaughter of federal programs and philosophies only recently—and belatedly—acknowledged as valid.

The cheapest way to use money from federal revenues to combat poverty might be to put poor families on some kind of handout.

Then we might not have to have an agency worrying about the educational opportunities available to the children of poor families, or a section of an agency working up priorities for a catch-up program for the children of culturally deprived families.

We might not have to worry about manpower training and retraining programs to give ousted workers or never highly-regarded workers the skills allowing them to compete with an equal chance—and the satisfaction of self-respect—in a changing and competitive job market.

Theoretically, we might dispense with the salaries of the federal employes hired to check on compliance with the minimum wage and public contract laws, because the handout from the Treasury would equalize everything at least at a barebones subsistence level.

Cheaper? You can bet it is, or at least seems that it might be.

Except for that little matter of a human being's chance at self-respect, of his being given a fair shot at becoming a productive member of our society, that all through our history has been recognized as a complete justification for special federal programs.

HOW DID our nation "win the West?" By handing out sections of public lands to railroads that would drive the rails through. By granting homestead rights to families that would move into the public lands and sweat and strain to prove their titles.

The "handout" doctrine about how to improve our society rests on the theory that the cheapest level of federal social-program expenditures is the best level.

It is all reminiscent of the argument that raged 30-odd years ago, when the nation's economic system was in collapse in the great depression and perhaps one-third of our workers were jobless. It was claimed that the cheapest way to pay them off was through an automatic dole.

Franklin D. Roosevelt and his ablest, toughest lieutenant, Harry Hopkins, insisted on a work projects program in which the jobless would be given a chance to earn clearly-understood pay rates for specific labor. Enemies called it "leaf-raking"; the jobless didn't.

It saved a generation's self-respect. Congress would do well to keep the lesson in mind when it gets around to shaking up present programs.

WARNING of a lag in Great Society programs, Pres. I. W. Abel (center) of the Steelworkers renewed his call for a White House conference to bolster the attack on the nation's mounting social needs. Neil Gilbride (left) of the Associated Press and William Eaton of the Chicago Daily News questioned Abel on Labor News Conference, the weekly AFL-CIO produced interview on the Mutual Radio Network.

Santa Visits Kingsport Strike Children

The squirming and babbling stopped just like that when the doors of the Municipal Auditorium in Kingsport, Tenn., were thrown open. In stalked Santa Claus in all his crimson glory, roaring a great big "ho, ho ho!" and broadcasting huge handfuls of candy to the more than 1,100 children of members of five unions who have been on strike at the Kingsport Press since March 1963. There were other presents, too, thanks to the generosity of AFL-CIO members whose gifts enabled the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. to give the children the most memorable of the four Christmas parties staged since the walkout started. In a telegram read to the striking Bookbinders, Pressmen, Stereotypers, Typographers and Machinists, AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany declared their "courage and faith are an inspiration to all of American labor" and renewed labor's support of their fight.

TENSION WAS HIGH when Santa Claus walked into the Municipal Auditorium in Kingsport, Tenn., and opened the 4th annual Christmas party for children of Kingsport Press strikers by tossing candy to them. Escorting him—and keeping him supplied with goodies—are John S. Lutz (left) and Sec. Joseph Lewis of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

BELLRINGERS RANG LUSTILY and singers sang sweetly as the Silver Bells, from a neighborhood church, entertained with Christmas carols and other appropriate music. Additional entertainment also was presented and was given a warm welcome by the children and their parents.

UNION MEMBERS all over the country gave generously so there would be plenty of candy to distribute (above). The local committee that arranged the party, composed of members of five striking unions, is seen at right, with Lutz and Lewis at the left. The strike started in March 1963 over company efforts to cut back wages and working conditions; many of the kids were born since then.

YOUNG MOTHER with attractive children was typical of those who joined in the festivities and applauded the entertainment. Strikers belong to the Bookbinders, Pressmen, Stereotypers, Typographical Union and Machinists.

IT WAS A BIG MOMENT in the lives of these children when they met Santa Claus face to face at the Kingsport party. AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany sent Christmas greetings from all union members and a renewed pledge of support.

Meany Refutes False Charges On Labor's Relations with LBJ

Text of a letter from AFL-CIO Pres. George Meany to Mrs. Katharine Graham, president of the Washington Post, which was published in the Post, Dec. 24, 1966:

In the Washington Post on Wednesday, December 21, you published, under the by-line of Rowland Evans and Robert Novak, false and malicious allegations concerning myself and the President of the United States.

The article in question consisted of a low order of political gossip, motivated, it would seem, by the evident desire of Messrs. Evans and Novak to disparage the President and his staff and their political judgment in relation to the Democratic National Committee.

If your newspaper deems it a service to its readers to further pollute the atmosphere in which the President must carry out his onerous duties with this type of journalistic smog, that is your problem. I must, however, strongly object to the wholly gratuitous, unfounded, and dishonest effort to associate myself and the AFL-CIO with these fabrications.

Specifically, I refer to the following statement which appeared in the article:

"The fact is that Mr. Johnson has not even consented to see George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, despite Meany's efforts ever since the November 8 election to arrange a White House visit.

"Meany's impatience to talk political facts of life with the President is symbolic of a rising sense of frustration and, more important, of genuine fear that the President has not taken to heart the lessons of the 1966 election. The Democratic governors, George Meany and the entire political hierarchy of the President's Party now fear that if this is the case, the 1968 election could bring disaster."

These statements are false in every particular, both in fact and inference. I most strongly object both to the adverse implications which they attempt to draw regarding the relations of the AFL-CIO and of my office with President Johnson, and to the inference that the AFL-CIO has some sort of claim upon, or vested interest in, the Democratic National Committee.

Facts Reversed

The facts are simply the reverse of those alleged.

My own relations, as president of the AFL-CIO, with President Johnson are, and have consistently been, as good as we would have any right or reason to expect of any President. I have visited with him at length many times over the years since he has been in office. When I have felt it necessary to discuss a matter of importance with him, I have invariably been able to see him within three or four hours after calling for an appointment. Most of the occasions when I have met with him have been at his invitation rather than at my request, for—knowing as I do the many burdens of his office and demands upon his time—I try to be as sparing as possible with my own calls upon his time.

The allegation that I have been trying to arrange a meeting with the President since November 8, without success, contains not one iota of truth. The fact is that I have made no request for such a meeting since November 8. Even had I sought to call upon the President, which I did not, the circumstance would obviously have precluded it during much of this period. As anyone, including those who read and believe the Post, should know, President Johnson entered the hospital for surgery a few days after the November 8 elections, after which he went to his home in Texas for a period of recovery and convalesence.

On November 18th, when President Johnson was still in the Bethesda Naval Hospital following surgery, I left Washington and went to Barbados to attend a board meeting of the Intl. Confederation of Free Trade Unions, following which I remained in Barbados as a member of the American delegation, along with Chief Justice Warren and others, appointed by the President to represent the United States at the Barbados Independence celebration. I returned to Washington on December 1, but spent much of the following two weeks in New York City at various meetings requiring my presence. Such time as I spent in Washington during this period was very much occupied with AFL-CIO affairs having absolutely nothing to do with the Democratic National Committee or anything else alluded to in the Evan and Novak article.

Meeting Described

I recount these particulars simply to demonstrate the absurdity of the picture painted in that article.

On Friday, December 16—some five days before the appearance of the Evans-Novak piece alleging that "Mr. Johnson has not even consented to see George Meany"—I spent an hour and three-quarters with the President. The meeting was arranged the preceding day at the President's request. With me at this meeting were Lane Kirkland, my executive assistant; Andrew Biemiller, AFL-CIO legislative director; and Alexander Barkan, director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education.

We had a very good general discussion with the President concerning legislative programs, the economic situation in relation to budget and fiscal problems and defense needs, and a number of other matters of interest and concern to both the President and the AFL-CIO. I recall no discussion of the Democratic National Committee or any other aspect of Democratic Party politics. Neither I nor my colleagues would inject ourselves into such matters, nor would we proffer or seek to proffer any advice or suggestions concerning the future organization or operation of the Democratic National Committee.

I have never made it a practice of informing the press of any meetings that I have had with the President, and I made no announcement or statement concerning this one. It is a customary and basic courtesy for visitors meeting with the President to leave any public report of their discussions to the White House. In view, however, of the malicious falsehood printed in your newspaper, I feel it absolutely necessary in this case to correct the record.

As to the references in the article to an alleged concern on our part with the organization and staffing of the Democratic National Committee, I want to make it quite clear that I do not now regard, and never have regarded the business of the Democratic National Committee—or the Republican National Committee—as the business of the AFL-CIO.

Nonpartisan in Politics

Although it seems to be a singularly difficult fact for some political reporters to grasp, it is nevertheless true that our participation in the active political affairs of this country is conducted on a nonpartisan basis, through our Committee on Political Education, in pursuit of the principle that candidates should be supported on their records, regardless of their party labels. I have consistently sought to avoid any compromise of that principle through any narrow identification of the AFL-CIO's interests with the structure or machinery of either political party. That fact adds to my deep resentment at the type of highly inventive "reporting" represented by the Evans-Novak article.

The press of late is prone to attribute a so-called "credibility gap" to the White House. The charge is, I believe, misdirected. On the basis of this Post article—as well as many other press items which have purported to describe events where I have been in a position to know the actual facts—I am convinced it is high time that prominent newspapers which continually impose upon the credulity of their readers begin to cast the motes from their own eyes. They desperately need to do something about their own "credibility," to narrow the vast gap that too often exists between the easily ascertainable truth and the versions commonly reported in the press.

As one beginning step in that direction, I would suggest a new annual award—which might well be called the unpulitzer prize—or the journalistic booby prize for the worst reporting of the year. Although I realize the keenness of the competition, I would like to nominate Evans and Novak for one of the many 1966 awards that might appropriately be presented.

Since the Washington Post bears the responsibility for placing this journalistic garbage before the people of the nation's capital, you have, I believe, an equal responsibility to clean up after it. I am therefore requesting that you print this letter before again unleashing Evans and Novak upon the unsuspecting public.

Labor to Push 9-State Drive For Job Corps

erty programs which have been completed by 100 union members. Many of these, he said, will be available in the drive to recruit young workers for the Job Corps. The AFL-CIO will use all of its resources to reach potential candidates including churches and social and community agencies, he added.

Headquarters will be in Charleston, W. Va., Stanley said, adding that "we will have men in the field to cover the entire area."

The contract calls for the West Virginia AFL-CIO to locate, identify and screen youths in accordance with the Job Corps' screening procedures, and to send completed papers to OEO regional offices for final action.

Stanley, who is a member of the OEO Labor Advisory Council, assisted recently in setting up "Operation Helping Hand," a program undertaken jointly by the West Virginia AFL-CIO and the Kanawha Valley AFL-CIO to help find jobs for young women on completion of their Job Corps training.

The Charleston Job Corps Center for Women provided the names of those nearing the end of their training. The union role was to send the names with resumes, to the central labor body in the area to which each young women planned to go.

The local union body then got in touch with her and offered help in getting adjusted, and often was able to assist in finding her a job.

RECEIVING AWARDS as outstanding collectors of COPE dollars are (from left) Herbert Milton, Jr., of Steelworkers Local 67, and Pres. Charles Rogers of USWA Local 3643, both of Granite City, Ill. The presentation is being made by USWA Dir. Lloyd McBride in recognition of $815 in collections by Milton and $562 by Rogers in their respective locals.

Pact Averts Walkout At Coast Racetracks

Los Angeles—Negotiators for the Building Service Employes have won such concepts as overtime pay and sick leave for 2,000 California racetrack workers in a three-year agreement that narrowly averted a tie-up of the Santa Anita and Bay Meadows tracks.

The contract was settled just hours before opening day post time in a whirlwind finish that ended in a hotel lobby, where intermediaries managed to stop a management walkout on negotiations.

The contract nails down for the first time such things as premium pay for seven annual holidays and time and one-half for work beyond seven hours a day. The latter provision starts in 1969.

Daily wage increases each year of $1, $1 and 75 cents were negotiated. Members of Parimutuel Clerks Local 280 also will get a $5 a day bonus for working Saturdays—another "first."

Bargaining was between four Building Service locals representing clerks, maintenance and public events workers, and the Federation of California Racing Associations.

Assisting local negotiators in the settlement were West Coast BSEIU Vice Pres. George Hardy and W. J. Bassett, retiring secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

The tracks agreed to raise health and welfare contributions by $5 per month per employe, upping the monthly figure to $29.50.

Three days sick leave will be given at both Santa Anita and Hollywood Park, where 55-day race meets are held, and one day at other tracks and fairs in the state. This benefit starts Sept. 17, 1968.

Maintenance and public events workers will get an additional 25 cents a day in each year for their pension funds. The clerks will decide if they wish to increase their fringes out of their pay increases.

With fringe benefits, the daily average wage for clerks will exceed $45 by the end of the term, the nation's top figure on the horse racing circuit.

Provision was made to hammer out additional job and pay inequities at the local racetrack level.

The parties also agreed that if California legislates night horse racing or additional racing time for the tracks, negotiations would be reopened on benefits covering such extra work.

BSEIU Wins Election At California Hospital

Los Angeles—Building Service Employes Local 399 has been named bargaining agent at the world-famed Cedars of Lebanon Hospital after a bitter, year-long battle.

The local cracked the tough Southern California private hospital field after negotiating a modified version of the election ground rules that opened the way to AFL-CIO organizing of California farm workers.

Cedars of Lebanon workers, not covered by labor law pertaining to union representation, voted 356 to 344 for Local 399. The California Conciliation Service, which also was effective in recent farm elections, supervised balloting.

West Coast BSEIU Vice Pres. George Hardy viewed the outcome as a springboard for a major organizing drive among thouands of low-wage Southern California hospital workers. Cedars of Lebanon was described as the symbol of opposition to unionism in the powerful Southern California Hospital Council.

Contract negotiations are to open soon as part of the election agreement.

Local 399 won bargaining rights among the 500-bed hospital's housekeeping, dietary and maintenance workers, licensed vocational nurses, nurses' aides and others among 45 so-called "blue collar" classifications.

A separate white collar unit of technicians and professionals rejected the union 190 to 28.

Local 399 has had an agreement with Mount Sinai Hospital—also operated by Cedars management—for many years.

However, stiff resistance met union organizers when they approached the Cedars issue. Uniformed guards were stationed at hospital doors to bar union representatives, union officials reported.

The average wage at Cedars in certain basic classifications is less than $1.50 an hour, Local 399 disclosed.

Union Leaders Named To Film Institute Panel

Pres. Richard F. Walsh of the Theatrical Stage Employes, an AFL-CIO vice president, and Pres. Charlton Heston of the Screen Actors Guild have been named to the advisory council of the American Film Institute, recently established by the National Council on the Arts.

SUB Plans Help:

State Insurance Seen Mainstay of Jobless

State unemployment insurance remains the mainstay for most jobless workers despite the development of supplemental unemployment benefits plans, an AFL-CIO study shows.

Only 2.3 million workers are covered by the supplementary protection unions have been able to negotiate for their members, reports Economist Rudolph Oswald of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Research in the current issue of the American Federationist, AFL-CIO monthly publication.

"SUB operations depend upon the general economic climate, accumulating funds in good times and paying out benefits in bad times," Oswald writes.

"In this sense, they counter the economic trend since they accumulate funds in times of high employment and pay them out when work is slack."

The adequacy of SUB funds, as far as they go, was tested between 1960 and 1963, Oswald points out. Noting that the employer's financial obligation is limited to a fixed contribution based on the number of hours worked or paid for, he states that payments from all SUB funds exceeded contributions by about one-fourth in 1961, when unemployment was high.

"However," he continues, "most plans were able to maintain full benefits without any reduction in the amount or length of benefits. In 1960 and 1961, some of the Steelworkers' plans had to reduce benefits. In subsequent negotiations, finances of the plans were increased to prevent such a curtailment of benefits in the future."

A Labor Dept. study covering 1960-63 found that while most SUB agreements provided for up to 52 weeks of benefits, the experience of several indicated that up to 5 percent of a plan's membership exhausted their benefits, he notes.

A factor, he says, is that many workers because of low seniority were not eligible for the full 52 weeks of benefits and that "in keeping with seniority provisions, layoffs generally were concentrated among recently-hired workers with the least benefit eligibility."

Oswald takes both a general and a specific look at SUB plans.

In the former he examines their growth since the Auto Workers negotiated the first such plan with major auto manufacturers in 1955; the amount of benefits; their duration; their payment during workweeks shorter than normal; eligibility requirements; financing; integration of benefits with state unemployment compensation, and the extension of benefits negotiated in recent contract renewals.

In the area of specifics, he examines in detail the plans under agreements between the USWA and U.S. Steel and between the UAW and General Motors.

"Supplemental unemployment benefit plans are viewed as one forward step in the long-time quest of organized labor for an improved unemployment insurance system, improved job security and guaranteed employment," Oswald writes.

"SUB plans supplement state unemployment insurance benefits to provide the unemployed worker with a higher proportion of his regular weekly pay check. They ease the financial burden of temporary unemployment. But they do not fully prevent financial loss to the hourly-paid worker confronted with a temporary layoff."

The 2.3 million workers protected by SUB plans come under about 700 contracts, Labor Dept. studies show. About one out of every four workers under major contracts—those covering 1,000 or more workers—is covered by a SUB program.

Oswald lists industries, other than steel and autos, in which large groups of employes are covered as aluminum, rubber, agricultural equipment, cans, women's apparel, glass and cement.

In non-manufacturing industries, National Maritime Union members are covered under contracts with Atlantic and Gulf Coast ship operators. Unions in construction, retail trade and longshoring also have negotiated SUB plans, Oswald writes.

CONGRATULATIONS are extended by W. J. Bassett (left), retiring as secretary-treasurer of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO after 23 years of service, to his successor, State Labor Commissioner Sigmund Arywitz. Elected by acclamation, Arywitz will take office on Jan. 16. He formerly was Los Angeles education director of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Major '67 Bargaining To Cover 3.1 Million

and farm equipment agreements will expire along with those in meat packing and rubber. Deferred increases will cover aerospace, steel, aluminum and electrical goods.

More than 700 major agreements each covering 1,000 workers or more are due to expire in 1967, the article reports. Manufacturing industries account for 1.9 million of the 3.1 million workers covered by contracts that will terminate.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics has on file information on about 2,000 collective bargaining contracts covering 1,000 workers or more. These agreements cover nearly 8.8 million workers, or about half of all workers under collective bargaining agreements exclusive of the government.

The 4 million workers who will receive deferred wage increases in 1967 represent a decline from the 4.3 million who received such previously negotiated pay hikes in 1966, but an increase from the 1965 level. The drop from 1966 is attributable to the number of contracts containing year by year increases that will terminate in 1967.

Deferred pay increases in 1967 averaging from 7 to 9 cents an hour will be below the 10 to 11 cents figure for 1966.

The adoption of escalator clauses in 1966 bargaining has brought the total of workers whose wages are affected by changes in the Consumer Price Index to 2.2 million, the article reports, or about 23 percent of workers under major collective bargaining contracts at the beginning of 1967.

The tabulation shows that only about 29 percent of workers covered by escalator clauses are due to receive deferred wage increases in 1967 and of the workers who will receive the pay hikes only 17 percent are covered by escalation review.

Long-Term Contracts

About 500,000 workers are covered by long-term contracts that are not subject to bargaining on wages during 1967 and that specified no wage increases during the year.

Of the major bargaining activity trucking agreements come up in March, rubber in April, meat packing in August. Contracts with the big three of the auto industry run out in September, as do a number of machinery pacts.

In a companion article in the magazine, the department notes that less than one-fifth of workers under major agreements were covered by contracts that expired in 1966.

The average annual increase in wages over the full term of the contracts negotiated in the first half of 1966 was 3.7 percent compared to 3.3 percent for the same period in 1965 the article reports.

Meany Asks No Retreat On Poverty

Meany stressed, with a "guns or butter" choice. The country has ample resources "to prosecute the shooting war and still combat the shortcomings of our own society."

On the fighting in Viet Nam the AFL-CIO president strongly reaffirmed the "heartfelt support" of the federation for Pres. Johnson in his efforts to achieve peace and freedom.

Meany stressed that "the stakes are far greater than South Viet Nam. By demonstrating its concern for freedom at so painful a price, the U.S. is preserving the peace, freedom and opportunity for progress of scores of other small nations which otherwise could have become victims of Communist aggression. And by so doing it is helping to assure its own freedom, security and chances for true peace as well."

To paraphase a motto out of labor history, Meany said, "a loss of freedom for one is the concern of all."

On the domestic front, he stressed that "a retreat now," a failure to appropriate the funds needed to implement the new legislation, "would dash the hopes of those millions of Americans who have yet to rise from poverty, who are still denied full and equal opportunity. This America must not do."

Meany pledged that "we in the AFL-CIO intend to exert every force at our command to prevent such a retreat. We are confident that the great majority of Americans share our objectives and our determination that the struggle to reach them must continue with undiminished force."

Fire Fighters Set Up Commission To Weigh Shift in No-Strike Policy

The Intl. Association of Fire Fighters has announced appointment of a nine-member Fact Finding Commission to study conditions under which its members are employed and to consider whether modification of the union's traditional no-strike policy is necessary, desirable or possible.

The commission was authorized by the union's biennial convention in Indianapolis last August on the basis of recommendations by IAFF Pres. William D. Buck.

Buck announced that George M. Harrison of Cincinnati, president emeritus of the Railway Clerks and a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, will be chairman of the new commission. Rev. Philip A. Carey, director of the Xavier School of Industrial Relations, will be vice chairman.

Other members are: IAFF Vice Pres. Gordon Anderson, Vancouver, B.C.; Gen. Mgr. Percy Bugbee, National Fire Protection Association, Boston, Mass.; IAFF Gen. Counsel Edward J. Hickey, Jr., Washington, D. C.; Executive Dir. Ed Johnson, League of Wisconsin Municipalities, Madison, Wis.; Charles A. Hall, IAFF Local 1587, Miami, Fla.; City Mgr. Henry B. Nabors, Grand Rapids, Mich.; IAFF Vice Pres. Harry Williams, Portland, Ore.

Buck said that recent work stoppages by fire fighters in Atlanta, Kansas City, St. Louis and other communities had indicated the desirability of a study of the conditions under which IAFF members work and whether its no-strike policy should be retained or changed.

The new commission, he said, will be instructed to bring a fresh look and viewpoint to the fact finding process with no pre-commitment to either side of the question.

No Change Now

Meanwhile, he said, the continuing policy of the IAFF will be against strikes or work stoppages under any guise by its members.

The Fire Fighters have had a constitutional prohibition against strikes and work stoppages since the union was chartered by the former AFL in 1918.

"Even before we came into existence as a union, there was a strong-rooted tradition of no-strikes among professional fire fighters who protected cities and towns," Buck recalled. "Fire fighters have to stay with a job that means long hours, low wages and hazards found in few other callings.

"In recent years, however, the new generation of men who have entered the ranks of fire departments have often felt, with considerable justification, that they are being exploited by public officials and administrators.

"In this era of an expanded role for collective bargaining between government employes' unions and federal, state and city agencies, we have felt the need for a fresh, hard look at our union's entire realm of negotiating procedures — including the question of whether changes in our traditional no-strike policy should be seriously considered."

The IAFF has about 120,000 members in the United States, Canada and Puerto Rico.

'Movement' Urged As Housing Spur

What housing in the United States needs is a "housing movement . . . representative of the public; of tenants, householders, and consumers, representative, in other words, of citizens," Sec. Boris Shishkin of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee writes in the 1966 Housing Yearbook.

Shishkin, a leader in the fight for better housing since the 1930s, urges central labor bodies to "take the initiative and provide leadership" to help people solve their neighborhood problems and to make "the voice of the community heard and heeded in city hall, the state capital and in Washington."

The Yearbook is published by the National Housing Conference.

Canada Labor Urged to Build On Past Gains

Ottawa, Ont.—Canadians entering their country's second century can again demonstrate the pioneer spirit that built the nation "and make a really significant contribution to the great challenge of relating scientific and technical advances to human needs," Pres. Claude Jodoin of the Canadian Labour Congress said in his New Year's message.

"All that has been accomplished in our first century—and it is a great deal—has provided us with a solid base on which to build," Jodoin said. "This is our responsibility and our success or our failure will depend on how well we build."

"Considerable" advances have been made in the scientific and technical fields, Jodoin observed, but "it is in human relations that we are lagging. . . . We have failed to keep pace in human needs." He added:

"We have many advantages. We are a relatively small country in terms of population. We are a country with a diversity of interests. Industrially we are a young but rapidly growing nation. Ours is a country with a tremendous future."
